"The device," said Delany, "has such an inhibiting effect as to prevent the employes from performing their work with confidence and ease. Every employe has occasion to pause in the course of his work, to take a 'breather,' to scratch his head, to yawn, or otherwise be himself without affecting his work. An employe, with reason, would hesitate . . . to so behave, if his every action is being recorded on TV.

"To have workers constantly televised is, to me, reminiscent of the era depicted by Charlie Chaplin in 'Modern Times,' and constitutes . . . an affront to the dignity of man. I had hoped we had long passed that period in labor relations."

Executive Council Statement:

Program to Meet Urban Crisis Lists 10 Key Areas for Action

The following is excerpted from the AFL-CIO Executive Council's statement on America's Urban Crisis, Sept. 12, 1967:

THE ECONOMIC POLICY COMMITTEE of the AFL-CIO has given careful and thoughtful consideration to both immediate and long-term programs which will meet the needs of America's urban areas. The Committee's report to the Executive Council contains solid recommendations which the AFL-CIO Executive Council now adopts as its program for meeting the urban crisis. Specifically, the AFL-CIO calls for:

1. One million public service jobs for persons now unemployed or seriously under-employed. To provide this necessary means of helping people lift themselves out of poverty and deprivation, Congress must immediately adopt a $4 billion program to fund federal, state and local government agencies and non-profit organizations, along the lines of the O'Hara bill. We also consider the Clark bill a step in the right direction.

2. Two and a half million new housing units each year including:

A. Public housing through new and rehabilitated low-rent homes for the 20 percent of city families whose incomes are below requirements for a minimum decent standard of living. New public housing construction, now at a 30,000-to-40,000 annual level, should be immediately increased to 200,000 to 300,000 for each of the next two years and 500,000 a year thereafter. Adequate appropriations for the rent supplement program are a necessity.

B. Housing for lower middle-income families, not eligible for public housing and unable to afford decent dwellings in the standard, privately financed housing market. Federally subsidized interest rate loans and a federal subsidy for the partial abatement of local taxes on such properties are needed to increase construction of such housing by cooperatives, non-profit and limited dividend corporations. In addition, federal legislation should make it possible for such groups to acquire existing properties, with government insurance of long-term and low-interest loans.

C. Moderate-income housing, already operating with government-insured mortgages, stepped up through measures to increase involvement of pension funds, college endowment funds and private trusts.

D. Open housing, in suburbs as well as in cities, an essential part of a meaningful effort to rebuild our metropolitan areas.

E. Urban renewal no longer confined to commercial and expensive high-rise construction. The focus instead must be on homes in balanced neighborhoods, with families displaced by slum clearance given assistance in finding decent dwellings at rents they can afford.

F. Model Cities program, with adequate appropriations.

3. Mass transit, improved and expanded, is an urgent need in all metropolitan areas.

4. Accelerated construction of public facilities, such as water supplies, sewage systems, mass transit, schools, hospitals, day-care centers, playgrounds, libraries, museums, clean air and water, are essential to rebuild America's metropolitan areas. For this, we urge Congress to adopt at least a $2 billion a year grant-in-aid program to state and local governments.

5. A substantially expanded Neighborhood Youth Corps program to help youngsters remain in school and to provide work and training for those who have dropped out of school.

6. The opportunity for quality education can be met only by realizing the need to close the educational gap between the privileged and underprivileged school children of our nation, by special incentives to teachers in slum areas, federal subsidy of the More Effective School type program, full use of school buildings for job-training, adult education, and community centers. In addition, vocational training must be realistically geared to the modern job market.

7. Manpower training must be linked with job placement and training allowances must be increased so that trainees can afford to remain in the program.

8. Public welfare assistance must be restructured, with the program based on need alone. A federal minimum standard of payments and adequate federal funds should be provided, state work-incentive programs should enable welfare recipients to retain a substantial amount of the dollars they earn without penalty, and demeaning investigations of applicants should be eliminated, on the principle that comprehensive social services are a matter of right to those in need.

9. Relief of rural poverty, concentrated in the southern and southwestern states primarily, by federal legislation to provide farm workers with unemployment compensation and according to them the same right other workers have under the National Labor Relations Act to organize unions and bargain collectively; by adequate federal funds to assist low and moderate-income rural families to buy or rehabilitate housing; continuation and strengthening of the Vocational Education Act of 1963 and the Education Act of 1965 in rural areas; federal aid in establishment of adequate public facilities, such as highways, hospitals, schools, vocational and technical training institutions; extension of the Agriculture Dept. recreational and tourist activities in rural areas, and provision of full and fair employment opportunities for Negroes, Mexican-Americans and other minorities to work in the industries of rural areas and in state and local governments.

10. Economic planning, under federal leadership, and including each state and metropolitan area, should include the development, coordination and maintenance of an inventory of needs for housing, public facilities and services, to facilitate application of the nation's resources to meet the needs of a rapidly growing urban population, while also providing a sound foundation for a continually increasing private economy.

Cogen Hits 'Piecemeal' Approach:

National Master Plan Urged To Upgrade Education in U.S.

THE PRESIDENT of the American Federation of Teachers, addressing a nationwide radio audience, called for a national master plan to upgrade education.

"Piecemeal attacks" on school problems aren't meeting the needs, said Charles Cogen, and "education in the United States is in a terrible mess." He made the statements on Labor News Conference, an AFL-CIO produced public affairs program aired Tuesday at 7:35 p.m., EDT, on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

Cogen urged development of specific goals for the nation's system of education and establishment of standards aimed at achieving them. Such a plan, he said, should include minimum standards of class size, teacher pay, psychological and social services for students and school-home contact.

"Even the federal program, much as we approve of its goals, doesn't have any systematic, general and specific set of goals that can apply to education as a whole," he asserted.

Cogen said the union's More Effective Schools Program, now operating in 21 New York City slum and ghetto area schools, demonstrates the practicality of a planned, systematic approach. "We find much greater motivation" among teachers, parents and children alike, he said, and improved student achievement. He said that applications for teaching positions in those schools now run ahead of the number of jobs available.

COGEN SAID that increased teacher emphasis on collective bargaining is producing agreements that are lifting the quality of education in many areas. He pointed out that better conditions are attracting better teachers, while smaller classes and better student services are making "basic improvements in conditions that directly affect the students."

Reporters questioning Cogen were Craig Smith of the Newhouse National News Service and Frank Swoboda of United Press Intl.

THE LAST-DITCH resistance of southern textile manufacturers to unionism, as revealed by witness after witness in hearings before the House Special Labor Subcommittee, recalls a similar role the industry played in defending child labor.

Exploitation of children was not the exclusive province of textile employers. Most history books describe the deplorable use of the young in other industries, in mines and on the farms, North and South, East and West. What made the southern textile industry the case example of crass child exploitation was its outspoken defense of its practices.

North Carolina, for example, as a major southern textile state had, in 1914, a 12-year minimum age for children, a 60-hour week with no daily limit on hours and required no evidence of age or schooling other than a parent's consent.

If the parents worked in the mill and lived in the mill village, as was almost always the case, parental consent was automatic. A few years ago during a textile strike at Henderson, N.C., a striker recalled that when his class in school had reached the age of 12 the mill owner came into the classroom and actually marched the children into the mill.

Yet, in 1914, when the Palmer-Owen bill to outlaw child labor was passed by Congress all this was defended by the textile interests.

The bill had the strong support of the American Federation of Labor, the churches, the child labor committees.

But the representative of the executive committee of the Southern cotton textile manufacturers told a House committee: "The children of the South, many of them must labor. . . . It is a question of necessity."

The House committee, in its report, declared: "Preliminary investigation shows that child labor for children of 14 or over is almost universal in southern cotton mill villages because the wages paid the average adult will not support a family in decency without the children's wages."

The Palmer-Owen bill was passed. However, a North Carolina judge challenged its constitutionality before the Supreme Court. In a five to four decision he was sustained. Another child labor bill was passed and it, too, was challenged by the same judge. He again won his point.

In the 1920s a drive was undertaken to secure a constitutional amendment. Joining the textile manufacturers in opposition were such groups as the NAM and the American Farm Bureau Federation. A front organization known as the Citizens Committee to Protect Our Homes and Children was formed. It spouted the arguments that if the amendment were ratified, it would "take away the sovereign rights of the states . . . take from you the control of the education of your children . . ."

ALL THESE ARGUMENTS have a familiar ring today but they were effective. By Jan. 1, 1933, only six states had ratified the amendment and legislatures had rejected it in 33 others. Such was the power of the pro-child labor coalition. It took the New Deal and the Fair Labor Standards Act to place some restrictions on child labor.

Under the FLSA a basic minimum of 16 years is established for general employment with an 18-year minimum age for occupations declared hazardous by the secretary of labor and 14 for employment outside school hours in non-manufacturing, non-mining occupations.

In his 1966 report on child labor, Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz noted that during the year there were 18,550 minors illegally employed under the child labor provisions. Two thirds were in non-farm establishments and one-third were children on farms.

Many of the violations were extremely serious. Almost 9,000 minors under 18 were found in hazardous occupations.

We've progressed a long way on the child labor front in the last half-century, but we have further to go. Still, there are those who wish to turn the clock back.

A NATIONAL MASTER PLAN to upgrade education was urged by Pres. Charles Cogen (center) of the American Federation of Teachers on Labor News Conference. Reporters Frank Swoboda (left) of United Press Intl. and Craig Smith of the Newhouse National News Service questioned Cogen on the AFL-CIO produced program broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EDT, on Mutual radio.

How to Buy:

Expansion of Benefits Offers New Opportunities to Veterans

By Sidney Margolius

A NUMBER OF VETERANS' benefits recently have been expanded and provide new or improved opportunities for both young and older veterans to use these aids.

The Veterans Readjustment Benefits Act of 1966 provides educational payments for veterans who have served in the armed forces since Jan. 31, 1955 (or who will serve). Veterans with more than 180 days of active duty are eligible for college, business-school, vocational or other education, including correspondence courses, in proportion to the length of their active service.

As the result of recent increases, veterans taking full-time courses will receive $130 a month with no dependents, $155 if married and up to $175 with two dependents.

Proportionate benefits are paid for part-time courses. The veteran's own income is not a factor; simply the length of service.

But even the increased allowances do not meet all school expenses in this period of rapidly rising educational costs. It also is advisable to have some cash on hand when you start because of the time it takes for allowances to be approved and arrive.

The new law also provides allowances for on-the-job training to veterans enrolling in a federal or state-approved apprenticeship or training program.

Under another program, new veterans, as they are separated from service, will get special counseling in job finding and training.

Veterans with a service-connected disability are eligible for vocational rehabilitation if needed to overcome the employment handicap of the disability. Eligible disabled veterans first are counseled, then an employment program is worked out, and up to four years of training (in some cases even more), may be provided.

One of the most interesting developments is the extension of the eligibility period for GI home loans for World War II vets. The program expired for these older ex-servicemen this past July 25. Now it has been renewed to July 25, 1970.

In general, veterans who served on active duty for at least 181 days, but not including "six-month enlistees," are eligible for loans to buy houses or farms, or for alterations and improvements, or for business purposes. You do have to make your own arrangements with a bank, savings association or other private lender.

The lender may charge no more than 6 per cent for VA mortgages at this writing. A VA guarantee or FHA home mortgage insurance for veterans also enables you to make a lower down payment than is usual.

ANOTHER VALUABLE benefit, dental treatment, has helped many veterans, but many others have not used it. The VA will provide or pay for dental treatment for service-connected dental conditions, even if not compensable.

This usually means subsequent treatment or appliances for teeth that were worked on when in service. The treatment is given either at a VA clinic or by an approved dentist in your own community. If not compensable this treatment must be applied for within one year of discharge.

Educational benefits for children of deceased or totally-disabled war veterans are provided through an increase in the eligibilty age to 26. This is a benefit that often is overlooked by some of the families that need it most.

The new veteran also should keep in mind that most states also have their own benefits for war veterans and their families, including partial property-tax exemptions in many states. You can get information on your state's provisions from the Veterans Commission at your state capital.

FDA Issues Rules On Product Labeling

WHAT IS IT? What's it to be used for? Product labels would have to give the customer clear answers to these and other questions under packaging and labeling regulations proposed for over-the-counter drugs, medical devices, and cosmetics.

The Food & Drug Administration regulations would carry out mandatory provisions of the Fair Packaging & Labeling Act, which became effective July 1. Packaging regulations for food products were issued by the FDA in July.

Over-the-counter drugs (those sold without prescription) would have to be identified by their established name. If a product is a combination of drugs and has no established name, its pharmacological category (such as antacid or analgesic) would have to be listed on the package, along with a listing of all active ingredients.

A cosmetic would have to carry the common or usual name of the product, such as "shampoo," "cologne," "lipstick," "perfume," or "bath powder." In the case of products that have no common name, the package would have to provide a functional description, for example, "eyeliner eyebrow pencil" or "hand care lotion." The description also could be given in the form of an illustration or vignette.

Medical devices, which include such products as tongue depressors and hypodermic syringes, also would have to carry their common name.

The regulations also specify the form and location of declarations of contents to make it easier to compare values. Quantity would be stated in terms of weight, fluid measure, numerical count, linear or area measure, depending on what terms are appropriate for a particular commodity.

SOME PRODUCTS would require a combined statement of contents. For example, the label of a drug sold in tablet form would have to list both the number of tablets and the amount of the drug in each tablet (e.g., "100 tablets, 5 grains each.")

Descriptive words that tend to exaggerate the contents, such as "full" quart or "jumbo" pound, would be prohibited. Stating a measurement in drams, now a common practice on cosmetic and drug packages, also would be prohibited.

The name and address of the manufacturer, packer, or distributor would be required on the package. Directions for use and other label information required now by regulations under the Federal Food, Drug & Cosmetic Act would still be necessary on drugs and devices.

All of the mandatory information must be prominently placed and conspicuoulsy stated on the label to be easily read by the average consumer.

The proposed regulations include special provisions for cosmetics sold in decorative containers, which carry no labeling, or in containers so small that the label is not big enough to carry the required information. Tear-away tags, tapes, or wrappers, or display cards on which the product is mounted, would serve to provide the needed label space in these cases.

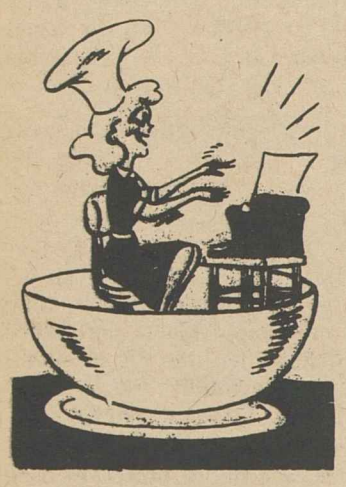
The proposed regulations were published in the Federal Register on Aug. 22.

From Soup to Nonsense:

A Barbecue Is Just Patio Dining, But a Picnic Is an Adventure

By Jane Goodsell

I GUESS IT'S TRUE what they say about picnics. It's too far to go to eat too much, and somebody always forgets the salt for the hard-boiled eggs. Either that or they forget the mustard for the hotdogs. Or, worse yet, the hotdogs for the mustard. It's true that it's a rare picnic that doesn't include ants, wasps, bees, earwigs and/or garter snakes. There are few events as accident-prone as a picnic. With so many ways for things to go wrong, it is no wonder that something almost always does.



And yet, I like picnics. I admit this with the same lip-jutting defiance that I confess to liking sweet potatoes with marshmallows and Sousa marches—which are about as Out as you can get.

When I suggest that it might be fun to go on a picnic, my friends gape at me as though I'd suggested it might be fun to spend a day paving streets. "What do you want to go on a picnic for?" they ask incredulously. "It's so much easier and nicer to barbecue on the patio."

Well, it may be easier and it may be nicer, but it isn't the same. Barbecuing on the patio is just eating outside, but a picnic is an adventure. Or so it seems to me.

My own ideas of what a picnic should be are simple and classic. I hold no brief for haut cuisine fare—boeuf en gelee and eggs stuffed with caviar. Sure, it's glamorous but that's what's wrong. It shouldn't be glamorous. Not on a picnic. I feel just as squinty-eyed about cold cuts and delicatessen cole slaw.

Since I've already established that I have a rigid, authoritarian attitude about picnic food, I might as well go one step further and state, with arms akimbo, what should go into the picnic basket. Fried chicken. Great mounds of it. Potato salad. Long, skinny, crusty loaves of French bread. Beefsteak tomatoes, cut in thick slices. And pickles. Dill and sweet and either mustard or watermelon rind or both. Stuffed eggs—stuffed with eggs. Fresh fruit. Or, better yet, a hand-crank freezer filled with fresh strawberry or peach ice cream. And sour cream chocolate cake.

WHERE TO GO on a picnic? It shouldn't be so far away that everything, including the picnickers, are hot and sticky by the time you get there. But neither should it be so close to home that you don't feel you've gone anywhere. The best place for a picnic is a grassy knoll, level enough so you can spread the picnic on the ground.

There should be trees for shade and while a babbling brook is nice, I don't insist on it. What I do insist on is: no tables. The right way to sit at a picnic is crosslegged, tailor fashion, on the ground. I feel strongly about this.

Actually, my own family is quite amiable about accompanying me on picnics, although I'm not sure how the children really feel. They may be humoring me, as they did during all those years when they pretended to believe in Santa Claus because Mommy did.

On the other hand, maybe they like picnics every bit as much as I do. And why shouldn't they? Picnics—and I don't care what anyone says—are fun.

Hall Asks Revitalized Fleet:

U.S. Shipping Role Cited in Dollar Drain

A revitalized U.S. merchant marine could completely wipe out the nation's balance of payments deficit, now at an annual rate of $2 billion, according to Paul Hall, president of the Maritime Trades Dept. and the Seafarers.

Writing in the September issue of Maritime, official publication of MTD, Hall noted that there have been repeated Administration warnings to the effect that "a continuing outflow of American gold seriously endangers the U.S. economy."

The MTD official cited current figures showing that U.S.-flag merchant vessels are carrying only 7 percent of the nation's exports and imports. He added:

"As small as the role which American-flag shipping now plays in the handling of U.S. export-import cargo, it contributes a billion dollars a year to the plus side of the balance of payments.

"If American ships were carrying the same proportion of U.S. cargoes which they carried a dozen years ago—some 34 percent—there would be no balance-of-payments deficit at all."

Hall took note of numerous press reports painting the merchant marine as a "sick and dying" industry.

Cure Outlined

"There's nothing so wrong with our maritime industry that it can't be cured," he declared. "All it needs is a positive government program and an infusion of reasonable amounts of tax dollars and private investment capital."

The MTD president gave this prescription for the curing of maritime's present ills:

"The American fleet today is small and old—and it must be modernized and enlarged to meet our continually expanding world trading position.

"The new vessels joining the fleet must be built in American yards—for that is the surest way to reinforce our own national economy, prevent further deterioration in our balance of payments, and assure the nation of a shipyard capacity and a pool of skilled labor in case of national emergency.

"There must be enough tax dollars put into operating subsidies so that our U.S.-flag ships can compete for their share of the trade with the lower wage shipping of other nations—for it would be ridiculous to build a modern American fleet unless we fill the holds of those vessels with American import-export cargoes."

In a research study published in the September issue of Maritime, the MTD is sharply critical of the fact that "in the face of the need for an adequate sealift," the nation has turned to foreign-flag vessels to carry most of the 77 raw materials considered by the government to be "strategic" to national defense.

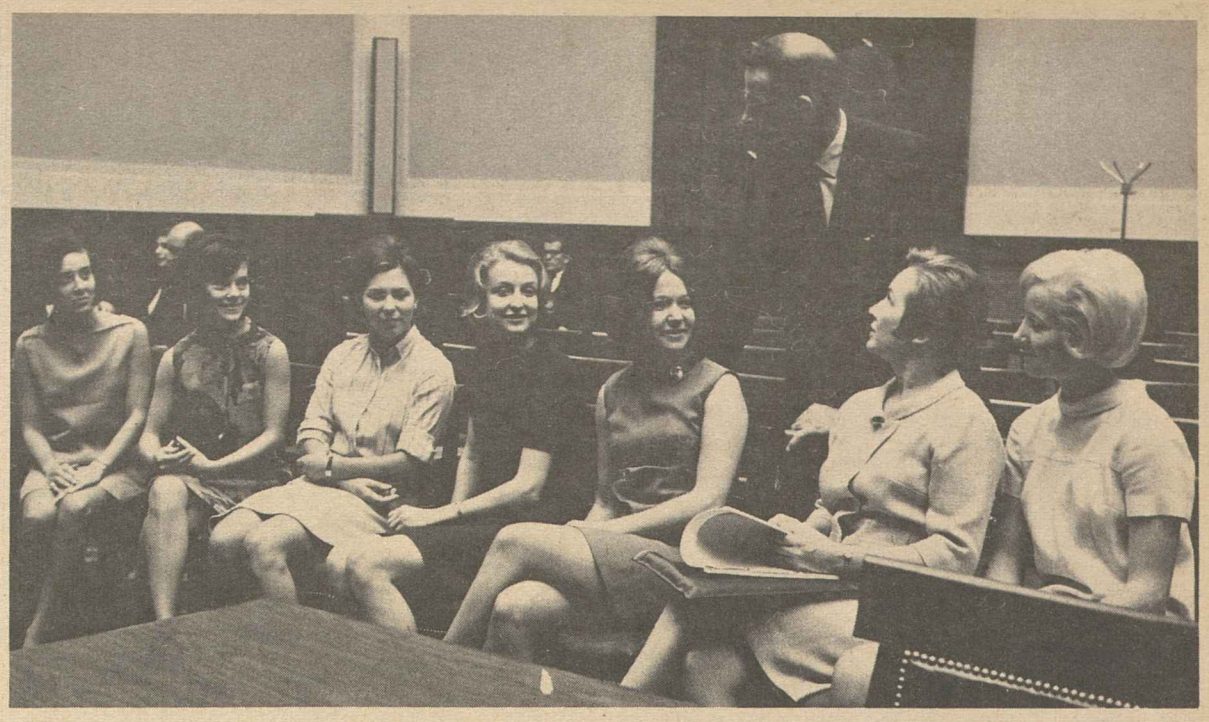
The study showed that 90 percent of the imported iron ore, 95 percent of the imported bauxite, 75 percent of the imported lead, and some 90 percent of such crucial materials as columbite and chromite—which are used in the aerospace program—were brought to our shores aboard ships of other nations.

The MTD study called the situation "totally unacceptable," adding: "The very nature of strategic materials makes their carriage on American-flag vessels imperative."

Meanwhile the MTD is urging Congress to hold firm on its ban against any foreign construction of U.S. naval vessels.

In telegrams to all members of the House, Hall and Executive Sec.-Treas. Peter M. McGavin warned that the "build abroad scheme" would lead to "the exportation of American jobs" and the "worsening of the balance of payments."

The House-passed version of the fiscal 1968 Defense Dept. appropriations measure contains the ban on foreign construction. That language was deleted from the bill before it passed the Senate, and conferees from the two Houses are now deadlocked over the issue.



CONGRESS RARELY has a lineup of witnesses like this. These ladies, all members of the Transport Workers' local for stewards and stewardesses, testified before the Senate Labor Committee for a measure to prohibit discrimination because of age. With them is TWU Legislative Rep. Frank O'Connell.

Britain's Trade Unions Call for Shift In Government's Economic Policies

Brighton, England—Motions sharply critical of the British Government's economic policies were passed at the 99th Trades Union Congress here against the advice of a majority of TUC leaders.

On the final day of the five-day conference, however, the delegates passed without dissent a motion upholding the Labor Government and expresssing belief "that only by the continued support of the trade union movement" can it hope to achieve economic stability.

The actions were interpreted by observers as a strong protest against the policy of what a majority of British unionists regard as "their Labor Government." The critical motions received support against the background of severe unemployment. Already 550,000 British workers are unemployed, and TUC leaders expect the total to rise above 750,000 during the winter.

Discontent Shown

The motion reflecting this discontent, introduced by the Shopworkers' Union, was passed by 4,883,000 votes to 3,502,000.

Its major provisions:

- Deplored the use of traditional deflationary measures to manage the economy which involve the creation of a pool of unemployed workers.
- Rejected the Government's intervention in collective bargaining as a solution to the country's problems.
- Demanded drastically reduced military expenditure and stabilized prices.
- Called for an extension of public ownership.

The groundswell of protest overwhelmed attempts by the TUC General Council — its governing body — to persuade delegates to reject the critical Shopworkers' motion. But the 18-14 vote on the council also reflected the anti-Government feeling.

TUC Gen. Sec. George Woodcock maintained that the result of the motion did not matter. What does matter, he said, is that the TUC should be able to influence British economic policies. It is not going to be able to do that, he continued, unless the General Council is given freedom to negotiate with the Government.

Woodcock outlined to the Congress what he termed the TUC's "new strategy" for economic policy. They would demand, he explained, that the Government try to raise exports and reduce imports by making special industry-by-industry studies of the weaknesses of the British economy.

The vital debate on the TUC's policy on Britain's decision to try to enter the European Common Market was, by consent, delayed until delegates know more about the terms and conditions to be laid down for British entry by the European politicians in Brussels. Indeed, delegates do not even know whether French President de Gaulle is willing to accept Britain's entry under any terms or conditions. When more information is available, the issue will be discussed by a special conference of trade union executives.

Although the vote was postponed, the motion on the conference agenda gave a foretaste of strong trade union opposition to British membership in the six-member economic community. The powerful Transport & General Workers' Union, led by Frank Cousins, demanded conditions which the British Government does not believe will be acceptable in Brussels.

Carolina Labor Urges Ban on Tax-Free Bonds

Wilmington, N.C.—Delegates to the North Carolina State AFL-CIO convention called for a nationwide ban on tax-free industrial bonds and other lures which they charged are designed to attract only "unorganized, low-wage and anti-union industries."

Before acting on the resolution, the convention heard strong evidence that North Carolina's dominant business and political interests are more interested in keeping unions out than bringing industry into the state.

State AFL-CIO Pres. W. M. Barbee, in his keynote address, read an article that appeared last spring in a small city newspaper, the Hamlet News-Messenger, published in Richmond County.

It reported that a delegation of the county's political and business leaders turned down an opportunity to bring to the county a $5 million plant employing 1,500 workers at high wages.

The company was not wanted, the newspaper said, because its work force was organized—under a contract with the Auto Workers providing a minimum wage of $3.11 an hour. The firm was not named, but the newspaper described it as "one of the real giants in United States industry."

However, the newspaper article reported, "the Richmond County industry seekers did not return from Raleigh empty handed. They brought with them the warm praises of the Dept. of Conservation & Development for the wisdom in their action in refusing an industry that would bring the United Automobile Workers into the county."

Barbee said the article demonstrates that "the state government of North Carolina is talking out of both sides of its mouth" and "deliberately deceiving" the people by claiming that efforts to attract industry are designed to increase the per capita income in the state.

Major speeches by AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler and COPE Deputy Dir. Joseph Rourke stressed the need for effective political education and organization to achieve labor's legislative goals.

Barbee and other top officers of the federation were re-elected without opposition and Aubrey Dixon of Operating Engineers Local 500 in Charlotte won a contest for third vice president.

Infant Mortality Cut, But U.S. Still Lags

The nation's infant mortality rate—the number of deaths under 1 year of age per 1,000 births—continued to drop in the first half of 1967, reaching a low of 22.9, Under Sec. of Health, Education & Welfare Wilbur J. Cohen reported.

Data compiled by the National Center for Health Statistics. show the rate has steadily declined from 27.1 in 1958 to 23.4 in 1966, a drop of 13.7 percent.

Cohen predicted that the infant mortality rate would continue to drop in the U.S. But he cautioned against any boasting. The U.S. still ranked only 15th among major nations of the world in its infant death rate in 1965.

Easier Building Access Sought for Handicapped

Organized labor's support for legislation which would require ready access to buildings for the handicapped was spelled out by Pres. Gordon M. Freeman of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers at a hearing before the National Commission on Architectural Barriers.

The commission has been holding hearings for the past year on methods of making buildings accessible to the handicapped and is due to report next Jan. 1 to the secretary of the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare.

Freeman, chairman of the Labor Committee of the President's Committee on Employment of the Handicapped, and a veteran of the fight to make life easier for those with physical or mental problems, spelled out some of the moves the AFL-CIO has made over the past few years to beat down the architectural barriers.

He recalled that the federation was represented on the Committee of the American Standards that drew up the standard specifications for easing entry to buildings and facilities for the physically handicapped and that Pres. George Meany distributed them to all affiliates and central bodies.

In an accompanying letter, Freeman said, Meany declared the standard "must find its way into architects plans for buildings—public and private — in every city and town in the United States."

The AFL-CIO published a pamphlet, "Working Together—the Key to Jobs for the Handicapped," which he said Meany sent to affiliates and central bodies and which urged support of the specifications. Additional literature also has been distributed, Freeman noted.

He told the commission that labor will do all in its power to help secure passage of the bill sponsored by Sen. E. L. Bartlett (D-Alaska) requiring that buildings financed with federal funds be so designed and constructed as to be accessible to the physically handicapped.

Meany Takes Post for Bible Week Observance

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany will serve again this year as honorary co-chairman for labor for National Bible Week. The interfaith program will be observed Oct. 15-22, keyed to the theme: "The Bible: Good News for Modern Man."

ACWA Gives 100 Chicago Scholarships

Chicago—The Clothing Workers' Chicago Joint Board announced that about 100 college students will receive $600 each this school year under its union-financed scholarship program. So far grants of that amount have been given to 93 students.

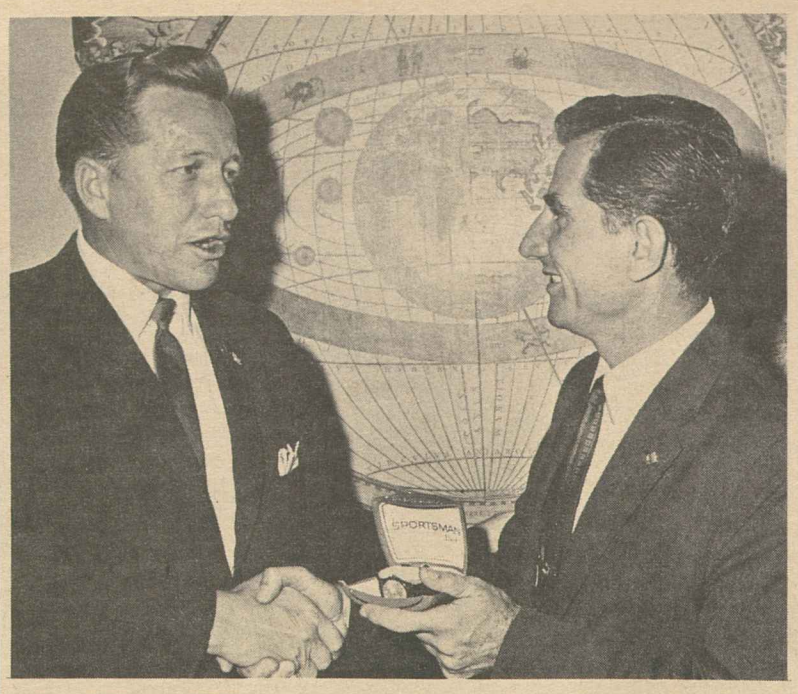
The plan established in 1966, provides up to $600 a year toward tuition in any accredited college, university or technical school for children of members with at least 13 years in the union. Where tuition is less than that amount, the difference is given the student for living expenses.

Aside from his parent's membership requirement, the student must be under 23 years of age, unless a war veteran, and be able to show acceptance by a credited institution of higher learning. There are no other qualifications needed.

Murray Finley, manager of the Joint Board also noted that the scholarships are subject to renewal each year for four years if the student remains in good standing. He said the 71 scholarships were awarded in the 1966-67 school year.

Finley emphasized that the plan is not intended to help just top students but to make sure that all members' children "get a chance for higher education." He added, "We are vitally concerned with the contributions to our society of the late bloomers."

The Joint Board, representing more than 10,000 ACWA members in the area, honored this year's scholarship recipients at a dinner at the Sherman House.



A WRIST WATCH to replace one that he ruined in heroically rescuing two young boys from drowning is presented to Gen. Sec. Faruk Akinturk (right) of the Turkish Railroad Workers' Union by Lester Zosel, Railway Clerks international affairs director. The Turkish union leader pulled the boys from the water of South Creek on St. John's College campus, Annapolis, Md. He was attending an orientation class there when he heard their cries for help.

Strong Meat Standard Sought by 2 Unions

Two unions representing workers in the nation's meat packing industry have urged the House to extend federal meat inspection standards to meat and meat products that do not cross state lines.

Both the Meat Cutters and the Packinghouse Workers criticized as inadequate the "voluntary" approach of legislation recommended by the House Agriculture Committee. It would encourage states to undertake inspection programs by offering federal funds to pay half the cost. But it would not require effective state programs.

The two unions are supporting a strengthening amendment that will be offered on the floor of the House by Representatives Neal Smith (D-Ia.), Thomas S. Foley (D-Wash.) and other sponsors.

Pres. Ralph Helstein of the Packinghouse Workers said in a letter to all House members that the voluntary approach is not adequate "to assure the entire American public, no matter in what state they may reside or travel, that the meat and meat products which they eat are safe and wholesome for human consumption."

A new leaflet issued by the Meat Cutters spells out the inadequacy of the Agriculture Committee's bill and quotes government surveys that uncovered "unspeakable conditions of filth and bad meat in many uninspected and state-inspected plants."

Extension of federal meat inspection, the union leaflet says, "faces great, strong and rich opposition. Only a large outpouring of mail and a large show of support by consumer groups, labor unions and the general public can bring about its approval."

Iowa Labor to Press Legislative, Vote Drives

Des Moines—A strong pledge to help advance social welfare programs and adoption of a state scholarship program highlighted actions of the annual convention of the Iowa AFL-CIO.

The 333 delegates also drew plans for an intensive drive to get Iowa unionists and their families to the polls next year after receiving a report from Pres. Hugh D. Clark stressing the need for political action.

Clark said the legislature elected in 1966, particularly the House, contained too many "anti-labor" lawmakers and consequently Iowa labor failed to advance its programs and was forced into fighting a "holding action."

"We have a potential of 400,000 votes in Iowa if our members and their families are registered and vote," Clark said. "Let's get to work and show what labor can do in the next election by electing our friends."

A resolution on social welfare called on all Iowa unions to press the state's representatives in Congress and to vote for sufficient funds to carry out Administration programs for jobs, housing and education.

The resolution also appealed to Iowa unions to "dedicate" themselves to cooperating with and assisting all federal, state and community programs that "help the poor and the underprivileged in our state."

Delegates voted to allot 1-cent per member per month, beginning Jan. 1, 1968, for a program to aid "worthy and needy" students in taking courses at Iowa University's Center for Labor & Management. The money also would permit increasing the federation's annual scholarship award from $500 to $1,500.

Resolutions adopted by the convention called for legislation to give Iowa's public employes the right to organize and bargain collectively, Hatch Act amendments to allow greater political participation by federal employes, and the closing of federal tax loopholes that benefit "only the nation's millionaires."

In major speeches, Gov. Harold E. Hughes explained the state's new tax measures adopted by the 1967 legislature, and Pres. John H. Lyons of the Iron Workers emphasized the importance of obtaining full affiliation of local unions with state and city central bodies.

Clark, Sec.-Treas. James J. Wengert, Exec. Vice Pres. J. B. Mincks, and Joseph Rajcevich and William Fenton, vice presidents at large, were elected to new two-year terms without opposition.

The three full-time offices—president, secretary-treasurer and executive vice president—were voted $1,000 a year salary increases. The president's salary will now be $11,500 and the other two officers will each receive $11,000.

'Clevelander' Magazine Focuses on City Labor

Cleveland — It's a "man-bites--dog" story when a chamber of commerce has something good to say about unions. So eyebrows were raised when the September issue of the Clevelander came off the presses.

The magazine, published by the Cleveland Chamber of Commerce, not only included pictures and friendly biographies of the city's union leaders; it carried a two-page article by the top officers of the Cleveland AFL-CIO on labor's goals.

Brown, DeAndrade Optimistic:

ITU Delegates Hear Report on Merger

Colorado Springs—Significant progress toward a merger of the Typographical Union and the Printing Pressmen—the two largest graphic arts unions—was reported to the 109th ITU convention here.

Pressmen's Pres. Anthony J. DeAndrade told the delegates he was "firmly convinced" that "many, many members" of both unions believe that their best interests can be served by merging "into one strong federation of unity, solidarity and integrity."

In his keynote address, ITU Pres. Elmer Brown described talks that have been going on between representatives of the two unions in an efforts to work out merger details.

He said the executive council of the ITU and the executive board of the Pressmen have reached "agreements" in a number of areas on a merger proposal and that conferences would continue.

Brown also reported on the progress of merger talks between the Stereotypers and the ITU. Leaders of the two unions have drawn up an outline of steps toward a possible merger.

At the request of Stereotypers' Pres. James H. Sampson a full report of the discussions was prepared for presentation to his union's next convention.

Subject to Vote

ITU laws have been amended at recent past conventions to implement the authority of the union's executive council to conduct merger negotiations. Any final merger plan, however, is subject to a referendum of ITU membership.

Executive Vice Pres. William J. Farson of the Newspaper Guild also made a strong appeal for unity among communications unions "to consolidate strength and avoid suicidal jurisdictional conflicts."

A highlight of the convention as an address by Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey, who warned that while this is the age of "unbelievable" scientific and technical progress, it does not necessarily follow that "it will be a better world in which to live."

"Will our nation," he asked, "despite advances in science and technology, be divided between a majority living in comfort, luxury, affluence — and a minority mired deeply in urban and rural poverty?

"Will we move forward to build a society where every citizen can be a full participant in our great progress?"

Among resolutions adopted by the convention were those calling for defeat of the so-called "failing newspaper" exemption from the anti-trust laws, an increase in the $600 personal income tax exemption to $1,000 and a 30-hour workweek for employes at the Government Printing Office. Another resolution strongly opposed compulsory arbitration.

Brown set ITU's present membership at 122,376 and reported that the average weekly wage of members for the past year was $146.

Curran Urges Expansion of Fishing Fleet

New York—A long-range program for building up the U.S. fishing industry has been outlined by Pres. Joseph Curran of the National Maritime Union in a 20-page illustrated booklet, "Food for the Future—the Time to Act is Now."

In sending copies of his plan to Pres. Johnson and congressional leaders, Curran emphasized the "sensational progress" the Soviet Union has made in developing fisheries and in "using the wealth of the seas to make hay among the hungry peoples of the world."

He proposed long-term, low-interest rate loans to operators for building or rehabilitating fishing vessels; a new shipyard on each coast specializing in fishing vessel construction by modern techniques, and the development of ocean fish farms in 11 areas off all coasts of mainland U.S., Alaska, Hawaii, and Puerto Rico.

Curran also called for restrictions on imports of fish and fish products which now supply 60 percent of U.S. fish consumption and contribute to the balance of payments problem; increased subsidies for construction of multi-use fishing vessels, and the development of fish protein concentrates for use in foreign aid.

Pressmen Pact at Los Angeles Times Breaks 85-Year Open Shop Pattern

Los Angeles—The Los Angeles Times, for more than 85 years a fortress of the open shop in the newspaper industry, has its first union contract. It was won by the Pressmen with help from the entire labor movement in this area.

The milestone pact, covering 450 employes for three years, includes a $6.50 weekly wage increase to $169.50, checkoff of union dues, a $7.50 weekly night differential, grievance procedure and improvements in vacations, holidays and overtime.

It provides for a 7-hour day shift, an $18,000 life insurance policy for all journeymen, and continuation of all health, welfare, pension and profit-sharing plans previously in existence.

The Pressmen's battle to win recognition at the Times goes back more than 20 years. It lost a union representation election back in 1944, and lost twice more before winning a National Labor Relations Board election in 1962, only to be decertified a year later after some 60 fruitless bargaining sessions.

That defeat, the Los Angeles County AFL-CIO charged at the time, was due to a "calculated campaign" by management to stall negotiations until it was able to "pack the election rolls" with newly-hired non-union apprentices.

Won Again

However, in March of this year the Pressmen again won an NLRB election following an intensive organizing drive. This time a contract was negotiated, and ratified by a two-to-one margin, after more than 30 tough negotiating sessions.

Pressmen's Vice Pres. Donald McCaughan, who headed the union's negotiations, described the contract as "a tribute to the perseverance of Times pressmen who were determined to get an agreement this time around."

He also gave much credit to the "invaluable assistance" of the AFL-CIO Los Angeles-Orange Counties Organizing Committee and to Sec. Sigmund Arywitz, of the Los Angeles County AFL-CIO.

Serving on the Pressmen's negotiating team were William Torrance, a union international representative and former Times employe; and an in-plant committee of John Robinson, Louis Nichols, Richard Waier, Douglas Pierce, Samuel Mallott and James Kaylor.

In Shopcrafts Dispute:

Rail Panel Drafts Final Pay Proposal

A special Presidential board prepared recommendations for settling a dispute between six shopcraft unions and the nation's railroads after receiving final arguments from both sides at a hearing in New York.

The board, created by Congress in July and headed by Sen. Wayne Morse (D-Ore.) was to submit its recommendations on Sept. 15. The recommendations, unless the parties make an agreement on their own, become binding Oct. 15. They will remain in effect until the parties reach a contract agreement or until Jan. 1, 1969, at the latest.

In the hearing held at the Bar Association headquarters in New York, attorneys for both sides set forth earlier defined positions:

• The unions, representing 137,000 workers, called for a two-year contract with a 6.5 percent general increase the first year and five percent the second, plus two annual raises of 12.5 cents each per hour for all skilled workers.

• The railroads proposed a six percent basic wage boost over 18 months. They offered only a single five-cent skill adjustment and hinged it to acceptance of a "job evaluation" study. The "study" idea was rejected by an earlier panel in the case.

Attorney Edward J. Hickey, Jr., for the unions, said that anything less than a "fair and equitable" settlement could result in a setback to all future negotiations in the industry.

He emphasized that a satisfactory settlement must provide higher pay for skilled men as well as an across-the-board raise that takes into account both rising living costs and productivity increases on railroads.

Hickey pointed out that the rates of rail journeymen and mechanics generally run from 50 cents to $1.50 an hour under the rates paid to similar employes in other industries. The present rate for skilled shopmen is $3.04 an hour.

"This board must take steps to correct these inequities," Hickey said. "Railroad workers must not be held down simply because they are railroad workers."

The carriers' main arguments, advanced by Attorney Francis J. Shea, were that the shopcrafts are not as skilled as their counterparts in other industries and that the railroads could not offer more than a five percent "pattern" increase granted other unions, covering 1967.

Hickey countered that in the past railroads had often conceded to shopcrafts' skill and had proclaimed their skills in advertisements. He accused managements of "specious arguments" in claiming there was a "pattern."

"There is no pattern settlement in this industry, except in management's mind," Hickey declared.

Board members in addition to Morse are AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, former Sen. Leverett Saltonstall (R-Mass.), Fred Kappel, retired head of the American Telephone & Telegraph Co., and Theodore Kheel, New York mediator.

Unions involved in the dispute are the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Railway Carmen, Machinists, Boilermakers, Sheet Metal Workers and Firemen & Oilers. They bargain jointly through the AFL-CIO Railway Employes Dept.

U.S. Students, Teachers Rise To Record High

Record enrollments of teachers and pupils in U.S. schools for the 23rd consecutive year were predicted by the U.S. Office of Education.

Back-to-school estimates, compiled annually around Labor Day, show a record number of teachers—2.6 million— greeting a record number of students—57.2 million.

The nation's education bill for the 1967-68 school year also will set a record, the office estimated—more than $52 billion. Some 60 million persons—more than 30 percent of the population, will be enrolled as pupils, teachers or administrators.

Higher education will show the largest percentage increase—about 6.5 million students in colleges and universities, up 8.3 percent over last year. Public colleges are expected to have 4.4 million pupils, nonpublic institutions 2.1 million.

High school enrollment—grades 9 through 12—may show a 3 percent increase from 13.3 million to 13.7 million. By schools, the estimate was for 12.3 million public schoolers, 1.4 million nonpublic.

The Office of Education said a decline in births since 1961 has slowed the pace of elementary school enrollments—kindergarten through grade 8. A gain of 1.4 percent was anticipated: from 36.5 to 37 million, with 31.8 percent of the total in public schools and 5.2 percent nonpublic.

This fall's record number of pupils will require more than 2.1 million grade and high school teachers—3.3 percent more than last year's 2.04 million.

At the college and university level, an increase of 8.3 percent is expected: from 457,000 teachers in 1966 to 495,000 now, divided as follows: public schools 273,000, nonpublic 222,000.

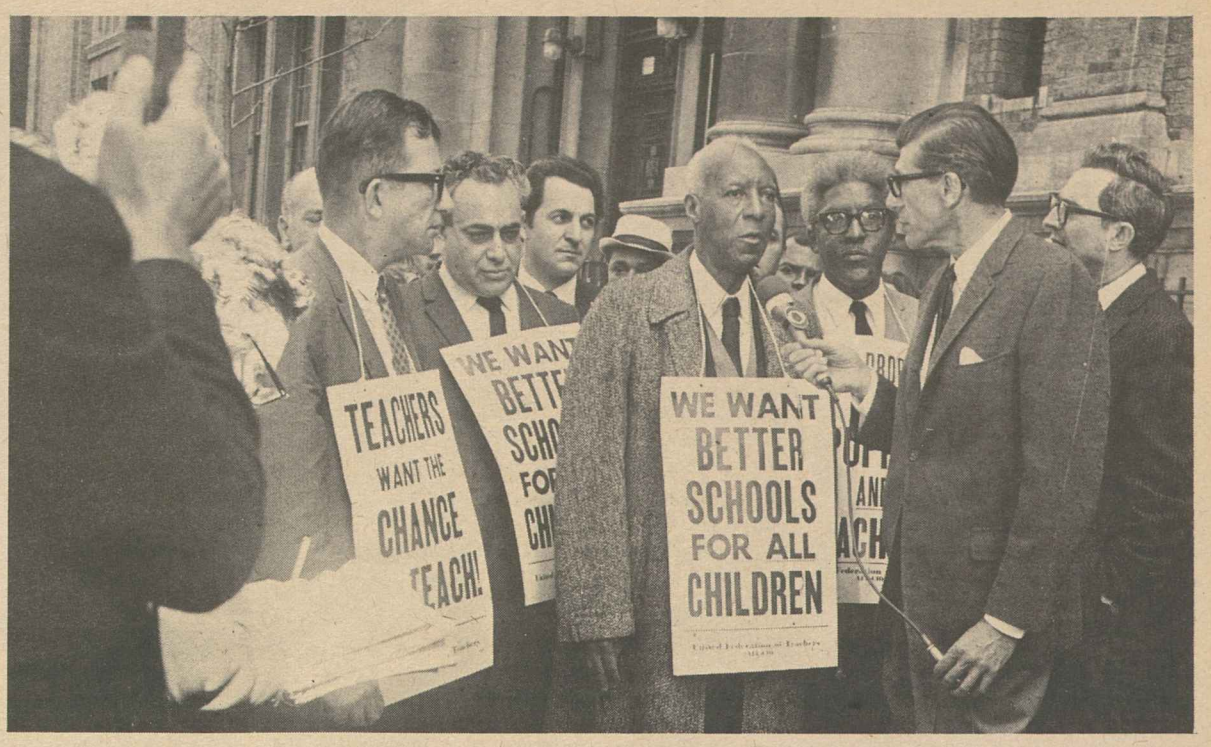
'Work' Law Drive Scored By Monroney

A right-wing petition campaign to outlaw the union shop in Oklahoma was denounced by Sen. A. S. Mike Monroney (D-Okla.) as an attack on American workers who have responded to every demand their country has made on them.

Monroney aimed his fire at the petition drive to put a new "right-to-work" proposal on a statewide ballot. Oklahomans voted on the issue three years ago—and turned it down.

Monroney had opposed the 1964 proposal and he said: "I see no reason to change my mind that Oklahoma does not need right-to-work legislation. I know Oklahomans won't support a special act which would discriminate against part of our people."

Oklahoma's other U.S. senator, Fred R. Harris, has also spoken out against the "work" petition campaign, declaring that the issue of union security should be a matter for labor-management negotiation, without government interference.



NEW YORK TEACHERS deserve community support in their effort to improve teaching conditions, AFL-CIO Vice Pres. A. Philip Randolph tells interviewer on teachers' picket line. Council Backs Teachers, Urges 'Honest, Good-Faith Bargaining' wage levels and the decent working conditions that teachers need, and the kind of effective school programs that America needs. . . .

"The path to achievement of all these goals . . . lies through honest, good faith collective bargaining negotiations."

The militant determination of union teachers to win acceptable contracts led to work stoppages by 49,000 AFT members in the New York City school system, largest in the U.S.; 15,000 in 10 Michigan school districts including Detroit; and superior contract settlements in East St. Louis, Ill., after an eight-day stoppage; Baltimore, Md., and four Michigan locations—Taylor Township, Harper Woods, Imlay City and Kellogg Community College, Battle Creek.

Detroit teachers want an across-the-board salary raise of $1,200 a year. School Supt. Norman Drachler announced the distpute will be settled by collective bargaining and not by a court injunction.

Meanwhile Gov. George Romney (R) rejected a request by the Detroit parent-teacher council for additional state aid to the schools. Providing additional funds would be to "encourage crisis bargaining in the future and that I will not do," Romney told a New York Times interviewer.

Other teacher groups not affiliated with the AFL-CIO also engaged in contract struggles—2,800 in Fort Lauderdale, Fla.; additional thousands in other Florida districts submitting resignations for use if the legislature fails to provide more money for schools; six Michigan school districts with 1,940 teachers on strike, and three others ordered back to work by a state court pending an October hearing on a permanent injunction.

Most of New York's 58,000 teachers refused to report for work on Sept. 11, scheduled opening day, after members of AFT Local 2 voted to reject a School Board offer, 12,333 to 2,523. Pickets were stationed at nearly 800 of the city's 900 schools and the city administration got a restraining order.

The teachers refused to return to classes despite an order to do so issued by State Supreme Court Justice Emilio Nunez on Sept. 13. Justice Nunez rejected the union's argument that the teachers' action in submitting mass resignations did not constitute a strike under the Taylor Act, a new state law prohibiting strikes by public employes. The union also argued that the Taylor Act cannot be invoked anyway because the Board of Education failed to live up to its provisions.

A court ruling on a contempt of court citation against union officials was being argued as the AFL-CIO News went to press. Also up for argument was a union motion that the School Board be restrained from keeping schools open in violation of its own rules and state health and safety laws.

The union is seeking a wage scale ranging from $7,500 a year for incoming teachers to $15,000 for those in the tenth year of service, plus $3,000 for those with maximum additional qualifications. A mediation panel and the school board offered lesser increases.

Other Aims

The union also wants smaller classes, a method for deciding whether disruptive pupils shall be taken out of class, reduction of teaching load, improved sick leave language and other improvements in conditions, including expansion of the union's More Effective Schools program for teaching disadvantaged children.

East St. Louis teachers reported to school Sept. 12 after a 7 a.m. meeting on a school parking lot where they approved a School Board offer of a written contract with salaries to be worked out with the aid of fact-finders.

The Baltimore School Board agreed to give 7,200 union teachers a minimum raise of $500 a year; a new salary schedule ranging in 15 steps from $6,000 to $10,300 for those with the master's degree; a grievance procedure ending in binding arbitration; a 45-minute duty-free lunch period for elementary school teachers, and no cafeteria or playground duty for others.

The Taylor, Mich., union, representing 700 Detroit suburban teachers, approved a School Board offer limiting class size to 33 in lower grades, 35 in grades 7 to 12; $700 raises for every teacher, and a grievance procedure with arbitration in the event of disputes.

Unaffiliated groups in Holland, Mich., must obey a back-to-work injunction, the Michigan State Supreme Court ruled, but the court ordered a full hearing in October on the right of teachers to withhold their services. Also affected by the order were Bay City and Saginaw teachers, but other unaffiliated groups stayed out in Birmingham, Beecher, Bloomfield Hills, Bridgeport, Dearborn Heights and River Rouge, Mich.

School Bell's Ringing

Attack on COPE Defeated:

Election Reform Bill Approved by Senate

The Senate voted 87-0 approval of an election reform bill stressing full disclosure of money contributed or spent in campaigns for the House, Senate and presidency.

The measure follows closely recommendations made by Pres. Johnson to update the 1925 Corrupt Practices Act, end the necessity for subterfuge required by long-outdated spending limits, and extend reporting requirements to cover primary as well as general election campaigns.

The Senate rejected by a decisive 46-19 vote an amendment by Sen. John J. Williams (R-Del.) which was clearly aimed at putting the AFL-CIO's Committee on Political Education out of business.

While existing law prohibits use of union and corporation treasury funds in federal political campaigns, Williams sought to bar also the use of voluntary political funds contributed by union members specifically to help labor-supported candidates.

Only 18 Republicans and 1 Democrat voted for the Williams amendment, while 9 Republicans joined 37 Democrats in opposing it.

One of the few amendments adopted prohibited political parties from "willfully and intentionally" soliciting federal employes for contributions or purchase of tickets to fund-raising dinners.

Disclosure Rejected

By a 46-42 vote, the Senate rejected an amendment by Sen. Joseph S. Clark (D-Pa.) to require members of Congress to disclose the source of their personal incomes. Senate Republican Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen (Ill.) termed the disclosure amendment "an impertinence and an outrage."

As sent to the House, the bill lifts present ceilings on spending for political campaigns—which have been for years evaded through the process of setting up numerous campaign committees, most of which are not required to file financial reports.

Instead, candidates and their supporters can spend whatever they wish but all committees spending more than $1,000 on their behalf must file a financial report, including names of contributors of $100 or more. No person, other than the candidate himself, would be able to contribute more than $5,000 to a candidate or political committee.

In other action as Congress returned from a 10-day recess:

● The Senate passed, 79-4, a federal employe "bill of rights" which had been strongly urged by unions representing government workers. It would prevent most agencies from using lie detector or psychological tests on employes, bar coercion of workers to sign up for bond or charity drives, and prohibit a broad range of invasions of privacy. Over the objections of Sen. Sam J. Ervin (D-N.C.), the bill's chief sponsor, the Senate voted to allow the Central Intelligence Agency and the National Security Agency to continue to use so-called lie detector tests. Ervin termed widespread use of polygraph devices "a 20th Century belief in witchcraft."

The bill, which now goes to the House, would set up an independent board to hear complaints of violations of privacy.

● The House Rules Committee opened hearings on the labor-supported on-site picketing bill, which Committee Chairman William M. Colmer termed "probably the most controversial" bill of the year. The bill has been approved by the House Education & Labor Committee and the Rules Committee function is only to clear it for the House floor and determine what amendments or substitute motions will be in order.

A similar bill was cleared by the Rules Committee in the 89th Congress but the then-chairman of the Labor Committee, Rep. Adam C. Powell (D-N.Y.), refused to call it up on the House floor.

Rep. Frank Thompson, Jr. (D-N.J.), floor manager of the bill, termed the legislation an important "matter of principle." It would give construction unions the right to picket a multi-employer construction site in a dispute with a subcontractor without violating Taft-Hartley's secondary boycott provisions.

● The Senate Finance Committee resumed hearings on the House-passed social security bill which labor, senior citizen groups and the Administration contend is short on benefits and burdened with punitive restrictions on welfare assistance.

● The House Post Office & Civil Service Committee tackled government pay and postal rate legislation recommended by a subcommittee.

THE GAVEL PASSES, and with it the presidency of the Asbestos Workers as Albert E. Hutchinson (right) succeeds Hugh E. Mulligan. Hutchinson, the union's secretary-treasurer since 1960, was unanimously elected president at the Chicago convention. Mulligan had filled out the term of C. W. Sickles, who retired earlier this year.

Trainmen Win Ruling On 'Local' Bargaining

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia has ruled that the Railroad Trainmen are not required to bargain nationally on the size of train and yard crews, and instead may press negotiation on a road-by-road basis.

The decision is another reversal of U.S. District Court Judge Alexander Holtzoff of Washington in a case involving a rail operating union. Last month, he was reversed in a decision against the Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen.

Arbitration Issues

Holtzoff has handled all of the litigation growing out of the compulsory arbitration award on engine, train and yard crews involving the Firemen, Trainmen, Conductors & Brakemen and Switchmen.

The award expired in January 1966 in the case of the train unions and in March 1966 in the case of the firemen. Since then, the unions have been locked in litigation, which they claim was instigated by carriers to stall negotiations.

In 1965, the Trainmen served notices on individual railroads calling for a minimum of two men in train crews in addition to the conductor. Agreements were reached on some roads; negotiations broke down on others.

After persuading Holtzoff to issue an injunction barring any strike over the dispute, a group of railroads also won a ruling that the issue must be bargained nationally —that is, by the Trainmen with all unsettled carriers as a group.

The union argued that national bargaining was not required under the Railway Labor Act, that the history of crew consist (the size of train crews) had been one of "local" bargaining and that past government boards had specified it should be negotiated in that way.

When the union appealed the case, the Justice Dept. took its side, filing briefs with the appeals court to contend that the law does not require national handling.

A three-judge appeals court panel found that Holtzoff's injunction was "improper" because it was based on an "unsupportable" premise that the union's refusal to go to national handling was a violation of its "statutory obligations."

Judge Harold Leventhal, writing the decision, said that it would "require a strong showing of continuous collective bargaining on a national scale" on a particular issue before a court could construe such bargaining as being required.

Such is not the case here, he pointed out. Noting that "thousands of crew consist agreements have been negotiated at the local level" in the past and that government boards held that this was proper, he added:

"The history and realities of crew consist bargaining in this industry impel the conclusion that mass handling was not required by the statute."

Asbestos Union Votes Increase In Per Capita

Chicago—An increase of 50 cents in monthly membership per capita payments was approved by 335 delegates to the 21st and largest convention of the Asbestos Workers. The increase will go into the union's general fund.

Delegates also approved a one-time per capita tax of 25 cents to launch a health hazard program. Local unions will also pay 50 cents more a year per member to finance the Asbestos Worker, official publication of the union.

Nine vice presidents were elected on the final day of the convention. John Quinn of Chicago Local 17 was elected vice president at-large. Michael Nichols was elected vice president from Canada. Others elected are Jacob Novak, James Hulhern, James Tuten, Gerald O'Brien, Robert Scott, Frank Calegory and William Bernard.

Earlier, the delegates elected Albert E. Hutchinson as president and Andrew T. Haas as secretary-treasurer. Hutchinson previously was secretary-treasurer; Haas was a vice president. Officers will serve five year terms, until the next convention.

13 Charged with Threats To Mississippi Negroes

The Justice Dept. has filed suit against 13 persons in Noxubee County, Miss., including the sheriff and other law enforcement officials. They are charged with having threatened parents of Negro children with physical harm and loss of jobs for enrolling their children in previously all-white schools.

LBJ Names Task Force to Review Labor Relations in Federal Service

Pres. Johnson promised a new look at union-management relations in the federal civil service.

He set up a high-level committee, headed by Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, to study proposals for improving collective bargaining within the government in light of five years of experience under a 1962 executive order.

The President asked the committee to consult with unions and other interested parties and to report its findings and recommendations "as soon as practicable."

The AFL-CIO Executive Council earlier this year had called for "revision of the federal government's labor-management relations program to insure genuine collective bargining." It noted the "substantial gains" in union membership and contracts with federal agencies but said experience under the executive order has uncovered "deficiencies" that should be corrected.

Likewise, Johnson cited the progress that has been made, including exclusive union representation of more than 1 million federal workers.

"Nevertheless," the President added, "as the program has matured and grown there is increasing evidence that some of the arrangements devised for a fledgling operation are no longer suitable."

To conduct a "public review" of the program, Johnson in effect reconstituted the task force named by the late Pres. Kennedy in 1961 which drew up the original executive order.

As before, it is headed by the secretary of labor and includes the secretary of defense, the postmaster general, the budget director, the chairman of the Civil Service Commission and a key member of the White House staff, in this case Joseph A. Califano, Jr.

Johnson made it clear that there is no thought of withdrawing or weakening the union recognition policy.

He said the Civil Service Commission reports that union recognition has been helpful to workers and management alike. Federal agencies, the President said, cite "marked improvement in communication with employes and significant benefits in such areas as safety practices, tours of duty, health, general working conditions and grievance handling."

He told heads of government agencies "to cooperate fully" with the review committee.

E. C. Hallbeck, chairman of the AFL-CIO Government Employes Council, welcomed the review. He said experience has demonstrated weaknesses in the present program which can be remedied "only through substantial changes in the executive order or action by Congress."

Guild Fund to Finance 2 New Press Councils

Two southern Illinois towns will have community press councils to develop better understanding between newspapers and readers—thanks to a fund administered by the Newspaper Guild.

The fund was established with money left to the Guild in the will of the late Lowell Mellett, editor and columnist. The latest of a series of grants will go to the chairman of the journalism department at Southern Illinois University to set up community press councils in Cairo and Sparta.

UPWA Gains Wage Hikes At Swift Plants

Chicago — The Packinghouse Workers reached agreement with Swift & Co. on terms of a new three-year contract shortly before a strike deadline and sent it to the membership for a vote on ratification.

The new pact, similar to those agreed upon with other major meat firms several months ago, provides wage hikes of 12 cents an hour retroactive to Mar. 13, another 11-cent increase next year and an additional 11 cents in 1969 for a total of 34 cents.

UPWA officers said they expect the union's 8,000 members at 18 Swift plants in 13 states to approve the proposed settlement. Under it, several hundred workers at the Wilson, N.C., plant will get raises of 60 cents or more an hour to correct geographical inequities. An additional 12 cents an hour will go to a large number of skilled and semi-skilled workers under the new terms, the union said.

Fill Social Security Gaps, Meany Urges

Condemns House Cuts In Welfare

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany called on the Senate to plug the big gaps in the House-passed social security bill and to rescind "drastic" cutbacks in medical aid and "harsh and punitive restrictions aimed at destitute mothers and children receiving public assistance."

Meany talked to the members of the Senate Finance Committee of the people behind the statistics.

He spoke of the retired workers living on social security checks that "have lagged far behind the rise in living costs, to say nothing of the better living standards most Americans enjoy."

Their contributions during their working lives, Meany said, entitle them to "decent payments" and "to escape from their dreary lives of want and deprivation."

The AFL-CIO was "shocked," Meany said, when the House turned down Pres. Johnson's request to raise the minimum retirement benefit from a "pitiful" $44 to $70 and to give long-service workers with more than 25 years of coverage at least $100 a month. The House bill would raise the minimum single benefit only to $50, with no higher floor for long-service workers.

"If a social security system does not help those at the bottom most, it is not advancing what should be one of its major goals," he said.

'Upside-Down'

Meany took sharp issue with the House decision not to extend medicare to disabled workers under 65, as recommended by Pres. Johnson.

"The House report on the bill argues that because the disabled are a high-cost group they shouldn't be covered. I think that is putting things upside-down. It is precisely because of the high costs the disabled have to bear to obtain needed medical care out of their very meager incomes that they should be covered under medicare."

The needed improvements, Meany said, could be financed by raising the wage base for social security taxes paid by workers and their employers. The projected rise to a $7,600 base in the House bill, smaller than the gradual step-up to $10,800 asked by the Administration, "puts a disproportionate burden on low-income workers."

At the same time it "puts an unduly low ceiling on the benefits paid to moderate or high-wage workers, thus forcing them to suffer drastic reductions in their living standards when they retire."

Meany stressed, however, that future improvements in social

Senate Restores Slashes In Model Cities, Rent Aid

THE SHOW didn't go on as usual at New York's famed Radio City Music Hall. Instead, precision Rockettes, ballet dancers and singers joined picket lines as part of the Variety Artists' first strike at the Music Hall in its 35-year history. The performers seek sizable increases in a scale that runs from $99 to $126.50 after three years with no pay for rehearsal times. Their contract expired June 30.

Rat Control Shift Voted By House

By David L. Perlman

The Senate voted to restore most of the deep slashes made by the House in programs to salvage the nation's cities, and the House backtracked—after a blast of public outrage—from its earlier rejection of federal funds for rat control.

Both developments raised hopes that a start will be made this year on the "great national effort" the AFL-CIO has declared is essential to meet the nation's urban crisis.

Rejecting budget-cutting amendments by big margins, the Senate voted $300 million more than the House had appropriated for the model cities program. It also approved the full $40 million the President asked for rent supplements.

The battle over appropriations for the two programs now moves to a House-Senate conference committee.

Last May, the House knocked out all new money for rent supplements—a program to allow low-income families to live in modest apartments built by nonprofit organizations. Families pay one-fourth of their income in rent. The federal subsidy would pay the balance. The House allowed only $5 million to fulfill rent contracts already signed.

The House bill also allocated only $237 million of the $662 million Pres. Johnson sought for the model cities program. Some 200 cities have already drawn up ambitious blueprints for rehabilitating entire neighborhoods — if federal funds are available.

UFT Sets Ratification Vote:

Teachers Reach Agreements In Detroit, New York Disputes

By Eugene A. Kelly

School Board agreements to provide improvements for both students and teachers ended a two-week contract dispute involving 11,000 union teachers in Detroit and signaled the end of an eight-day "stayout" by the 49,000-member New York local of the American Federation of Teachers.

Detroit teachers reported for classroom duty after voting to ratify a two-year contract. Major improvements included a $1,700 salary increase in two equal yearly steps, and class size reductions in 50 ghetto schools to no more than 30 in primary grades from kindergarten through the third.

Details of the New York pact were not available as the AFL-CIO News went to press. The union, said, however, that city and school officials made commitments on reducing class overcrowding, treatment of disruptive children, expansion of the More Effective Schools program in deprived areas and raising annual wage schedules $150 above the offer previously rejected by union members.

Pres. Albert Shanker of the New York AFT local said many details remain to be ironed out in negotiations that continued at Gracie Mansion, residence of Mayor John V. Lindsay (R). Meanwhile members of the Assistant Principals' Association, unaffiliated, picketed the School Board to protest the city's attempts to run its 900 schools with volunteer teachers and picket-line-crashers. School officials then advised pupils to stay away until teachers vote on ratification, set for Sept. 24.

The New York teachers had voted to turn in their resignations pending agreement by school officials to provide acceptable classroom conditions and additional help for the children of the ghettos through a program pioneered by Local 2 and the parent AFT.

Tentative agreement was reached after a final negotiating session that lasted 27 hours. Lindsay called off a trip to Washington for a meeting of the President's Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders, and stayed close to the contract talks.

New York, like Detroit, must

NAM, Chamber Stump For Anti-Union Laws

The nation's two biggest employer organizations—the National Association of Manufacturers and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce—are beating the drums for legislation to curb unions.

Their joint theme is that unions are "too big and too strong" and the National Labor Relations Board is "pro-union."

Both groups are taking traveling shows of management-oriented "labor relations" experts to cities throughout the nation.

The U.S. Chamber is holding 12 "labor law reform workshops" during September. The announced goal is "to intensify grass roots support for a general overhaul of labor laws."

A companion effort by the NAM features industrial relations clinics in 11 other cities during October and November. The NAM clinics will be conducted by Charles A. Kothe, author of an NAM-distributed book, "Industrial Freedom in the Non-Union Plant."

At each of its clinics, the NAM announcement says, "the off-the-record session will provide an op-

Rail Panel Recommends 11% Raise, Skill Boost

By Duane Emme

A five-member Presidential board has unanimously recommended an 11 percent wage boost for 137,000 railroad shopcraft workers over two years, plus skill increases for nearly three-fourths of their number.

The latter raises—amounting to 20 cents an hour in four steps—are designed to bring the pay of 100,000 skilled rail employes more nearly in line with comparable skilled craftsmen in other industries, the board said.

The recommendations covering workers in six unions become effective Oct. 15, unless the parties reach a voluntary settlement in the interim. If imposed, the terms will remain in effect until Jan. 1, 1969.

Pres. Johnson called the report of the panel, headed by Sen. Wayne Morse (D-Ore.), "one of look to state authorities for the additional money needed to meet school obligations. Before the Detroit contract settlement, Michigan Gov. George Romney (R) rejected a request by the Detroit parent-teacher council for additional state aid to the schools, saying that would "encourage crisis bargaining."

Teacher refusals to report for work still delayed school opening in 10 Michigan school districts. AFT locals remain out in Dearborn, Hamtramck, Highland Park, North Dearborn Heights, and at Henry Ford Community College and Lake Michigan College. Unaffiliated groups continued stayouts in Bloomfield Hills, Bridgeport, Crestwood and Menominee, Mich.

In East St. Louis, teachers returned to school Sept. 12 after accepting a School Board offer of a written contract, with salaries to be worked out after a factfinding committee reports.

In Detroit, reduction in maximum class sizes was a major item in union efforts to improve the quality of education for the city school system's 300,000 pupils.

Teachers submitted their resignations and stayed out of class until the Board agreed to changes including a reduction from 40 weeks to 39 in the length of the work year, except to make up for lost time.

Class sizes will be evaluated by a review board set up in consultation with the union. Classes larger than 39 this year and 38 next year will be adjusted after notice to the appeal board. The limitation agreement is "the most thrilling thing" Detroit teachers ever achieved, local Pres. Mary Ellen Riordan told newsmen.

Contract agreements in Detroit, New York and East St. Louis, Ill., came shortly after the AFL-CIO Executive Council pledged the labor movement to support the AFT and declared the path to better schools is reached not through court injunctions but through "honest good-faith collective bargaining."

Delegates from AFT locals reported on school needs at their 51st convention, held last month in Washington, D. C. The convention debated the causes of ghetto uprisings in Detroit, Newark and other cities, and concluded that more federal funds are needed to improve schools and public housing, provide more job opportunities and strengthen the National Teacher Corps program.

Last year the AFT, surveying teacher salaries, called for an immediate $5,000-a-year wage increase to bring school salaries up to the level of other professional employes. The survey showed that the average U. S. teacher is paid $6,820 a year, well below averages for other white-collar professionals, the union said.

Non-Compliance Ruling Names Air Line Pilots

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has notified affiliates that the Air Line Pilots Association has again been found to be in non-compliance with the decision of an impartial umpire under the AFL-CIO's internal disputes procedures.

The finding was reached by a subcommittee of the AFL-CIO Executive Council consisting of Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler and Vice Presidents Hunter P. Wharton and Joseph D. Keenan.

Meany said the non-compliance finding was based on a complaint by the Flight Engineers Intl. Association involving Trans World Airlines and Pan American World Airways.

The Pilots previously had been found in violation of the no-raiding Article XXI of the constitution in an Eastern Air Lines dispute, also involving the Flight Engineers.

Thus, Meany noted, the ALPA is already subject to the following provisions of Sec. 15 of Article XXI:

"1. The non-complying affiliate shall not be entitled to file any complaint or appear in a complaining capacity in any proceeding under this article until such non-compliance is remedied or excused as provided in Sec. 16.

"2. The federation shall, upon request, supply every appropriate assistance and aid to any organization resisting the action determined to be in violation of this article.

"3. The federation shall appropriately publicize the fact that the affiliate is not in compliance with the constitution.

"4. No affiliate shall support or render assistance to the action determined to be in violation of this article."

CONVENTION

The AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept. has changed the date of its 1967 convention in Bal Harbour, Fla., from Dec. 4 and 5 to Nov. 27 and 28, it was announced.

LBJ Names Abel To UN Delegation

Pres. Johnson has named I. W. Abel, president of the Steelworkers and a vice president of the AFL-CIO, as an alternate U.S. representative to the United Nations General Assembly.

The United States delegation, consisting of five delegates, five alternates and two senior advisers, is headed by Ambassador Arthur J. Goldberg.

Abel is the third trade unionist to represent the United States at the United Nations. Previously AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Vice Pres. George M. Harrison have served as delegates.

Pan Am Strike Halted on Bid Of Mediators

The Railway & Airline Clerks called off a strike of 7,000 ticket sellers, office clerks and cargo handlers on Pan American Airways, world's largest airline with a reported 25,000 employes and numerous overseas flights.

Acting at the request of Chairman Howard G. Gamser of the National Mediation Board, the union agreed to remove picket lines at 13 gateway cities and maintain the status quo while the NMB attempts further mediation. The agreement came, the union said, before court papers were served in a back-to-work injunction secured by Pan Am.

Union Pres. C. L. Dennis had set midnight Sept. 19 as a strike deadline at Pan Am, where contracts expired Mar. 16. Members there have been unable to get wage or contract improvements for more than two years, the union said, because of attempted raids on the clerks' membership by the expelled Teamsters and company refusal to negotiate new contracts.

After the contracts expired, the air line refused to bargain on the ground that it was in doubt about the legal bargaining agent, the union said. The clerks refused to participate in two elections held last year. They charged fraud in the first election, and the ballots were not counted. A second election was voided also by the NMB, and a third vote was scheduled later this year on a date not yet announced.

The NMB set the second election aside when AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Dennis charged fraudulent letters had been sent to Pan Am over their purported signatures, and asked an investigation by the Dept. of Justice and postal authorities.

To Curb Housing, Jury Bias:

Labor Reaffirms Rights Bill Support

Discrimination in housing and in the administration of justice has created "long standing inequities" that must be eliminated, AFL-CIO Associate Gen. Counsel Thomas E. Harris told a Senate Judiciary subcommittee.

Harris testified in support of the Administration's 1967 civil rights bill, which would outlaw racial discrimination in the sale and rental of housing and the make-up of juries.

It also would strengthen enforcement of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 by empowering the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission to issue court-enforceable "cease and desist" orders to halt job discrimination.

The measure would provide new curbs on those who attempt to harm or intimidate anyone lawfully exercising federally-protected civil rights. It would extend for five years the U.S. Civil Rights Commission, slated to expire Jan. 31, 1968.

Harris recalled that the legislation is "much the same" as the Administration's 1966 civil rights bill, which passed the House only to be stalled in the Senate by a filibuster.

A solid majority of the Senate then demonstrated its support of the civil rights measure by voting for cloture, but the majority was short of the two-thirds vote needed to limit debate and the bill died.

"We were for the bill last year, and we are for it now," Harris said. "Nothing in the intervening twelve months has diminished the need for this bill, while much that has happened has re-emphasized the need."

The AFL-CIO deeply regrets, he continued, that last year's filibuster prevented enactment, "thereby further delaying long overdue alleviation of grievous wrongs."

Harris said that the AFL-CIO "strongly supports" the guarantees for equal access to housing contained in the bill. He did not go into detail because AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany testified at length in August in support of the same proposal before a Senate Housing subcommittee.

On selecting juries, Harris said there is strong need to outlaw discrimination against Negroes and women as well as against persons in low income groups.

He said that the legislation could "go further" by prescribing state court jury qualifications in addition to those that would apply to federal juries. The U.S. Supreme Court, he pointed out, has made it clear the federal government has great power in this area under the 14th Amendment to the Constitution.

Harris also voiced labor's support for provisions authorizing the attorney general to bring court action for preventive relief where he has "reasonable grounds to believe" that the prohibition against discrimination has been or is about to be violated.

All told, Harris said, the legislation's provision to end jury discrimination "represents a substantial advance" over the present situation.

He also proposed strengthening the section that would make it a federal crime to intimidate or harm persons exercising their civil rights. He said emphasis should be on "intent" to do harm instead of requiring a proof of "willful" action as defined in the Senate bill and a bill that passed the House last month.

While advocating these and several other technical changes in the Administration bill, Harris made it clear that labor fully supports the measure "in general."

"We think the legislation provides constructive and effective cures for the evils with which it deals, and we urge its enactment," he emphasized.

George T. Brown Dies, Held AFL-CIO Posts

George T. Brown, deputy director of the Bureau of Labor Standards and a former assistant to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, died at his home in Garrett Park, Md. He was 60.

Brown had served in a number of trade union and government posts before joining the Bureau of Labor Standards in 1961 with major responsibilities for occupational safety and child labor programs and policies.

In a wire to his widow, Meany expressed the federation's shock and said he "was a warm and kindly man, a genuine trade unionist and an exemplary public servant."

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz said Brown had made "a major contribution toward insuring safer and more decent conditions for working people." His legacy, Wirtz said, "is the better lives we all enjoy because of these efforts."

Born in Baltimore, he attended Johns Hopkins University and received a doctor's degree in political economy in 1934. After a career as a professor at Seton Hall College and Catholic University he served in the office of the War Labor Board during World War II.

From 1946 to 1951 he was director of research for the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters and in 1951-52 executive assistant to the labor members of the Wage Stabilization Board. After service as executive assistant to Labor Sec. Martin P. Durkin he became an assistant to Meany.

At the merger of the AFL and CIO he became director of the Dept. of Intl. Affairs and later executive secretary of the AFL-CIO Standing Committee on Occupational Safety & Health.

Brown was secretary-treasurer of the Intl. Association of Government Labor Officials at the time of his death.

He is survived by his wife, Ann Brown, long active in labor and political affairs in Maryland, five children and two grandchildren.

Funeral services were scheduled for 10 a.m., Sept. 23 at Holy Cross Church in Kensington, Md.

the finest products that any board has produced."

Board members in addition to Morse are AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, former Sen. Leverett Saltonstall (R-Mass.), Fred Kappel, retired head of the American Telephone & Telegraph Co., and Theodore Kheel, New York mediator.

Unions involved in the dispute, are the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Railway Carmen, Machinists, Boilermakers, Sheet Metal Workers and Firemen & Oilers. They bargain jointly through the AFL-CIO Railway Employes Dept.

Six percent of the general pay increase recommended by the board would be retroactive to Jan. 1, 1967, and another 5 percent would be effective July 1, 1968. The 20 cents skill pay would be granted in five cent increments effective last April 1, Oct. 1, April 1, 1968, and Oct. 1, 1968.

The board also recommended that the Labor Dept. make a detailed study of the skilled wage differential issue by next Sept. 1 to furnish data for further bargaining between the parties.

Negotiators for the unions said they were willing to write the board's recommendations into an agreement and immediately called upon the carriers to "return to the bargaining table" for that purpose.

IBEW Vice Pres. Thomas Ramsey, spokesman for the shopcrafts, said that "the determination of the board does not fully satisfy the shopmen's needs" but the report "is what could be reasonably expected under the restrictions imposed by the special legislation."

"There never has been any doubt of the justice of the shopmen's position," he added. "The board recognized this fact by its unanimous vote."

However, John P. Hiltz, Jr., carriers' chief negotiator, attacked the recommendations and indicated that the railroads may challenge them in court arguing that the board had exceeded its legal authority.

Hiltz charged that the report was "inflationary" and came as a "tremendous surprise" to the carriers.

To this, Ramsey retorted: "Apparently the carrier representatives are upset by the unanimous determination of the compulsory arbitration board which they helped to create."

The board was set up by a law passed in July to end a series of strikes by shopcraft workers. The unions and the AFL-CIO had strongly opposed the measure, while the railroads pressed for enactment of compulsory arbitration.

An earlier panel, headed by retired U.S. Appeals Court Judge Charles Fahy, had recommended an 18-month pact with a six percent general wage boost and three five-cent skill increases.

During unsuccessful attempts by the board to mediate the dispute and at later hearings, the unions called for a two-year contract with a 6.5 percent general increase the first year and five percent the second, plus 25 cents in skill increases.

The railroads proposed a six percent basic wage increase over 18 months, and one five-cent skill adjustment hinged to a "job evaluation" study.

The law creating the board specified that it recommend terms that were in the public interest, within the limits of bargaining and mediation in the case and in compliance with the Railway Labor Act.

In releasing the recommendations, Morse said that the board had met these requirements and he was confident the proposal would be approved by the courts, should the carriers challenge it.

He said the general wage increase totaling 11 percent was "a just and equitable middle ground" between the parties and that the skill increase of 20 cents was "completely justified" since shopmen lag even further behind than that in comparison to rates paid in other industries.

Although Kappel signed the report, he later told newsmen he was "very dissatisfied" with it. Asked then why he signed it, he claimed "there was nothing to be accomplished by not signing it."

NABET Continues Network Talks

New York—More than 2,400 members of the Broadcast Employes stayed on the job at National Broadcasting Co. and American Broadcasting Co. stations coast to coast while their negotiators remained here for further contract talks with management at the request of Dir. William E. Simkin of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service.

Earlier settlement proposals by the two networks were rejected in a secret-ballot referendum among NABET members. The vote to reject was 889-332 at NBC and 987-177 at ABC. Current contracts were due to expire last Apr. 1 but were extended to Sept. 1 while the union headed off an attempted raid by the expelled Teamsters.

Students Score Lindsay On Bid for 'Volunteers'

New York—Thirty one officers of student organizations issued a statement here backing the teachers' union and deploring Mayor Lindsay's appeal for student volunteer teachers as a "form of strikebreaking."

In a statement made public by the United States Youth Council, the youth leaders "strongly urged" college students not to cooperate with the Board of Education in the teachers' stay-out. They said it is "reprehensible that the school and city administrations are attempting to manipulate the idealism of students . . ."

The mass action of the United Federation of Teachers in picketing for acceptable contract terms is "a justifiable means of protest in behalf of legitimate demands for school improvements," they said, adding: "We believe that college students should not side with the educational bureaucracy and City Hall" on behalf of the status quo.

The signers included student body presidents at Columbia and New York universities; Brooklyn, Hunter and Queens colleges, and Union Theological Seminary.

LABOR'S CASE for higher social security benefits and elimination of harsh restrictions imposed by the House on public assistance and medicaid programs was presented by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany at Senate hearings. Listening intently to a question from a senator are, from left, Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller, Meany, and Social Security Dir. Bert Seidman.

Meany Calls on Senate to Bolster Weak House Social Security Bill

security should come from general revenues and not from a further increase in the social security tax.

He sharply attacked the ceilings the House put on medicaid—the matching federal funds available to states to provide medical services to families which otherwise could not afford them.

If the House provision stays in, a number of states will have to deprive families in the lower middle income bracket of eligibility for medicaid benefits.

Medicaid's Purpose

"Medicaid was never thought to be confined to just the poorest families receiving public assistance," Meany said. "It was intended to meet the medical needs of . . . people who can afford to meet everyday living costs but not the added costs of proper medical care."

The House bill, he charged, "makes medicaid just another charity medical program."

Meany leveled his sharpest attack on the public assistance provisions of the bill—a part of the social security act although the money does not come from the social security tax.

The President's proposals would have required states to set benefit levels not less than their own standards for minimum subsistence. It would also have offered child care and job training through the Labor Dept. for mothers on welfare.

The House bill scrapped minimum benefit standards, put work training under the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare and made it compulsory for mothers, while an accompanying report suggested that private employers could provide work training if they were allowed to pay sub-minimum wages. It also set a ceiling on the number of children for assistance under the Aid to Dependent Children program.

Meany termed it "shocking" that the House took out its annoyance at high welfare costs on "innocent . . . needy small children." He praised the concept of meaningful job training—"for those who can and should be trained for work." But there are some mothers, he stressed, who "because of either family conditions or personal limitations would do much better to stay home and take care of their children." And he warned that "adequate day care facilities with properly trained staff" can't be set up overnight.

Present welfare rules "often force fathers to desert so that their families can obtain assistance," Meany pointed out.

He termed the punitive sections of the House bill a "backward step" containing "the seeds for continued deprivation, misery and unrest for decades into the future."

The nation's unfortunate, Meany said, "deserve our help—the most, not the least we can afford—because they are fellow human beings in distress."

Pittsburgh Unions Protest Color Bar

Pittsburgh—The AFL-CIO Allegheny County Labor Council has voted not to use any facilities of the Moose, Eagles and Elk lodges here as long as the three organizations continue policies of racial discrimination.

The boycott was approved at the September meeting of the 90,000-member ACLC in response to an appeal from the Catholic Interracial Council which pointed out that each organization has race restrictions in its membership qualifications.

Auto Union, GM Talks Focus on Local Issues

Detroit—The Auto Workers, frustrated in their efforts to get any Big Three auto manufacturer into serious negotiations on national contract issues, announced an agreement with General Motors to concentrate for a time on local-plant issues.

In the first meeting with GM bargainers since the UAW struck Ford Motor Co. Sept. 6, company and management negotiators agreed to send representatives into the field for local-level talks in 16 U.S. areas.

The talks are aimed at preventing or reducing strikes over local issues—working standards, plant conditions and the like—after national issues are settled. Such strikes delayed final settlements in 1964, 1961 and 1958. Negotiators concentrated on the major issues and later found many unresolved local issues, the union said.

The strike by 160,000 auto workers shut down Ford plants in 25 states. Chrysler and GM plants continued to produce autos, but the two managements refused to extend union contracts.

Ford and the UAW resumed national bargaining about a week after the strike started, but only on non-economic issues. GM then came back to the main negotiating table and Chrysler representatives returned for subcommittee meetings. Main-table talks are expected the week of Sept. 24—not at Chrysler offices but in a hotel near UAW headquarters.

Dir. Leonard Woodcock of the union's GM Dept. returned from meetings with local and regional UAW leaders to report some GM plants working seven days a week and hiring stepped up—an indication, Woodcock said, that GM aims at full production while Ford remains closed. Similar reports were made by Chrysler local leaders, the union said.

Meanwhile Ford strikers took turns on the picket line and drew their first strike benefit checks of $20 to $30 a week. The UAW executive board met here to draft proposals for a dues increase to finance the Ford strike. The proposals will be presented to the special UAW convention that will meet here Oct. 8.

Identical Offers

Ford, GM and Chrysler made identical offers to the union in contract negotiations that began July 10. The UAW said the proposed wage increase would have added only 1 cent an hour in "new" money for the first year of a three-year contract, plus other improvements the UAW called "inadequate and inequitable." Union leaders decided to concentrate on Ford instead of striking all three firms.

Textile Workers Elect New Vice President

Atlantic City—Charles Lazzio, Paterson, N.J., has been elected a vice president of the Textile Workers Union of America.

Lazzio, president of TWUA's Local 1733 in Paterson, was chosen by the union's executive board to fill a vacancy created by the retirement of Vice Pres. Michael J. Schoonjans of Biddeford, Me.

Teachers and Schools

ALL OF US who have children in the public schools owe a debt of thanks to the teachers manning picket lines in several communities across the continent. They are fighting battles that have to be fought. Our battles.

The striking teachers want to improve our schools. They want a greater voice in setting educational policies. They are fighting for smaller classes, better facilities, more up-to-date textbooks. That is our fight, too.

The striking teachers want to improve their own working conditions and salaries. They want grievance procedures and protection from arbitrary discipline. That is our fight, too.

Finally, the teachers want the right to work for better schools and better conditions through the collective bargaining process. Certainly, that is our fight, too.

TWO YEARS AGO, the U.S. Labor Dept.'s Monthly Labor Review published a revealing study of how various occupations rank in annual earnings.

At the top of the 321 occupations were physicians, bankers, managers, judges, lawyers and pilots. High school teachers ranked 117th. Further down the list, following stenographers, postal clerks, secretaries and mail carriers, came elementary school teachers, 168th in salary ranking.

Our system demands a lot of teachers. They are required to go through years of special training in college and, often, in graduate school. They are expected to take refresher courses regularly. They are given responsibility for educating our children, for helping to improve their manners and mold their characters. Yet, teachers are expected to be satisfied with a salary that ranks 168th.

We think there is something wrong with the scale of values that places teachers so low on the economic totem pole. That's why we believe that the American Federation of Teachers is doing us all a service in leading the fight for better schools and better salaries and working conditions for teachers.

THE AFL-CIO Executive Council has urged trade union members everywhere to support the American Federation of Teachers in its fight for better schools. The Council added:

"We say to the Boards of Education and the local and state officials that their use of court injunctions will not educate children, will not provide the better school systems we need, will not solve the problems of neglected youngsters of the ghettos and will not provide the wage levels and the decent working conditions that teachers need and the kind of effective school programs that America needs.

"We say to these officials, that the path to achievement of all of these goals, to which the AFL-CIO and the American Federation of Teachers are dedicated, lies through honest, good faith collective bargaining negotiations."

We hope the city fathers are listening.

State Programs Lax:

Strong Meat Inspection Law Held Vital to Extend Protection

The following analysis of meat inspection legislation has been excerpted from a leaflet prepared by the Meat Cutters & Butcher Workmen. Copies can be obtained from the union at 100 Indiana Avenue NW, Washington, D.C. 20001.

THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES will soon consider new legislation to govern the inspection of meat for wholesomeness and cleanliness. The House will be faced with a choice between:

1—HR 12144, a weak, inadequate bill approved by the Agriculture Committee, and

2—HR 12145, a strong effective measure to extend the coverage of the federal meat inspection program.

Most consumers believe they are fully protected concerning the sanitation and wholesomeness of meat and meat products. Unfortunately, this is not the case. Some 16 percent — or 5.3 billion pounds — of meat slaughtered in the U.S. annually, and some 26 percent — or 7.6 billion pounds —of meat processed into sausages and other products are outside the protective framework of federal meat inspection.

The federal program is limited in coverage because the 61-year old Meat Inspection Act provides it with authority only over plants selling across state lines.

Some state inspection programs do exist. But most of these have lax standards, weak enforcement and are under-financed and undermanned. Few provide any meaningful protection. In fact, 24 states have no mandatory meat inspection program at all.

Both a 1962 and a current Dept. of Agriculture survey show unspeakable conditions of filth and bad meat in many uninspected and state-inspected plants. Here are a few of the less horrifying quotes:

"Examination of these meats revealed a mouldy and slimy condition with a putrid odor. Several dead flies were seen on the surface and mixed in with the meat. These items were to be used in the manufacture of sausage items and hamburger. . . ."

"In addition to the very grave and urgent problems posed by the distribution of food derived from diseased animals, the attached report details extremely bad and revolting dirty food handling methods without any regard for rudimentary sanitation . . . Rodents and insects, in fact any vermin, had free access to stored meats and meat products ingredients. . . ."

Because it was enacted so long ago, the Meat Inspection Act of 1906 has still another problem: many of its provisions are outdated. It does not give federal meat inspection enough authority.

The House Agriculture Committee has approved HR 12144. Its provisions are good as far as they go. They would update the Meat Inspection Act to provide federal inspectors more authority to meet modern problems.

But it would do little, if anything, about the basic and most important problem of meat inspection today: it would not extend the coverage of federal meat inspection to the large uninspected or state-inspected plants. It is therefore a halfway measure.

Instead, HR 12144 would try to buy the states into enacting programs which are "consistent with" the federal inspection system. It would pay 50 percent of the cost of the state programs. But it would not require the states to pass good inspection laws.

Obviously, this is a great flaw in HR 12144. It would not protect the consumer adequately.

LED BY Representatives Neal Smith of Iowa and Thomas S. Foley of Washington, six congressmen have introduced HR 12145 to provide better consumer protection. Their measure includes all of the provisions of the subcommittee's bill, but it would add the following two:

(a) All meat plants which have more than $250,000 gross annual sales would be inspected by the federal meat inspection program. (As a result, some 97 percent of meat slaughtered would be federally inspected.)

(b) Newly inspected plants would be allowed to meet construction requirements of the federal meat grading program for the first five years. Then the plant construction standards of the federal inspection program would have to be followed.

The Smith-Foley bill would truly protect consumers. It would both increase the coverage of federal inspection and modernize the program.

Obviously, the enactment of the bill involves a difficult fight. It faces great, strong and rich opposition.

Please urge your organization's members to write, wire and contact their U.S. representatives to support HR 12145, the Smith-Foley bill, when the House considers meat inspection legislation.

Foot-in-Mouth Disease:

Contradictions, Policy Switches Romney's Political Trademark

The following is excerpted from the Sept. 18, 1967, issue of Memo from COPE, published by the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education.

IN RECENT MONTHS, George Romney has darted hither and yon on Viet Nam policy, saying one thing one day, another thing the next. To explain his failure to settle down to one line, he finally claimed he was "brainwashed" when he visited Viet Nam in 1965.

His series of statements, corrections and explanations is nothing more than a new attack of an ailment that apparently has plagued the Michigan governor for years. Indeed, it predates his plunge into political waters.

It is hard to tell, for example, if as recently as the spring of 1959 he was a Republican, a Democrat, both or neither. He wrote in the Spring 1959 edition of the Michigan State University publication, Business Topics, to this effect:

"Economic motives have corrupted both political parties to the point where they are largely duplicates of each other and are devoid of differences based on political, social or broad economic principles."

This sounds like a repudiation of both the Democratic and Republican parties. Yet, less than a year later, Romney discovered he could live comfortably with the GOP. In the Detroit News of Jan. 29, 1960—at a time when he was considered as a U.S. Senate candidate by Michigan Republicans—he was quoted as saying:

"Totally unexpected developments in recent days have indicated a possibility of achieving that goal of one party in Michigan freed from organized minority control and subject to the control of citizen members—the Republican Party."

Back off the track again two years later, Romney was quoted in the Detroit Free Press, Feb. 5, 1962: "Parties tend to respond to the minorities, to organized groups. Parties pay too much attention to the idea that they (the organized groups) have more power than they have."

Finally, three months later, he came out irrevocably as a Republican. From the Flint Journal, May 2, 1962:

"I have never held any viewpoint other than that the Republican Party is the party that can become the citizen-responsible party. Never at any time did I have any uncertainty that only the Republican party is the party that can become the type of party that this country desperately needs."

Romney, as the record indicates, doesn't really come out clearly on much of anything. Particularly in his views on organized labor and its role in American life does a muddy picture emerge. His views are worth quoting and examining.

"The growth of the labor movement in this country was premised on the idea it would be monopolistic. Labor is based on monopoly, and industry on competition, and it can't work out. It's like living half slave and half free."—Detroit News, Nov. 7, 1958.

"Industry-wide bargaining, which in reality is not bargaining at all, but collective bludgeoning, is a vicious evil."—Speech to American Farm Bureau convention, Jan. 12, 1961.

The quote cited above can lead only to one logical terminal point, the proposal of anti-trust laws to cover trade unions.

Yet, Romney says: "Am I advocating the application of anti-trust laws to unions? I definitely am not."

What he does propose, essentially, is this:

1. That "the combining of national unions for the establishment of common bargaining demands . . . should be prohibited."

2. That unions representing more than 10,000 employes of a single employer should be prohibited from bargaining with another employer whose workers the union represents. This stems perhaps from Romney's days as head of American Motors. Indeed, it was written then. It aims clearly at large industrial unions like the Auto Workers and Steelworkers and others who must bargain with titan firms like General Motors and U.S. Steel.

Its effect, if mind-reading through Romney's rather murky presentation of it is possible, would be to break up large unified industrial unions into a group of fragmented ones.

Even if Romney stops short of outright advocacy of anti-trust coverage of unions, the consequence would be the same. Smaller, weaker unions would be left to bargain with industrial behemoths.

JUST AS HE MISREADS labor's role in American economic life, Romney misjudges its role in political life. From the Spring 1959 issue of Michigan State University's Business Topics:

"Politically, I can see little difference in principle between the present excessive political influence of unions, and the earlier excessive political influence of business."

There are substantial differences. Union political activity aims at the involvement of union members in the democratic process. It has centered on registration and voting and active participation. That it does this in order to help elect pro-labor candidates should come as no shock.

The "earlier excessive political influence of business" Romney refers to evokes memories of candidates "bought" by massive contributions from the treasuries of giant concerns or the personal fortunes of wealthy individuals.

At other times Romney has hinted opposition to any form of organized activity in politics by labor unions.

It is hard to sum up George Romney's thinking. It is something like picking up mercury with cast-iron gloves. . . . His specific proposals would have a specifically weakening effect on the ability of unions to represent working people.

In fact that's an understatement. His specific proposals would leave unions completely at the mercy of the business and industrial giants that dominate today's economy.

Kircher Cites Rising Pattern:

Stiff Crackdown Held Needed On Firms Defying Labor Law

THE AFL-CIO's chief organizer said Congress should adopt stiff, new curbs to halt the rise of employer violations of the right to unionize.

"About the most that happens now is a slap on the wrist and some kind of promise" that it won't happen again, said William L. Kircher, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization.

"Employers feel that this is a pretty cheap premium to pay for insurance against unionization . . . and avoid the responsibility of sitting down at the table with a union and bargaining on wages, hours and conditions for all of the workers," Kircher charged. He made the statements on Labor News Conference, a public affairs interview produced by the AFL-CIO and aired Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EDT, over the Mutual Broadcasting System.

Kircher said that while the present National Labor Relations Board is becoming more vigorous in enforcing the National Labor Relations Act, it needs "legislative encouragement."

"The law itself, and the whole history of jurisprudence that was written in those eight sad years between 1952 and 1960, when the board was dominated by the big business complexion of this nation . . . set traditions that are difficult for the board to move beyond, without some kind of legislative encouragement," he said. A special House Labor subcommittee headed by Rep. Frank Thompson, Jr. (D-N.J.) is conducting hearings on problems that have arisen in the enforcement of the Labor Act.

Kircher said the objections to the law and the NLRB raised by the National Association of Manufacturers and the Chamber of Commerce are "nothing more than a smoke screen" thrown up to gain a standoff in Congress. Management, he said, doesn't "want anything that is going to minimize the manner in which they are permitted to fight workers in their efforts to organize."

Reporters questioning Kircher were Neil Gilbride of the Associated Press and William Eaton of the Chicago Daily News.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

AMERICANS ARE incurable humanitarians. We grieve over pain, suffering and hunger anywhere in the world. And our normal reaction is to pitch in with all our vast resources and technical know-how to meet the problem.

When Pres. Johnson sent his Food for Freedom message to Congress in February 1966, proposing a program directed toward a world-wide war against hunger and malnutrition, it was in this humanitarian tradition.

Combating starvation is not new to this country. For years we have been seeking to alleviate hunger in those parts of the world where two-thirds of the people live, whose diets are far from adequate. Over the years, millions of people in more than 100 countries have survived because of American food aid.

Recently, Mrs. Dorothy Jacobson, assistant secretary of agriculture for international affairs, reported that "this review of food aid showed one startling and disturbing fact."

It disclosed, she said, that "clearly we were feeding hungry people but just as clearly we were not helping them to feed themselves." Food aid was not solving the world food problem. The trend was in the wrong direction.

She had in mind two fundamental trends. One was the population growth trend which, Mrs. Jacobson said, "must be altered downward." And the second trend was the rate of food growth in the developing countries. This must be "altered upward."

"This is the reason for the most important feature of our new food aid program—its emphasis on self-help," Mrs. Jacobson said.

This self-help approach has bipartisan support. An essential part of it is to encourage these countries to achieve a level of economic development at which they can either produce, or buy on commercial terms, the food they need. Equally essential is technical and capital assistance to the countries to enable them to help themselves.

"It may also be worth noting," Mrs. Jacobson said, "that concern for altering trends of population growth is now getting attention it has never before received.

What is essential in the developing countries is the critical need of a balance between population growth and food supply.

SEVERAL KEY STUDIES have been undertaken recently on this problem of balance. One was made by the President's Science Advisory Committee last June and another, just released, by the Dept. of Agriculture. The two studies came to some rather startling conclusions.

One was that although the world is clearly not losing its capacity to feed itself, the question of whether the world can feed itself is now at issue.

Mrs. Jacobson points out that where hunger is concerned, there is not one world but two. The highly developed, highly productive world and the hunger-ridden, less developed world.

"The rich nations," she said, "can produce so much more than they need that they can, and probably will, continue to be plagued with the possibility of surpluses. However, producing enough food to meet the needs of hungry people is quite different from actually feeding hungry people."

There is an appealing temptation to take a short-term view of alleviating world hunger—to call forth the full productive capacity of American agriculture in an attempt to provide enough food for all the hungry people of the world.

But Mrs. Jacobson believes that it would be "destructive in the long run—destructive of the very goals they seek to achieve." She summed it up in this way: "The war on hunger can be won only by increasing the productive capacity of the hungry nations themselves. If they are to achieve the economic growth that will enable them to reach higher standards of living—that will help them to move up from poverty—that will increase their per capita incomes, then they must improve their own agriculture at a sharply accelerated rate."

CONGRESS SHOULD ADOPT stiff, new curbs to halt the rise of employer violations of the right to unionize, AFL-CIO Organization Dir. William L. Kircher (center) said on Labor News Conference. Reporters Neil Gilbride (left) of the Associated Press and William Eaton of the Chicago Daily News questioned him on the public affairs interview, broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EDT, on Mutual radio.

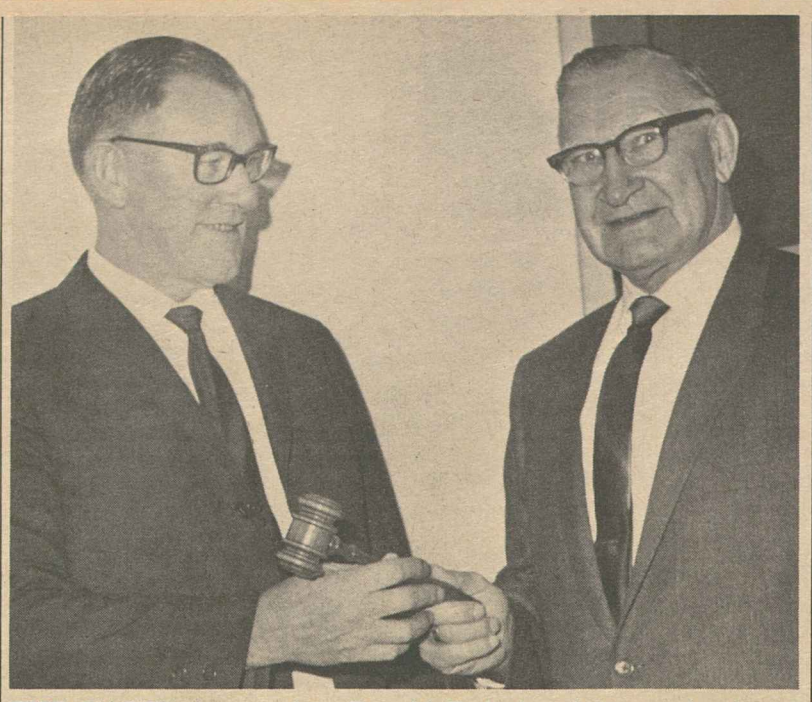
Nevada Labor Maps Program Of Legislation

Incline Village, Nev.—The Nevada AFL-CIO hailed improvements in state laws voted by the last two sessions of the Nevada Legislature and adopted a program urging additional changes at a special legislative session called for January.

The changes involve a bi-state pact restraining pollution of Lake Tahoe, the largest body of fresh water on the Nevada-California border; further improvements in the state unemployment compensation law; repeal of the casino entertainment tax, and enactment of a law requiring lessees of restaurants, bars or taverns to post bonds with the state commissioner of labor protecting employes against wage losses caused by defaulting employers.

In calling on the 1968 legislative session to repeal all "the discriminatory casino entertainment tax" totaling 10 percent, the delegates charged that the levy discriminates against employment of musicians and service trades workers.

The 11th state central body convention, consisting of 125 delegates from 45 local unions, voted new terms for Pres. Al Bramlet, Vice Presidents Claude Evans, Ed Benson, Dan Basta, and Scott Wadsworth. George Beebe, of the Las Vegas district, was elected to the seat vacated by Warren Wilson, who resigned. Remaining to serve out the balance of two-year terms are Sec.-Treas. Louis Paley and Vice Presidents Boyd Manning, John O. Morman and Keith D. Hickman.



THE GAVEL is passed to Ronald F. Roley (left), newly elected president of the Woodworkers, by retiring Pres. A. F. Hartung at the union's convention in Portland, Ore. Roley will be installed as president later this year.

Ronald F. Roley Elected To Head Woodworkers

Portland, Ore.—Delegates to the 25th convention of the Woodworkers here elected a new president, increased benefits in the union's pension program and ordered a referendum vote on a per capita tax increase.

The new president is Ronald F. Roley, Portland, who has been second vice president for the past seven years. He will succeed Pres. A. F. Hartung later this year, when the union's executive board meets to certify the election.

Hartung, president of the IWA since 1951, is retiring under mandatory provisions of the union constitution. Delegates paid tribute to his service at a banquet at the close of the four-day convention.

Re-elected without opposition were two incumbent officers, First Vice Pres. Claude Ballard and Sec.-Treas. William Botkin, both of Portland.

Candidates for second vice president are J. D. Carter, Springfield, Ore., and Keith Johnson, Edmonton, Alberta, local union presidents and members of the executive board.

Referendum voting for second vice president will take place along with balloting on a convention proposal to raise per capita payments to the international by 15 cents to a total of 90 cents per month.

Hartung's Message

In his farewell keynote address, Hartung appealed for greater inter-union cooperation to counter the growth of huge corporations with their increasing capability to thwart organizing and bargaining efforts by unions.

He urged the IWA to give full support to the attainment of federal housing programs, projects to eliminate slums and measures to counter the rising costs of medicine and the "racket" in car insurance.

In addition to acting on a number of constitutional amendments, the 332 delegates from local unions in the U.S. and Canada also approved a wide range of resolutions urging, among other things, federal action to expand adequate housing, boost job opportunities and eliminate discrimination.

Another resolution called on Congress to increase the power of the National Labor Relations Board in assessing penalties against employers who persistently violate the federal labor laws to block union organizing.

Convention speakers included Gerald Brown, member of the National Labor Relations Board; T. C. Douglas, leader of Canada's New Democratic Party, and Jack Conway, executive director of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.

Conway stressed the value of coordinated bargaining, pointing to the recent success of unions that have carried out joint negotiations with huge corporations.

By unanimous action of delegates, a telegram was sent to the Auto Workers pledging all-out support of the IWA in the strike against the Ford Motor Co.

Connecticut Unions Ask Funds for Public Power

New Haven—Delegates to the Connecticut State AFL-CIO convention think their state's congressional delegation should vote to help the people in the state, not the Connecticut Light & Power Co.

The convention rebuked Rep. Robert N. Giaimo (D-Conn.) for leading the fight in the House to kill funds for the Dickey-Lincoln public power project in Maine, and criticized other Connecticut congressmen for following his lead.

Consumers and industry in Connecticut and most of New England pay "excessive" prices for electric power, among the highest in the nation the convention said. The Dickey-Lincoln project would provide low-cost "peaking power" and a yardstick to measure rates charged by private utilities.

The convention resolution urged the state's U.S. senators to vote to restore the appropriation and called on Connecticut House members to drop their opposition.

Delegates also heard Joseph M. Rourke, AFL-CIO director of COPE and a former officer of the state federation, charge that the state's utilities "get away with murder" because of lack of competition.

He said industry has been driven South because "rates in New England are 55 to 144 percent higher than in the South."

The convention heard growing reports of state legislative progress following reapportionment and election of a majority of labor-backed candidates in both houses.

Sec.-Treas. Joseph C. Bober, the federation's legislative spokesman, termed it "the most successful session" the labor movement has ever had.

Strong Affiliation

Pres. John J. Driscoll said the "remarkable degree of unity" within the state's labor movement is evident in the affiliation of more than 90 percent of unions with the state AFL-CIO.

He expressed concern that the state federation's call for "peacetime" planning has been "generally ignored" by government, university, business and industrial leaders. The heavy defense spending orientation of Connecticut employment makes the state vulnerable to future cutbacks, Driscoll stressed.

Delegates re-elected the federation's top officers without opposition, applauded Gov. John N. Dempsey as he urged unions to "welcome members of minority groups to your ranks," and endorsed legislation to provide jobs for the unemployed, with the federal government the "employer of last resort."

During the convention, groundbreaking ceremonies were held for Trade Union Plaza, a housing project for low and middle income families sponsored by the Greater New Haven Central Labor Council.

Musicians' Fund Splits $3 Million

New York—A $3 million distribution from the Phonograph Record Special Payments Fund has been made to some 18,000 union musicians.

Musicians Pres. Herman Kenin said the fund, under a 1964 collective bargaining agreement, is financed by record manufacturers on the basis of records sold. Musicians who did recording work during the year receive a proportionate share of the fund.

Kenin noted that the 1967 distribution is the largest since the program started. The first payment, in 1965, was for $720,000 and the 1966 distribution totaled $2 million.

Convention Theme:

Graphic Arts Unity Stressed by LPIU

Los Angeles—Merger of all the unions in the nation's printing industry was the theme of the 1967 biennial convention of the Lithographers & Photoengravers.

LPIU Pres. Kenneth J. Brown was joined by Bookbinders Pres. John Connolly in urging that such a merger be consummated soon.

Brown said automation is sweeping the printing industry so rapidly that strict union jurisdictional lines are now obsolete, and all unions in the industry are headed for a merger.

While the printing industry unions were once regarded as the heart of craft unionism, "that era is over, and merger of our unions is the top priority issue facing all of us," he declared.

Connolly said the Bookbinders have great respect for the other printing trades, and "there was a time when our lines of jurisdiction were clear-cut." But today, he observed, fights over jurisdictional lines which are now blurred and indistinct "do more to destroy the old trade union spirit of cooperation than anything else." Discussions now are going on between various unions in the industry for a merger, he noted, "and eventually it will just have to take place."

Bookbinders' Position

If the Bookbinders find the other unions are not yet ready to unite into a single union now, Connolly said, "then we will have to consider our next step" on whether to unite at least temporarily with one or two of the other unions pending complete unification.

Brown said the "thrust behind the drive toward merger is the amazing degree of technological progress in the industry."

It is the new technology that is removing jurisdictional lines to the point where one machine operated by one craft can do the work once done by two or more crafts on separate machines, he observed.

Unions must work with management, he said, to make certain that progress continues without workers being hurt by the advances in technology.

The lithographers, Brown said, now have a $1 million a year fund paid for by management to train apprentices, but also to help journeymen retrain for jobs on the new machines.

The LPIU is also pressing an early retirement plan so those incapable of or uninterested in retraining can leave the industry with a reasonable pension.

Until 1961, there was little discussion of merger by the six major unions of Lithographers, Photoengravers, Stereotypers, Pressmen, Bookbinders and Typographical workers. In that year, some merger conversations began, and by 1964 the Lithographers and the Photoengravers were united into the LPIU.

The Typographical Union and the Pressmen also currently are engaged in merger negotiations.

Bargaining Gains

Brown's report on LPIU collective bargaining activities noted that while the median settlement in manufacturing was 12.4 cents an hour for the first half of 1967, the comparable LPIU wage settlements were for 17 cents an hour.

In addition, he said, as a result of the merger, Lithographers were able to gain Photoengravers' vacation benefits, while Photoengravers gained the better Lithographers' holiday benefits.

Membership in the union is now 54,000, up nearly 4,000 since the last convention in 1965.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler, addressing the delegates, declared that the gains of the present Democratic Administration in Washington are often overlooked. The fact is, Schnitzler said, that "there has never been a time in the history of America which compares to the advances made in the last three years."

Al Barkan, national director of the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education, warned the convention that if labor-backed candidates suffer as many defeats in the 1968 elections as they did in 1966, "then we can be certain that vicious anti-labor legislation will be enacted by the next Congress."

Lathers Press Training, Craft Skills Promotion

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The Lathers Union looks on apprenticeship training, industry promotion and job protection as part of the same problem.

In speeches, resolutions and floor discussions, the point was made that the union's efforts to provide job opportunities for its members depend not only on jurisdiction claims but on expanded use of lath and plaster by the construction industry and the availability of skilled workers to do the job.

Pres. Sal Maso told the delegates the union is ready to work "with architects, contractors and manufacturers" on "this task of extending the horizons for our skill."

He urged the union's small locals, as well as the larger units, to set up and expand apprenticeship programs. "We must be able to put men on the scaffold in order to get jobs," he stressed.

Maso also reported rapid growth toward the goal of a nationwide pension program — "a truly portable plan which moves with the lather." The number of participating locals has grown from 30 to more than 80 in the three years since the last convention, he said, and 860 contractors are now participating.

In contrast to the previous convention which was marked by sharp contests for top offices, delegates to the union's 26th convention voted unanimously to re-elect the entire list of incumbent officers.

The convention also approved a 40-cent increase in the monthly per capita tax.

There was strong support for legislation awaiting congressional action to permit picketing at construction sites and to end some current restrictions on joint union-industry promotion programs. C. J. Haggerty, president of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. and first vice president of the Lathers, reported on both issues to the delegates.

Re-elected, along with Maso and Haggerty, were Sec.-Treas. J. Earl Ferguson and Vice Presidents E. R. Baldwin, C. H. White, R. J. Hamilton, A. H. Burton, H. J. Sheerin and J. M. Sheehan.

Membership Vote Set:

Stereotypers Seek New Try at Merger

Dayton, O.—The Stereotypers voted unanimously at their 64th annual convention to ask membership authorization for another attempt at merger with some other graphic arts union.

If members approve the convention action, Pres. James H. Sampson will name ten members to serve with the six executive board members on a committee to begin negotiations "forthwith" with one or more other unions. Any resulting agreement must then go to referendum, accompanied by the committee's recommendation and the objections of merger opponents.

Last year the board came to agreement with the Lithographers & Photoengravers on merger terms. The proposition won membership approval, 4,412-4,295, but failed to get the required two-thirds majority.

The officers made no new recommendation to the convention here, but 13 local unions submitted proposals to make another attempt at merger. The convention voted to send the proposal to referendum with instructions to observe these guidelines in drafting new terms:

- The merged union must have an officer structure representing all the affected crafts.
- It must prohibit seizure by the new union of the assets of any local union opposing merger terms.
- It must call for a constitutional convention under terms approved by both parties to the merger.

Sampson and Sec.-Treas. Frank G. Creamer reported that recent talks looking toward merger have been held with LPIU, the Printing Pressmen and the Typographers. The negotiations will be renewed and the best resulting offer sent to referendum, Creamer said.

The delegates sent 12 other propositions to the local unions for a membership vote in December, to take effect Feb. 1 if approved by a two-thirds margin.

The convention voted down an executive board recommendation to reduce death benefit payments by $200 but approved a change that would eliminate advance payments in cases of extreme need or emergencies. Also defeated was a proposal to move union headquarters from Chicago and Flushing, N.Y., to Washington.

A recommendation that the general fund floor be raised to $300,000 and the ceiling to $500,000 was accepted subject to membership approval. Officers said the move should lead to a reduction in the number of assessments and provide more funds for union service.

Creamer reported that the defense fund has risen to $700,000, the highest point in the union's history. He announced that benefits for members of Kingsport Press, Tenn., Local 175, were reduced by half in June and will be terminated Oct. 29. Payments to strikers totaled more than $886,000 from Mar. 15, 1963 to last Apr. 30.

Meanwhile the "Don't Buy Kingsport" campaign will be pressed nationwide by the five unions whose members struck for basic contract terms more than four years ago. The campaign has the support of the AFL-CIO Executive Council and is being spearheaded by the Federation's Union Label & Service Trades Dept.

Jack Kroll Is Honored For 62 Years in Labor

Cincinnati, O.—Friends of Jack Kroll voiced their affection and respect, and their thanks for his 62 years of labor service, at a testimonial highlighted by messages from Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson and AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany.

Kroll served as codirector of COPE after the AFL-CIO merger, following 30 years of office in the Clothing Workers and the former CIO. Now 82, he retired early this year as ACWA Joint Board manager.

COPE Dir. Alexander Barkan came from Washington, to deliver a message recounting Kroll's long fight to help workers achieve a 48-hour week, and his part in the 1905 garment strike. The message, sent by Pres. Johnson, hailed Kroll's work in the political education field and expressed his warm regard.

AFL-CIO Dir. of Organization William L. Kircher, former Cincinnati resident, hailed Kroll as one of labor's pioneers and read a message from Meany, who praised Kroll for his "depth of understanding for his members and his community."

The ACWA Joint Board, through Manager Henry P. Seibert, presented a plaque reading in part: "Rarely has one man given so much to so many" and expressing appreciation for Kroll's "uncommon devotion and dedication."

Other messages were read by Emma Ferrari, Kroll's office secretary since 1926, and the board's education director. Other speakers included Bessie Hillman, widow of the late Sidney Hillman; Administrative Dir. Jacob Clayman of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.; Cincinnati Councilman Charles P. Taft, who presented the keys to the city and a "degree" of DRDU—"doctor of running a democratic union."

The audience of 400 cheered Kroll's wife Sara and their son Mark, who said his father was "the greatest friend of my lifetime."

ACWA members from all Cincinnati shops were introduced by Assistant Joint Board Mgr. Joseph Sepate.

When Kroll spoke, he said "How much is enough? My cup runneth over."

Packinghouse Local Buys an Elephant

St. Paul, Minn. — Regular visitors to Como Park Zoo here, including hundreds of kids, were saddened in July when the zoo's elephant, Mai Thai, died after a rock stuck in its throat.

Now members of Packinghouse Workers' Local 4 in South St. Paul have collected $4,500 to buy a replacement for Mai Thai and pay for the animal's transportation here from Portland, Ore.

The replacement elephant is a 1-year-old female who now stands only a little over three feet high. Members of the union will name the elephant and a plaque in the zoo will recognize its contribution.

Sullivan Sees Progress of Workers Critical to New Viet Government

The newly elected government in South Viet Nam will be judged by what it does "to improve the living standards of workers and farmers," AFL-CIO Vice Pres. David Sullivan, an American observer to the Viet Nam election, declared.

And a growing Vietnamese labor movement, which played an important role in the election, has vowed to continue its "political action" and have an important voice in the nation's future, he added.

Sullivan recalled in an interview nine "packed" days in Viet Nam—traveling by plane, helicopter, jeep and car to visit union meeting halls and military units and to observe political campaigning and voting places.

He said the observers not only were briefed by generals from all the battle areas but also were given an opportunity to talk freely with soldiers in both the U.S. and Vietnamese armies.

Besides visiting polling places and watching the balloting, they also talked with candidates, campaigners, "poll watchers" for various parties and voters, he reported.

"I think we got close enough to actual happenings to make valid judgments," Sullivan said. These were some of the judgments he brought home with him:

- A "very good impression" of the Vietnamese Confederation of Labor (CVT), numbering more than 300,000 members and "actively organizing" to add strength. "I believe it is moving in the right direction and helping the people," Sullivan said.
- A conviction that the election —similar to a U.S. election in some respects, different in others—"was conducted in an honest and fair manner."
- Belief that "we are winning the war, militarily," that the morale of our fighting men is "very high," that an effort to help South Viet Nam improve living standards "still has a long way to go."

CVT was a strong force in supporting the election and in countering Viet Cong efforts to upset it, Sullivan said. He told how it worked actively to encourage citizens to cast ballots in the election, which produced an 83 percent turnout of registered voters.

Although CVT did not back any of the presidential tickets, it was the key organization behind a "peasant-workers-farmers" slate for senate seats, Sullivan pointed out.

That slate, he noted, carried 23 of 50 provinces and autonomous cities in the election and out-polled by more than 400,000 votes the closest rival party.

In talks with CVT Pres. Tran Quoc Buu, other labor leaders and union members, Sullivan was briefed on labor's collective bargaining contracts and its further efforts to organize in the nation's rural and industrial areas.

"I found that the union members in Viet Nam are looking for better wages, improved working conditions and a greater degree of recognition—much the same goals being sought by workers everywhere," he emphasized.

He was particularly enthused about a CVT program that is "reaching directly into the heart of some of the poorest areas of the country."

The labor organization has converted 22 meeting halls into combined welfare-education centers. They distribute free drugs to all citizens; they provide facilities for children's classes in the daytime and adult education at night.

Help From Others

Much of the cost of the centers' operations is borne by contributions that come from the U.S. and other nations, Sullivan pointed out. He visited one of the centers at a time when it was serving as a school for 75 children.

Sullivan observed the balloting as it occurred in Can-Tho, a city in Phong-Dinh province. He said the voting was "very heavy" despite the fact that only a week earlier the Viet Cong had attacked a hospital there, killing some 15 people.

The way the people of South Viet Nam streamed to the polls after the Viet Cong "did everything it possibly could to disrupt the election" was "simply amazing," he concluded.

Sullivan described many "unforgettable" experiences in Viet Nam —the impact of Saigon's "fantastic" traffic of pedestrians, bicycles, automobiles and military vehicles; the complexity of military operations; and visits with our soldiers as they maintained posts "in the very middle of rice paddies."

"I came away with the feeling that our young men serving in Viet Nam must surely be as competent as any that have ever served in the history of our nation," he declared.

He told of being billeted with the Seventh Air Force just outside Saigon, of eating with troops in a mess hall, and of traveling with two "highly competent aides:" Maj. Benjamin Ulcak of San Antonio, Tex. and Robert Senser, labor attache to the U.S. Embassy in Saigon.

"It's a country with a great potential and its wonderful people are its greatest asset." They are devoted to self-government and "determined to be free," Sullivan concluded.

Shipbuilders Move Offices To Washington

The Marine & Shipbuilding Workers has moved its national headquarters from Camden, N.J. to the Philip Murray Bldg., 1126 Sixteenth St. N.W., Washington, D.C. The relocation was unanimously approved by the union's executive board.

Shipbuilders' Pres. John J. Grogan said the move from Camden, the union's headquarters since 1934, was voted by the board in order to give the union a stronger voice in the current drive to bolster the nation's "deteriorated" merchant marine.

Pointing out that all maritime unions are united in this effort, Grogan said the Shipbuilders "must bring every ounce of influence" it can muster to bear upon the government's ship policymakers and Congress.

The board also recognized that the move permits closer cooperation with an increasing number of unions that have their headquarters in Washington, Grogan said.

Also, he added, being headquartered in the nation's capital will allow quicker access to the services available from the AFL-CIO, the Industrial Union Dept. and the Maritime Trades Dept.

House Backtracks on Rat Control:

Senate Restores Funds Cut From Model Cities, Rent Aid

abled some 40 House members to change their position and vote money intended for rat control.

In July, amid callous laughter and jokes, the House had refused by a 207-176 vote to take up a bill authorizing $40 million over two years to combat the menace of rats, primarily in city slums.

Pres. Johnson termed the action "a cruel blow to the poor children of America" and the vote became a symbol of congressional indifference to the nation's slum-dwellers.

The program was revived through an amendment adding $40 million intended—but not legally earmarked—for rat control to a bill continuing grants to the states for health programs. On a nonrecord teller vote, the Mathias-Reuss amendment was tentatively adopted by a scant one-vote margin. However on a formal rollcall the next day, the House voted 227-173 approval. Voting for rat control funds were 159 Democrats and 68 Republicans; opposed were 110 Republicans and 63 Democrats.

The economy bloc retaliated, however, by deleting from the bill a $58 million program of crash aid for the nation's most overcrowded hospitals.

On deck in the Senate is an anti-poverty bill strongly supported by the AFL-CIO, which couples strengthening of the existing program with a new section providing a $1 billion program this fiscal year to create 200,000 jobs for the hard-core unemployed in both the public and private sectors, and an additional 300,000 jobs the following year.

This emergency job plan, sponsored by Sen. Joseph S. Clark (D-Pa.) and incorporated in the poverty bill by a 10-6 vote of the Senate Labor Committee, is not part of the Administration program and opponents will seek to delete it from the bill on the Senate floor.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council voted a strong endorsement of the job program as an important step towards creation of a needed one million jobs and Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller called on the Senate to pass the bill intact.

In other major congressional developments:

● The House Post Office & Civil Service Committee voted to combine in a single bill postage rate increases and a pay raise for postal and other salaried federal employes—in an effort to "veto proof" it. The committee voted tentatively for a 6 percent raise for postal workers, effective Oct. 1, and an additional 5 percent next July 1. Classified employes would receive an initial 4.5 percent raise and raises of unspecified amounts in each of the next two years to close the "comparability" gap with similar private industry jobs. Pres. Johnson proposed a 4.5 percent raise for both postal and classified workers.

● A labor-backed bill to set up an independent, nonprofit Corporation for Public Broadcasting to support noncommercial educational television and radio was up for a House vote as the AFL-CIO News went to press.

"We strongly support this effort . . . to concentrate on public interest rather than private profit," the AFL-CIO said in a letter to House members before the vote.

● Congress approved a two-year extension of the food stamp program—a compromise between a three-year bill voted by the Senate and a one-year extension passed by the House. The bill had been tied up in conference committee over the extension period and a group of House members sought to reject the two-year compromise. The House approved it, however, 196-154. The Senate adopted the final version by voice vote.

Airlines Assailed on Bid To Skirt Job Bias Law

There is "absolutely no justification" for letting the airlines make sex an occupational qualification for flight attendants, spokesmen for two unions told the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission in Washington.

An EEOC hearing on an industry application for a ruling that would allow the carriers to hire only women as flight attendants marked another phase in a battle that has been going on since 1965.

The unions, the Air Line Pilots and the Transport Workers, are trying to prevent the carriers from discriminating because of sex, age and marital status. The fight is being waged before the EEOC and in Congress.

The unions represent stewardesses and stewards. Although most of these are stewardesses, ALPA and TWU are strongly opposed to attempts to discriminate against males. They also seek to knock out the airlines' imposed age limits for stewardesses, usually 32 or 35, and automatic dismissal when they get married.

ALPA Vice Pres. Marjorie Cooper urged the EEOC to give short attention to the airlines' move for permission to hire only women and instead focus on the fact that industry managements are continuing to violate the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

Law Violations

She said ALPA is "firmly convinced" that practices of airlines compelling stewardesses to retire when they marry or reach a certain age violate the law's prohibitions on "discharge or discrimination in employment against any individual by reason of sex."

She noted that "in no case are we aware of any compulsory retirement rule based upon marriage or age applied to male flight attendants."

Asher Schwartz, TWU general counsel, testified that if the EEOC were to grant the industry's application "it would undo all the progress that TWU has made thus far in eliminating discrimination by airlines."

Industry representatives, he pointed out, would then be in position to assert "that EEOC's determination is justification—government justification, no less—for continuing and even enlarging its discriminatory practices based on sex."

The union's collective bargaining strength, which is based upon obtaining improved working conditions and higher pay for all employes regardless of sex, "would be hard put to overcome such a savage blow," he added.

The management spokesman, Jesse Freidin, appearing for the Air Line Transport Association, claimed that "femininity" is a qualification for a flight attendant and that attractive women "are preferred by the majority of passengers we fly."

He conceded that the airlines seek an EEOC declaration because it in turn would bar the commission from proceeding with cases alleging discrimination based on age and marital status.

Dr. White Honored By Clothing Union

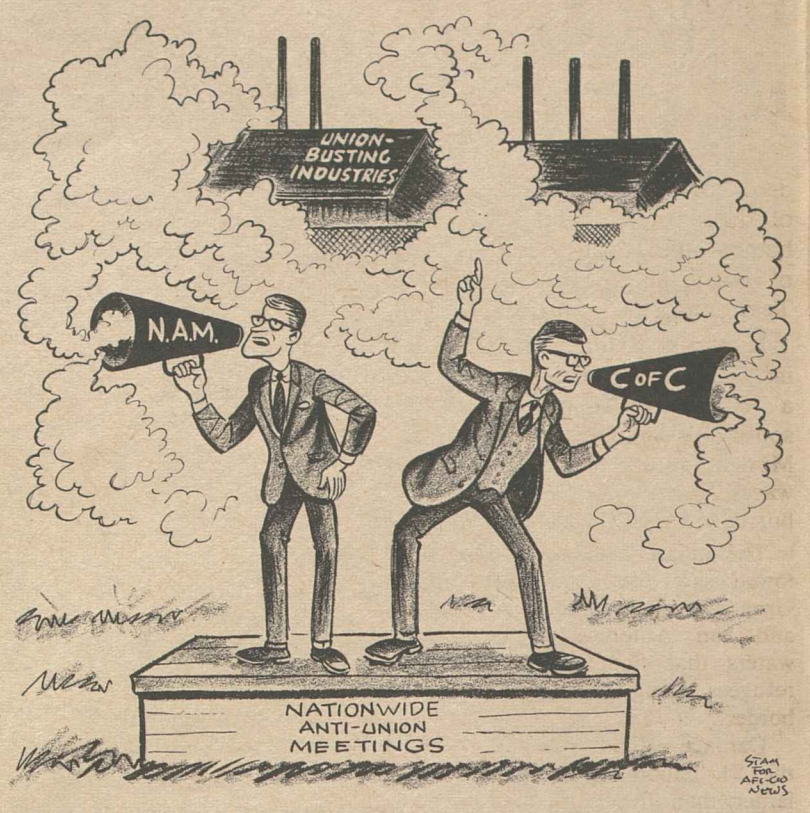
AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany joined the Clothing Workers in honoring Dr. Paul Dudley White, the noted heart specialist.

The ACWA held a testimonial dinner for White in Boston, citing him "for his great contribution to cardiology, science and the betterment of humanity."

Meany, in a letter to the dinner, termed the tribute "richly deserved." He said White is "unsurpassed for his major contributions to both the scientific knowledge of cardiology and the popular understanding of heart diseases."

TRIBUTES to Mary E. Switzer, recently appointed administrator of the Social & Rehabilitation Service of the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare, were presented at a testimonial dinner sponsored by the District of Columbia Rehabilitation Association. Miss Switzer, for the past 17 years commissioner of the Vocational Rehabilitation Administration, receives plaques from Dr. Morris Brand, board chairman of the National Institutes on Rehabilitation & Health Services and medical director of the Sidney Hillman Health Center in New York, and Terrence E. Carroll, president of the sponsoring organization.

Smokescreen



NAM, Chamber Stump For Anti-Union Laws

portunity for participants to discuss confidentially company industrial relations programs and relate all phases of the discusion to their own business practices."

The NAM announced the series of meetings in a special industrial relations issue of its publication, NAM Reports, which also featured:

● An article by Howard Jensen, vice president and general counsel of Lone Star Steel Co. and a charter member of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce's Special Committee on Voluntary Unionism, which was set up to push for "right-to-work" laws banning the union shop.

Lone Star Steel has been described by the Texas AFL-CIO as "probably the leading union-busting company in Texas" and Jensen's article is titled, "Unions and the Decline of Industrial Rights."

One of Jensen's arguments in the article is that rank-and-file union members are unhappy with union leaders, but unions shrewdly "deflect" the resentment to the employer in the form of strikes.

● A report by a "special task force" of the NAM's Industrial Relations Committee, which warned that collective bargaining is endangered by "the excessive and constantly growing power of the trade union movement."

The task force viewed with alarm coordinated bargaining by AFL-CIO unions. It complained that the National Labor Relations Board and the courts have been "pro-union" and called for legislation to reverse the effect of "the many pro-union decisions of the NLRB and the courts." It called on Congress to "consider how best the problem of union monopoly," resulting industrywide unions and forms of multiple bargaining should be met.

AFL-CIO Organization Dir. William L. Kircher charged in a Sept. 19 radio interview that the employer attacks are a "smokescreen" to block labor efforts to obtain more effective remedies against employer union-busting tactics. (Story, Page 5.)

The "slap on the wrist" the NLRB gives employers who fire union supporters is a "cheap premium to pay for insurance against unionization," Kircher said.

"All of the smoke that the National Association of Manufacturers and the Chamber of Commerce raise about the National Labor Relations Board and the law is simply contrived," he said. If management indicates it is satisfied with the present law, "then it makes our complaints appear to be more valid. They just create a smokescreen of dissatisfaction so that they can gain this standoff."

The Chamber of Commerce indicated that opposition to new labor-supported legislation will share the billing at its workshop with demands for "ending union-slanted decision-making power of the National Labor Relations Board."

The chamber announcement said the workshops will also discuss pending bills to permit on-site picketing at construction sites, to strengthen the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission and to outlaw age discrimination.

The NAM says its "task force" report "is the product of several thousand manhours of work on the part of the nation's top industrial relations experts."

The report does take a firm stand against compulsory arbitration—with one significant hedge. It acknowledges that many employers subject to the Railway Labor Act—covering airline and railroad disputes—favor compulsory arbitration. The NAM neither endorses nor repudiates this position, but suggests again that the better answer—from management's standpoint—might be to weaken unions. "A redress of union power" is the phrase used.

It opposes greater flexibility in the President's powers to deal with national emergency strikes and is against allowing Taft-Hartley emergency boards to recommend non-binding settlements.

The NAM report also calls for "increased employer education of employes and the public in labor relations economics." And it warns that unless Congress curbs industrywide bargaining, the future may see "a single, centrally controlled union for all American employes."

House GOP-Led Coalition Threatens Vital Programs

Unions Aid Huge Texas Relief Task

Corpus Christi, Tex. — Hundreds of trade unionists—many of them forced from their own homes—pitched in to aid victims of one of the greatest disasters in Texas history.

Hurricane Beulah, bearing 160-mile-an-hour winds, tore across a 40,000-square-mile area of south Texas and northeastern Mexico, generating huge tidal waves, tornadoes, massive cloudbursts and record flooding.

The nightmarish week that followed saw four rivers—the Rio Grande, Arroyo Colorado, Neuces and San Antonio—unleash wild waters that flooded out 150,000 refugees along both sides of the border.

Damage estimates mounted past the $1 billion figure in an area larger than the state of Virginia. The Red Cross said it was sheltering 25,000 persons, supplying at least 130,000.

Members of unions swung into action in all parts of the stricken region. More than 200 labor volunteers were helping the Red Cross here and more than 100 were assisting in rehabilitation work in the Harlingen area.

A. B. Smith, AFL-CIO Community Services liaison with the Red Cross here, said there was no way of telling just how many unionists were in Harlingen, center of the Arroyo Colorado's wild rampage.

At Least 100

"We know there are at least 100," he said, "because that number of volunteers from Laredo were flown into Harlingen by helicopter, the only way they could get there."

But, Smith added, communications "are so snarled that we can't keep in touch with them." The volunteers, he reported, are under the direction of Henry Munoz, equal opportunity director of the Texas State AFL-CIO.

The latter pledged its assistance to the Red Cross and state and federal officials as soon as disaster struck. Sec.-Treas. Roy R. Evans, in a bulletin to all locals of the federation, urged cash contributions to the Red Cross of at least $1 per union member.

Beside aiding the Red Cross in distributing food, clothing and medical supplies to Beulah's victims, union members also joined the vast rehabilitation effort in other ways.

Building trades members for example, were quickly engaged in repair work; and other unionists—as "good neighbors"—opened their houses to homeless Mexicans, more

At City-Wide Meeting:

New York Teachers Approve New Pact

New York—Teachers in the New York public school system, largest in the U.S., voted to accept a new 26-month contract offer and end a 13-day mass "stayout." They were to report for classes on Sept. 29.

The vote was 18,177 in favor, 3,442 opposed. It came at a city-wide meeting of the United Federation of Teachers in Madison Square Garden. The UFT is Local 2 of the American Federation of Teachers, AFL-CIO.

Union negotiators headed by Pres. Albert Shanker recommended acceptance of the city's offer of a $135 million "package" as an acceptable improvement over the old contract. Union and city representatives reached a memorandum of agreement last week and ironed out the details in meetings spurred by a panel of mediators and the intervention of Mayor John V. Lindsay (R).

The new pact raises wages over the 26-week term by as much as $1,350 for the lowest-paid group and by larger amounts for teachers with more training and experience. The new range is from $6,200 to $12,600 a year.

The union, whose 49,000 members refused to report for the fall school term until the new agreement was wrapped up, won these objectives among others:

- A reduction in maximum class sizes.
- Establishment by the School Board of a $10 million fund for school improvements, at least half of which will go toward special programs in deprived area schools.
- Agreement that the UFT will have equal representation with other community groups on a panel charged with overseeing the intensive training program.
- A provision under which a disruptive child may be removed from a regular class, with an appeals panel staffed by a teacher, a parent, and a psychologist or other qualified professional person.
- An agreement that teachers in

Orders Crippling Slash of $5 Billion

By David L. Perlman

A Republican-led coalition showed its muscle in the House and voted to force Pres. Johnson to slash non-military spending by billions of dollars.

Whether or not the maneuver succeeds, the 202-181 vote demonstrated that the conservative economy bloc sits in the driver's seat in the House. Its leaders have served notice that they will demand bone-deep cuts in domestic programs as a prerequisite to any tax increase.

The upset Sept. 27 vote came about when the GOP leadership demanded—and received—100 percent support from Republican congressmen on a motion intended to force a $5 billion budget cut.

The GOP also received the backing of 34 conservative southern Democrats, a big enough desertion of their party's leadership to put together a coalition majority. About 50 members were absent for the rollcall.

AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller termed the House action "unconscionable."

It must be reversed — "and promptly"—Biemiller said. "It is aimed at gutting the very domestic legislation the nation needs to meet the urban crisis."

A routine bill to enable government agencies to continue to meet their payrolls and expenses until Congress completes action on current appropriations provided the vehicle for the budget battle.

Rep. Frank T. Bow (R-O.) sought unsuccessfully to get the House Appropriations Committee to add to the bill a requirement that the President chop $5 billion from the $64.2 billion budget for non-military spending within 10 days after Congress adjourns.

Committee Democrats voted down the motion and Bow then

Alien Labor 'Loopholes' Denounced

A Justice Dept. regulation barring "green carders" from crossing the Mexican border to take jobs at struck farms and factories has loopholes big enough to drive truckloads of strikebreakers through, labor witnesses told a Senate subcommittee.

That is what has been happening in California and Texas, according to testimony by AFL-CIO Organization Dir. William L. Kircher and Cesar Chavez, director of the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee.

Their complaints were echoed in large part by Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz. He told the Senate Judiciary subcommittee on immigration that a July 9 regulation by the Justice Dept. "only takes a short step in the direction of preventing aliens from being used as strikebreakers."

So-called "green carders" are holders of alien registration cards who live in Mexico but commute either daily or seasonally to jobs in the United States. The identification cards that permit them to cross the border at will are the same as those held by regular immigrants

LBJ Names Unionist To New D.C. Council

J. C. Turner, president of the AFL-CIO Greater Washington Central Labor Council and business manager of Local 77 of the Operating Engineers, has been named to the nine-member District of Columbia City Council by Pres. Johnson.

The President's appointments were hailed by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany who said the federation "has high hopes for the new government."

"We are especially pleased that the President has included on that body J. C. Turner, whose record as a community leader and as a trade union leader in the District of Columbia has been unexcelled."

The President's appointments came at the swearing-in ceremony for the district's new commissioner, Walter E. Washington, and Deputy Commissioner Thomas W. Fletcher. The chairman of the City Council will be Max M. Kampelman, a Washington attorney and civic leader. Five of the members are Negro, two are women.

The new government for the district is the result of a presidential reorganization plan, that won approval earlier in the House, supplanting the three-commissioner form of government with a single commissioner, deputy and a nine-man city council.

Meany declared that the President has "chosen wisely and well,"

Convention Call Pledges Fight for National Needs

Organized labor's gains and the legislative victories of the last two years are far outweighed by the problems that currently beset America and "it is our mission to lead the fight to overcome them," the AFL-CIO declared in its convention call to affiliated organizations.

The federation's seventh constitutional convention will begin Dec. 7 in Bal Harbour, Fla., at the Americana Hotel and will bring together delegates from 128 international unions, six trades departments, 50 state organizations and 766 local central labor bodies representing 14.3 million union members.

The call was signed by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler. (Text on Page 2.) The federation's last biennial convention was held in San Francisco.

"If our sole criterion was progress for the labor movement," the call noted, "much satisfaction" could be found. It cited gains in union membership, wages and benefits as well as break-throughs in the organizing of teachers, agricultural workers and government employes.

Victories have also been achieved in legislation, the call observed, including the "strongest" Fair Labor Standards Act since the original wage-hour law of 1938, increasing

Following is the text of the AFL-CIO call to its Seventh Constitutional Convention mailed to all affiliates.

This convention, which meets at a time of trial for all America, must both weigh the record of the past two years and plan for the years ahead. In considering the record, the convention could find much satisfaction in the last two years, if our sole criterion was progress for the labor movement.

Since the last convention, paid per capita membership has risen from just under 13 million to nearly 14.3 million. Despite mounting employer resistance, our unions have won broad new gains in wages and social benefits, and organizing breakthroughs have been scored among agricultural workers, teachers, government employes and others.

The second session of the 89th Congress, ending Jan. 2, 1967, enacted a number of measures which were high on the agenda of our last convention. The Congress did enact the strongest Fair Labor Standards bill since the original wage-hour law was passed in 1938, not only raising the minimum wage in two steps to $1.60 an hour but extending the law's protection to some eight million additional workers, including, for the first time, nearly 400,000 in agriculture. The Congress also added the Cold War GI Bill, long pressed by the AFL-CIO, to the educational gains of the previous year, and added a rent supplements program to the housing bill.

Yet the direct gains won by our unions and the 1966 legislative victories are far outweighed by the problems that now beset America. We share in those problems, and it is our mission to lead the fight to overcome them. In this broader role, the impressive gains we ourselves have made are not enough; and we cannot be satisfied with past legislative achievements.

We have urged upon the present Congress a program of action that has not been followed; the result has been a virtual stalemate for progressive legislation, and the neglect of urgent social needs. We have repeatedly told the Congress that:

- The sweeping social advances undertaken since 1961 must be fully implemented, with adequate funds, and perfected by additional legislation where necessary.
- New programs must be undertaken at once to create rewarding jobs for the urban unemployed.
- Housing construction, especially in the cities, must be more than doubled, the new Model Cities and rent supplement programs of 1966 must be fully funded, and the long-standing public housing program must be pressed forward much faster.
- Vital to the solution of the housing crisis—and to the realistic achievement of most civil rights goals—is open housing. The right of every American to buy or rent any home he can afford anywhere he chooses, must be assured by federal law.
- Consumers must be protected against usury, misrepresentation and fraud, evils which strike hardest at the poor.

And looking farther ahead, an energetic effort must be undertaken by the labor movement, allied with other far-sighted Americans, to elect to federal office in 1968 those candidates who are dedicated to progress. This is not a matter of party affiliation. We say, as organized labor has said since the time of Samuel Gompers, that we will support our friends and oppose our enemies; and our friends are those who stand with us in demanding the improvement of society in America for the full and equal benefit of all.

Two years ago, at the crest of an unprecedented wave of social progress, we could truly say that "at no time in the AFL-CIO's first decade has the present been so praiseworthy and the future so promising."

Those words stand in stark contrast against the background of today's realities.

True, American society is still affluent—for the great majority.

True, the great constructive programs enacted since 1961 are still in being, and are still moving toward the betterment of American society—but they have never been funded adequately.

The bright promise of 1965 has faded; the unfinished business we cited then is, with few exceptions, unfinished still; and many of the problems we underscored at our last convention have grown worse.

Long-neglected urban needs have exploded into a national crisis of shocking proportions.

The historic civil rights legislation of recent years has not been followed up by other essential enactments, such as open housing, and the laws already on the books have not been adequately implemented.

Poverty and unemployment, especially among Negroes and other minority groups, and especially in urban ghettos, remain a moral outrage and an enormous human and economic waste.

Progress toward the ideal of unlimited educational opportunity for American youth—an ideal brought so close to achievement by the 89th Congress—is threatened with a reversal.

Although improvements in the social security system are pending in the Congress at this writing, the best bill that can be passed will be only a down payment toward the system as it should be. There is no real movement in the Congress toward legislation to stem the soaring costs of medical care, which could undermine the hard-won medicare program for the aged, nor toward medicare's extension.

Agricultural workers are still denied the protection of the National Labor Relations Act, and their efforts to organize are resisted with primitive ruthlessness by powerful farm corporations.

Anti-labor employers are flouting with growing boldness the meager safeguards afforded to other workers who seek to form unions.

The situs picketing bill, urged by four successive Presidents of the United States, still lies dormant at this writing.

This is indeed a catalogue of hopes aroused, only to be dashed by legislative lethargy or worse.

The responsibility is easy to fix. It rests upon the 90th Congress; a Congress which has ignored, evaded or openly rejected its clear obligation to build upon the record of its illustrious predecessor.

Two years ago we warned that continued legislative progress depended upon the preservation and strengthening of the liberal majority in Congress. The 1966 elections weakened, rather than strengthened, the liberal forces, and had a stronger impact upon spirit than upon numbers.

Some have argued that the 1966 elections reflected a public will to slow the pace of social advance. We reject that view. There were no national candidates and no clear national issues in 1966. The very inconsistency of the results is evidence that local rivalries, local issues and local personalities were the dominant influences.

Too many Americans believe there is still a liberal majority in the 90th Congress. This is just not true. The actual majority in the House of Representatives is the conservative coalition composed of members of both parties.

Beyond the domestic issues there remains the grave problem of the defense of freedom in South Viet Nam. It is testing as never before the calmness, the patience and the good sense of the nation.

There are some who cry for a wider, "get it over with" war regardless of risk. There are others who call for total disengagement, regardless of the impact on freedom's cause. And from both camps—and many of those that lie between—rises the charge that there must be a choice between war and social progress; that America cannot afford both at once.

Both camps are wrong on all counts. In South Viet Nam—as earlier in Korea—the United States is not in search of conquest or even victory in the classic sense. This country is fighting for the principle of self-determination; the principle that any body of people has the right to decide its own course without outside interference. It was on this principle that the American Revolution was waged; the principle is as valid in the rice-paddies and jungles of Viet Nam as it was at Bunker Hill and Yorktown. The defense of that principle has become an American obligation, unsought and reluctantly shouldered, but unavoidable so long as we cherish human freedom.

With that burden there is the obligation to perfect American society, not only for the benefit of Americans but as an example to the world of freedom's rewards. To sacrifice one for the sake of the other would be to lose both; and no such sacrifice is needed. This vast, rich and growing country has no need to make an impossible choice.

The fight for freedom in South Viet Nam must be carried on, with patient restraint and with continuing efforts to reach an honorable peace. The fight for universal freedom at home must be waged with mounting intensity and without quarter.

It is to that cause and in that spirit that we call this Seventh Constitutional Convention of the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations.

Convention Call Stresses Urgent Needs

the minimum wage and extending coverage to eight million more workers; the Cold War GI Bill, and a rent supplements program.

However, "direct gains won by our unions and the 1966 legislative victories are far outweighed by the problems that now beset America," the call declared. "We share in those problems, and it is our mission to lead the fight to overcome them. In this broader role, the impressive gains we ourselves have made are not enough; and we cannot be satisfied with past legislative accomplishments."

The call said the need now is for the "sweeping social advances" undertaken since 1961 to be fully implemented with adequate funds and perfected by additional legislation where necessary. These would include programs for meaningful jobs, large scale housing, open housing legislation and consumer protection.

While the great programs enacted since 1961 are still in being, the call noted, the "bright promise of 1964 has faded" and many of the problems have grown worse.

"Long-neglected urban needs have exploded into a national crisis of shocking proportions," the call noted; civil rights legislation has not been followed up, and poverty and unemployment, particularly among Negroes and other minority groups, remains "a moral outrage and an enormous human and economic waste."

Congress Delays

The call further declared that social security improvements are "only a down payment" on the gains needed and that there is no real movement in the Congress to "stem the soaring costs of medical care" or to extend medicare. It said that educational opportunities are threatened with reversal, agricultural workers are still denied the protection of federal labor law, anti-labor employers are flouting the law with growing boldness, and the situs picketing bill lies dormant.

"This is indeed a catalogue of hopes aroused, only to be dashed by legislative lethargy or worse," the call declared. It put the blame for the "deepening of America's ills squarely upon the 90th Congress which, it said, "has ignored, evaded or openly rejected its clear obligation to build upon the record of its illustrious predecesor."

Next year, the call declared, "an energetic effort must be undertaken by the labor movement, allied with other far-sighted Americans, to elect to federal office in 1968 those candidates who are dedicated to progress."

Turning to the Viet Nam conflict, the call rejected the view that America cannot afford both the war and programs for social progress. It also rejected the cry for a wider war as well as urgings for total disengagement.

'Patient Restraint'

"The fight for freedom in South Viet Nam must be carried on with patient restraint and with continuing efforts to reach an honorable peace," the call declared.

"With that burden there is the obligation to perfect American society, not only for the benefit of Americans but as an example to the world of freedom's rewards. To sacrifice one for the sake of the other would be to lose both; and no such sacrifice is needed." This vast, rich and growing country has no need to make an impossible choice.

Mediator Named in Coast Shipyard Strike

San Diego — Appointment of Ronald W. Haughton as special mediator in a three-month-old strike of 3,800 shipyard workers here was announced by Dir. William E. Simkin of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service.

Haughton and three other mediators met with representatives of the National Steel & Shipbuilding Co., three other shipyards and 10 supplier shops, and officers of seven unions — the Machinists, Carpenters, Painters, Teamsters, Operating Engineers, Iron Workers and the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

IAM Local 389 struck July 1 after its 800 members turned down a company contract offer of 42 cents an hour over three years, saying the proposal would have left rates far below those at other West Coast yards. The other unions also walked out after rejecting parallel offers.

The IAM said the companies then refused to negotiate further after Local 389 members rejected another "final" offer of 78.6 cents over five years.

Other shipyard locals won major improvements from 11 San Francisco-area employers earlier this year after a long strike and a Taft-Hartley injunction.

Haughton has helped mediate strikes of the AFL-CIO farm workers against DiGorgio Corp. in California and the Teachers in Detroit public schools. He is codirector of the labor relations institute of the University of Michigan and Wayne State University.

regular elementary schools are entitled to two class periods a week during which they need not teach, with teachers in special-service elementary schools getting four preparation periods a week this school year, and five next year.

In other developments, the AFT reported that unions in two other major cities reached agreement on new contracts but that work stayouts remain effective in two other situations — North Dearborn Heights, Mich., and Lake Michigan College. The Chicago teachers won $6.7 million in contract benefits for 23,000 city teachers and Cleveland, O., teachers won $400 yearly salary increases, the union reported.

The New York agreement was reached after heated debate in two preliminary meetings. The UFT executive board voted approval, 34-13, and the delegate assembly by 1,303-621.

The new contract raises the basic salary schedule for teachers with a bachelor of arts degree from the old starting rate of $5,400 a year to $6,000 this year, $6,600 next Sept. 1 and $6,750 a year later. Maximum salaries after 13 years will be increased from the former $9,950 to $10,350 this year, $11,000 next year and $11,150 the following school year.

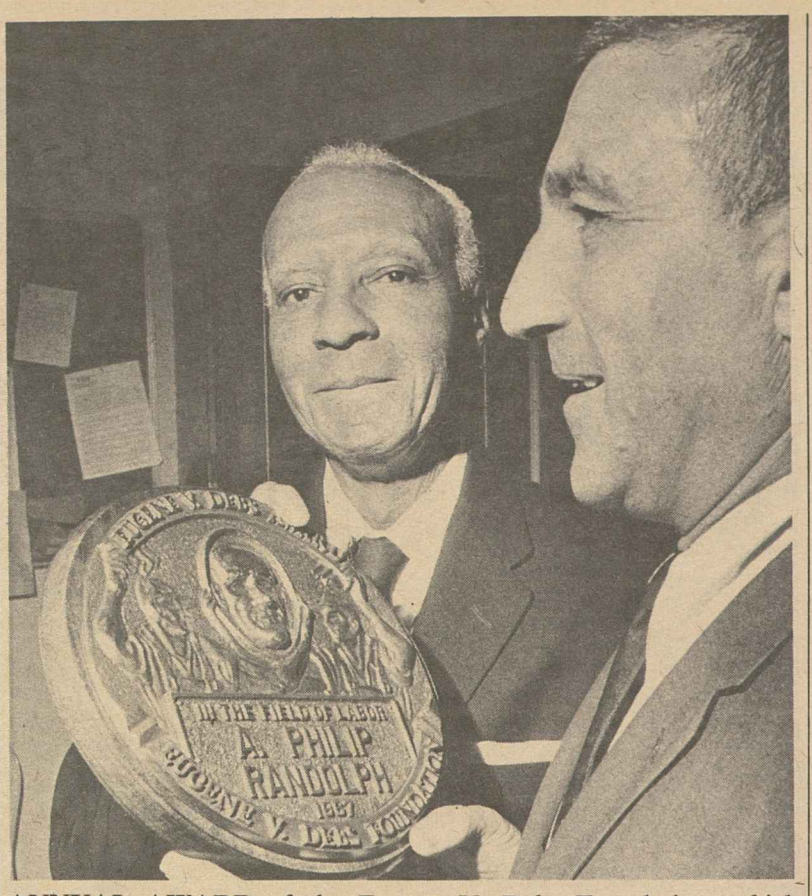
Salary scales for teachers with more training and experience will rise to a new $12,600 final step.

Maximum class sizes, except in emergency situations, will be 33 this year and 32 next year in elementary schools; 33 in junior high schools except in special service junior highs, the maximum drops next year from 33 to 30.

Senior high school class maximums were set at 36 this year, 34 next year. Trade shop high schools will have a maximum of 29 pupils per class next year. High school physical education classes cannot be larger than 60 pupils per teacher, and high school music classes, 50 per teacher, except under conditions detailed in the contract.

The School Board agreed to set aside a $10 million fund in the 1968-69 school year for the purpose of "making further progress" in developing new special programs for the elementary schools, with at least half devoted to "intensive" special training like that given in the More Effective Schools program —a major union objective.

The agreement also provides for a panel to appraise the special program and recommend improvements.



ANNUAL AWARD of the Eugene V. Debs Foundation, which honors the pioneer rail labor leader, was presented to Pres. A. Philip Randolph of the Sleeping Car Porters by Sec. of Interior Stewart L. Udall at a banquet in Terre Haute, Ind. The Debs' home there was dedicated by Udall as a national landmark.

Home of Debs Dedicated As U.S. Landmark

Terre Haute, Ind.—Leaders in labor, industry, government and education gathered here at an afternoon ceremony dedicating the home of a pioneer rail labor leader, Eugene V. Debs, as a national historic landmark.

That evening at a banquet they honored a modern-day rail labor leader—Pres. A. Philip Randolph of the Sleeping Car Porters—by presenting him with the Eugene V. Debs Foundation's annual award.

Sec. of the Interior Stewart L. Udall was on hand for both occasions. He unveiled the plaque designating the Deb's house as an official U.S. shrine and he presented the award, a huge medallion, to Randolph.

Udall praised unions and educators for saving the Debs home from destruction by raising the necessary funds to rehabilitate it and refurnish it as a museum. He said that Debs, in his time, was "the hero of millions of working people . . . who looked to him to lead them out of their poverty and misery."

Sen. Birch Bayh (D-Ind.), whose home is in Terre Haute, also participated in the dedication. He described Debs as a "dreamer of dreams," many of which came to be reality.

The foundation cited Randolph for his roles of "labor leader, educator, journalist, civil libertarian, partisan of peace and great American."

Similar Men

Udall said that Randolph is "all of these and more." He detailed a number of "parallels" between Randolph and Debs, pointing out that both "stood fast to their principles" and worked "for the broad social goals that would create a better America."

Randolph, in accepting the award, recalled Debs as a "crusader for the poor and oppressed" and urged that his memory "inspire us to move forward to a world of peace and justice."

Real Earnings Edge Up, Factory Workers Trail

The purchasing power of the average worker edged upward slightly in August to 3 cents a week more than a year earlier as the Labor Dept. reported that for the first time in 11 months real earnings topped year-ago figures.

The average factory worker, however, was still running below his August 1966 buying power, and for all workers the totals were still below the October 1965 peak.

The department's earnings figures were released along with the monthly report showing that the consumer price index continued its upward climb — to 116.9 percent of the 1957-59 price average. This was three-tenths of 1 percent higher than July and 2.7 percent above a year ago.

That means that it took $11.69 in August to purchase goods and services that cost $10 in the 1957-59 base period, $11.66 in July, and $11.42 in August of 1966.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics report indicated that nearly 170,000 workers will receive pay increases as a result of quarterly cost-of-living escalator adjustments. The principal groups are 157,000 aerospace workers who will get hourly raises of three or four cents and 11,000 chemical industry workers, due for a two-cent raise.

The average non-supervisory worker with three dependents took home $91.84 in August, 43 cents more than in July and $2.47 above a year ago.

In buying power, based on constant 1957-59 dollars, his paycheck was worth 10 cents more than in July and three cents more than a year earlier.

The average factory worker, however, still trailed behind last year's buying power. His weekly paycheck had eight cents more purchasing power than in July, but 65 cents less than a year ago.

Higher prices for food, cigarettes, mortgage interest costs and medical care paced the August price index rise. Doctors and dentists continued to raise their fees, although not quite as steeply as during the first year of medicare.

BLS Commissioner Arthur M. Ross saw significance in a rise in the wholesale prices of industrial goods after a period of stability. That index went up three-tenths of 1 percent in August and preliminary data indicate an additional two-tenths of 1 percent rise in September. This could foreshadow bigger retail price boosts.

Wholesale prices for farm products were down sufficiently, however, to push the entire wholesale index down four-tenths of 1 percent—to 106.1 percent of 1957-59 levels.

At the start of the year, BLS experts had predicted a 2.5 percent rise in living costs during 1967. This forecast has been revised upwards to close to 3 percent.

noting also that the AFL-CIO has long supported self-government for the district.

"We expect," he said, "that the new city government will immediately turn its attention to the major problems that beset Washington and we look with confidence to early action to meet the city's needs."

Turner, 51, is a graduate of Catholic University with a major in economics and has done graduate work in the area. He has been a member of Local 77 of the Operating Engineers since 1940, business manager for over 10 years and a vice president of the IUOE. He is a vice president of the Maryland-D.C. AFL-CIO and has served on numerous civic and community organizations in the district.

ABC Network Strike Draws Wide Support

New York—Performers' and writers' unions rallied behind 1,500 members of the Broadcast Employes on strike against the American Broadcasting Co. over contract terms in five network cities—New York, Chicago, San Francisco, Los Angeles and Washington, D.C.

Federal mediators called union and management to a meeting here Sept. 28—the first since the walkout started Sept. 22. Negotiations were resumed also between a NABET committee and management of the National Broadcasting Co., which employs 1,500 members of the union in the same five cities. NABET members on NBC have not yet been called on to strike.

Picket lines at ABC stations are being "generally respected" by members of the Television & Radio Artists, the Musicians, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and other unions, NABET reported. News writers, assignment editors and producers will act individually and not in concert in refusing to crossing picket lines, a Writers Guild source said. The Guild contract contains a no-strike clause.

An AFTRA announcement pledged legal and financial aid for union members who refuse to cross NABET picket lines. The national board has agreed to pay legal expenses and lost salaries for such members, the union said.

Other unions respected AFTRA picket lines during a 13-day strike against three major networks last spring. The three are ABC, NBC and the Columbia Broadcasting System.

NABET members voted 987-177 to strike ABC after turning down a company offer which the union called deficient in several major respects. The key issues in contract negotiations include a sizable raise above present base pay of $218 a week for technicians with two years of experience; a four-day 32-hour week, improved pension contributions, and better use of manpower in color television.

Some 2,500 union members work with radio and TV controls, audio equipment, lights, projection and videotape equipment on ABC and NBC stations. Another 500 are newswriters, maintenance personnel and other nontechnical employes.

Contracts on both networks were due to expire Mar. 31 but NABET extended them five months while it successfully fought off an attempted raid by the American Communications Association, an affiliate of the expelled Teamsters.

Newark Clerks' Leader Joins Mediation Board

Trenton, N.J.—George Meisler, president of Retail Clerks Local 21 in Newark, was sworn in here as a member of the New Jersey board of mediation. Gov. Richard J. Hughes, who earlier appointed Meisler to the board, attended the swearing-in ceremony.

Seafarers Ratify Pact Boosting Pay, Pensions

New York—The Seafarers have negotiated contract changes providing raises of $40 a month, higher overtime rates and a pension increase of $75 a month for nearly 18,000 members on 350 ships in deep sea service.

The changes were ratified by SIU members at meetings in all Atlantic and Gulf District ports. They are in effect for the period Oct. 1, 1967 to June 1, 1969, with a proviso that wage talks may be reopened on notice to the 130 ship operators involved.

Meanwhile, the SIU of Canada announced that 5,400 members voted a tentative end to a five-week walkout on 181 ships of the Great Lakes and inland waters fleet. The strikers agreed to return to their ships pending a ratification vote on board the vessels, Pres. Leonard McLaughlin said.

The Canadian agreement will add about $80 a month to the current base rate of $360; better fringe benefits and ship manning provisions, including a 40-hour workweek in three stages; and a gradual reduction of the on-call period from 24 hours daily to 12 hours by 1969.

For U.S. ship crews above the rank of ordinary seamen, engine wiper or messman, the basic monthly wage will go from $392.58 to $432.58 at once. Overtime rates are increased 25 cents an hour, and monthly pension payments rise from the former $175 to $250.

Union negotiators reported that an actuarial study now under way may lead to improvements in the pension formula.

Most SIU deep sea members possess skill ratings, largely as a result of the union's success in encouraging members to upgrade themselves through its training programs. Increased demands for rated personnel, coupled with the SIU program of free training, means that relatively little time need be spent in beginning levels on board ship, Hall said.

Safe Construction Legislation Backed

The AFL-CIO strongly supports the construction safety bill introduced by Rep. James G. O'Hara (D-Mich.), Federation Pres. George Meany declared.

Meany wrote Rep. Elmer J. Holland (D-Pa.), chairman of the Labor subcommittee considering the bill, that the legislation would lead to safer conditions on all federal and federally-aided construction projects.

"The scandalously high injury rate in the construction industry, four times the average for all industries, calls for correction," he declared.

Meat for the Table

THE ASSURANCE of a safe and healthful meat supply is one of the key elements in the AFL-CIO's drive to protect American consumers against the unscrupulous practices of the marketplace.

Some of these practices are better known than others. Meat inspection falls into the too-little-known category with most consumers convinced that the meat and meat products they buy have been inspected by the federal government.

The reality is that they are not fully protected and that they are in a real sense being deluded into a feeling of false security. Actually, some 15 percent of all meat slaughtered and some 25 percent of all meat products processed are not federally inspected.

Some of this production is inspected at the state level, but even the best of the state programs, where they exist, leave a great deal to be desired.

The federal meat inspection act, in addition, is 60 years old and badly in need of modernization and overhaul.

Meat inspection is a direct and immediate issue for consumers. Serious illness can be caused by unwholesome and unclean meat. Consumers have in a number of cases paid normal prices for meat that came from sick animals or from animals that died from causes other than slaughter. Potentially dangerous situations concerning insecticide residues in meat have developed in the past few years.

The consumer has a right to get the full protection of meat inspection which he believes he now has. He has the right to expect that the government will assure the health and safety of his family in this matter.

THE SIMPLE ANSWER is a federal meat inspection law to cover all plants which are in or affect interstate commerce. But the meat packing industry and the National Association of State Departments of Agriculture are raising the discredited cry of "states' rights" and are urging further weakening of an already weak bill.

These proposals would in effect be a hoax on the consumer by further compounding confusions and illusions about meat protection.

Urging the states to pass good inspection laws, the basic approach of the committee bill, does not face up to the problem and fails completely to assure the American public that it is really protected from the health hazards of unwholesome and unclean meat.

The answer lies with a measure that would place nearly all meat plants under the interstate commerce provisions used as a guide in other existing legislation and thus bring their products under federal inspection.

The meat inspection issue involves the health of the American people and cannot be subjected to bargain basement approaches or gimmicks that would prevent full and complete inspection.

The House of Representatives has the responsibility not to shortchange the American consumer on this vital issue and to vote for strong, effective legislation that can be accepted without question as the fullest possible protection.

Early Leaders Hailed:

Transit Union Commemorates 75 Years of Growth, Struggle

THE YEAR 1892 was a grim time to organize a new international union.

It was the era of the bitter Homestead Steel strike, of the Chicago Haymarket riot, of management spies, detectives and goons and when heads of families were forced to work 14 and 16 hours a day for 14 cents an hour.

Yet, the very grimness of the period led to AFL Pres. Samuel Gompers issuing the call for the first convention of the Amalgamated Association of Street Railway Employes of America, the predecessor of the Amalgamated Transit Union.

Some 50 stouthearted delegates from throughout the country convened at Manshur's Hall in Indianapolis, Ind. on Sept. 15, 1892.

On Oct. 9, when the ATU convenes in New Orleans it will be marking its 75th anniversary.

The Amalgamated was formed that year with William L. Law of Detroit being elected by the delegates as the first president. The delegates voted to levy a per capita tax of five cents per month and, paradoxically, voted against affiliation with the AFL.

The affiliation was voted in the second convention in Cleveland in 1893. The country was caught up in a major depression. Only 19 delegates were on hand for the convention but they elected William D. Mahon as international president.

For the next 52 years and eight months—probably a record — Mahon was to guide the destinies of the union. He died Oct. 31, 1949, having voluntarily retired three years earlier.

At the time Mahon took office, at a salary of $800 a year, the balance in the union's treasury was $172.36. But the union grew and its members prospered.

All the present leaders of the ATU look upon Mahon as their great leader, a man who took an organization of a few members and built it to the 130,000 member union that it is today.

The son of an itinerant tanner, Mahon worked in the coal mines of the Hocking Valley of Ohio in his youth. Moving to Columbus he secured employment as a driver on a mule car. This was in the days when streetcar men received $1 for a 16-hour day and were forced to work seven days a week.

He was an outspoken man who had a deep hatred for intolerance and bigotry.

Mine Workers Pres. John L. Lewis, at the time of his death, wrote "His sterling character and outstanding capabilities have caused him for more than half a century to be recognized as one of the greatest figures in the councils of labor."

Steelworkers Pres. Philip Murray wired, "In the passing of W. D. Mahon . . . the American Labor movement has lost one of its truly great figures."

BILL MAHON had actually written his own epitaph 50 years before when he said: "I would rather go down to my grave as poor old Bill Mahon, without a dollar, and leave a legacy of improved conditions for the street railway men of the country, than to have all the wealth of the Morgans—rolled into a pile and doubled ten thousand times.

"My only hope is that when my life's work is done and I am laid away I will have earned the epitaph: 'He was our friend'."

The union claims a first in an agreement signed May 1, 1926, between Local Division 388 and the Newburgh Public Service providing life insurance and sick benefits for employes entirely paid for by the company.

"It's been a long time since that memorable date of Sept. 15, 1892," declared ATU Pres. John M. Elliott. "We who are alive today owe much to the founders for their foresight and courage in forming and building this international union. Transit workers throughout Canada and the United States have continuously benefited throughout these long 75 years because of their efforts."

Elliott asked that "on this, our 75th anniversary, let us one and all rededicate ourselves to the spirit of trade unionism our very own founders laid before us and continue to build in the future a still stronger and better trade union." (PAI).

'Power for Good'

Nation's Welfare Comes First, Meany Tells TV Interviewer

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany was interviewed recently by Edwin Newman of NBC News for a new television program "Speaking Freely." The program has been shown in New York and Washington and is scheduled for additional broadcast in a number of cities during the coming weeks. Here are some excerpts from the program:

NEWMAN: Mr. Meany, when would you say that organized labor was at the peak of its power and influence in this country? Or would you say it is now, perhaps?

MEANY: Well, I don't like to think in terms of power and influence, but if you must have an answer to that, I'd say that right now labor has more influence, more power. It has become a more important segment of American society over the years, and this of course has been a question of slow progress, but I'd say, right now it has more members, and greater political influence. It has greater influence in the community because of its expanded activities.

You know, back in the early days we thought in the trade union movement pretty much in the terms of our own problems. However, as the years have gone by, there's been quite a revision in that thinking, and labor now thinks in terms of the welfare and the progress of the entire community—in the belief that to whatever extent the community as a whole advances, we will advance.

We take a position that what's good for the community, what's good for the country as a whole, is good for the organized trade union movement.

I think there's no question that labor has more influence. It's more accepted today as an integral part of the entire community, than it was in the past.

NEWMAN: Mr. Meany, you mentioned the time when the AFL and the CIO merged. How would you say that merger or marriage is working out? Is it threatened, do you think?

MEANY: No, I don't think it's threatened. I think it's worked out. It's worked out far better than I think we had any right to believe at the start. We did have some problems, and of course we'll always have problems with an association of our kind. But when we merged, you see, we brought into the one family a number of organizations that were in the same jurisdiction, that were competitive, as it were, and we did that because it was the only way we possibly could merge.

If we would have tried at the time to write a set of rules, and secure agreements that would draw lines of demarcation between these unions, we'd still be working on the merger. So we chose the other method, and we set up standards to work by, and I think they're working quite well. I think the merger has worked very well.

NEWMAN: Industrial unions tend to be, I think, somewhat more crusading, somewhat more aggressive, than craft unions do. At least they give that public impression.

MEANY: Well, of course you're thinking now, of, I suppose the establishment of the CIO, and there's no question, they were great crusaders. They were zealous, they put a lot of work into organizing, and they were quite successful organizing. However, that's only part of the job. After you organize people you've got to try to keep them happy. You've got to try to keep them working. And while you could use the same zeal that you used in organizing, perhaps to get them to go on strike, that wouldn't settle the strike. That wouldn't really do them any good in the long run.

I think the industrial unions are run with the same principles generally that the so-called craft unions are run. Of course, the craft unions were established much earlier. I think they were much more confident of their own future, and of their own ability, because of the fact that they were craft unions, and they certainly have never really faced the same problem as the industrial unions face, where you had great masses of people working on assembly lines or production lines.

The craftsman has a certain independence that comes from the fact that he is a craftsman. However, since the organization of the CIO back in the middle Thirties, and the great industrial unions, we find that there are a great many in those unions who have the same attitude as the craftsmen, because they too are craftsmen, you see.

Everybody in the industrial unions is not a production worker. There's quite a few of them that are very highly skilled, and this is one of the reasons when you see the so-called industrial unions approaching the bargaining table, they bring to the bargaining table not only the problems of the great mass of production workers, but they bring to the bargaining table the peculiar problem that springs from a minority in their group who are highly skilled, and who feel that—rightly or wrongly—that their interests are being submerged to this great mass that have lesser skills.

NEWMAN: Is there an answer for that problem. Should those people with the greater skills be in their own union?

MEANY: Well, I don't think that would be the answer. I think there is an answer to it, and I think the industrial unions are finding the answer. I think there's got to be some differential between the skilled man and the unskilled. I think it's like everything else in life. When a person acquires an education, he expects to get some benefits out of that education. You don't send a boy to college with the idea that he is going to spend the rest of his life parading around and resting solely on his laurels, as it were, and saying "I'm a college graduate."

I think when you send him to college you expect that he's going to get a job that will be commensurate with his intelligence and the knowledge that he's acquired by going to school. I think this is why these problems crop up, where you have unskilled workers and highly skilled workers in the same union. But I think the industrial unions can take care of this problem. I think they get a few headaches here and there but I think by and large they're doing all right.

Jobs, Schools, Housing:

Beirne Sees Broad Support For Action on Urban Needs

PRES. JOSEPH A. BEIRNE of the Communications Workers predicted that the CWA's nationwide petition drive will show strong public support for stepped-up congressional action on housing, education and employment.

Expressing a belief that most Americans want to find the effective answers to the problems of slums and human deprivation, Beirne, an AFL-CIO vice president, said the signature drive was launched to help headoff a "hardening of attitudes" stemming from last summer's riots.

Adverse reactions have already appeared in Congress, he said, citing the House vote on the original rat extermination bill last July and attempts to slash the Appalachia program, and "a hardening would make it impossible" to solve the problems that must be faced.

"We hope to unfreeze the negative approach that Congress has taken," he declared on the network radio interview, Labor News Conference, broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EDT, on the Mutual Radio Network.

Beirne said the federal government must take a stronger lead in cleaning up both the urban and rural slums "where human beings are living just a short step above the level of animals."

"IT IS THE ONLY organized group in America with the strength and the wealth capable of taking the lead to clean up the slums," he said, predicting that once it does, the private sector of the economy will come forth with the skill, expertise and dollars it will take to do the whole job.

Reporters questioning Beirne on the AFL-CIO public affairs program were Murray Seeger of Newsweek magazine and Alan Adams of Business Week magazine.

RATS ARE no laughing matter.

On July 20 a number of members of the House of Representatives thought they were. They laughed and kidded and joked when the Rat Extermination Act of 1967 was proposed by the Administration to provide $20 million a year for two years to control rats.

The proposal was literally burlesqued and punned to death—176 yeas to 207 nays.

On Sept. 19, the House reversed itself and approved a revised rat control program by the narrowest of margins, 129 to 128. In a roll call vote the following day this was upheld 207 to 176.

While the vote was significant and will help to curb killer rodents that have plagued mankind through the centuries, equally significant was the sober, almost grim debate that took place.

In contrast with the jocularity two months before it was almost a funeral atmosphere.

In the debate, Rep. Spark Matsunaga (D-Hawaii) explained just why this was so.

"We have been told," he said, "in editorial columns of newpapers across the nation that such conduct was unbefitting the members of this House and the seriousness of the legislation involved.

"We have had time in the intervening weeks to reflect upon and review the action of July 20. It was only after the laughter had subsided that the voice from the ghettos came through loud and clear. It was a voice that was always there but not always heard.

Rep. Charles Mathias (R-Md.) put it this way:

"The rat is more than a carrier of disease. He has become a symbol of official cynicism, of inertia. We have an opportunity today to change that image and to advance the great effort to make America more healthy and hopeful."

MOST OF THE opponents of rat control legislation, who had such a field day with puns on July 20, were pretty quiet when the measure was reconsidered.

Two months ago, Rep. H. R. Gross (R-Ia.) wanted to know if the Administration "planned to embark on rat killing around the world." He said he was talking, of course, about the "four-legged variety."

In September he spoke less than two minutes on an obscure point. He was opposed, but not a comedian.

Then there was Rep. Joel T. Broyhill (R-Va.) who had some of his colleagues howling in July when he urged that they kill the rat bill "rat now."

Two months later, obviously shaken but rigidly opposed, he complained "that we are caught in a wave of emotionalism and sheer political demagoguery and we are scrambling for a position for fear that some of our constituents will fail to understand . . ."

Rep. James Haley (D-Fla.) was quiet in September. He had suggested in July that "we have a lot of cat lovers in the nation, and why not just buy some cats and turn them loose on the rats and thereby we could take care of this situation without any $25 million from the treasury of the U.S."

Technically, there was only one major difference between the July proposal and the September amendment. The former would provide the funds to the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development and the latter to the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare. And if HEW did not use the money for rat control it could be applied to other needs. Rat control was part of the health bill.

Rep. Henry Reuss (D-Wis.) summed up the case for rat control:

"On the question whether this country needs federally assisted rat control programs, anyone who doubts that we do, should have accompanied me a few days ago on a walk through the slum section of my home city of Milwaukee. I saw houses with hundreds of rat holes gnawed in the walls and in the floors . . . There was a little 4-year-old boy who was crying bitterly because he wanted someone to hold his hand and walk him home . . . but each time he went home . . . there were rats in the alley and the rats bit the little boy."

Rats are no laughing matter!

THE COMMUNICATIONS WORKERS nationwide petition drive will show wide support for stepped-up congressional action on jobs, housing and education, CWA Pres. Joseph A. Beirne predicted on Labor News Conference. Questioning the AFL-CIO vice president were Murray Seeger (left) of Newsweek and Alan Adams (right) of Business Week. Harry W. Flannery (second from right), who has been moderator of the Mutual Network program since it began in 1961, retires this week.

Mexican Union Votes Aid To Copper Strike

Pittsburgh, Pa.—Mexican Miners Local 65 has voted a donation of $4 a member for the support of copper workers on strike against eight companies, the Steelworkers reported in a strike bulletin. More than 40,000 members of the USWA and 19 other unions have been out since July 15 over contract renewals.

Other messages of support have come from the Japanese Nonferrous Metal Refining Workers' Council; the Japanese Council of the Intl. Metalworkers' Federation, and the Caribbean Bauxite Mine Metal Workers Federation in Georgetown, Guiana, the bulletin noted.

Pres. Pompeyo Bastida of the miners in Cananea, Sonora, Mexico, sent a telegram wishing the strikers "success in your struggle for labor rights." USWA Vice Pres. Joseph P. Molony, who sent a message of appreciation, said the donation of about $5,600 represents nearly a day's pay for the Mexican miners, whose wages are far below the U.S. scale.

The bulletin called the contribution "generous" and said it will be deducted from the pay of 1,400 miners. The action was voted unanimously at a meeting of 1,000 members who ratified a new contract agreement with the Anaconda Co. at Cananea, a town known as the "birthplace of the Mexican revolution."

The Steelworkers have charged the copper companies with resisting all attempts at meaningful negotiations. Meanwhile, first-half reports of earnings showed profit increases of 33 percent for Kennecott Copper Corp., 8.6 percent for American Smelting & Refining Co., and smaller rises for Anaconda and Phelps Dodge Corp., the industry leaders.

States Urged to Back Jobless Pay Standards

New Orleans, La.—AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Bert Seidman called on state employment security administrators to support legislation setting federal standards for unemployment insurance.

"The state-by-state effort to modernize unemployment insurance on a piecemeal basis hasn't done the job in the past and it won't do it in the future," Seidman said.

He reminded the Inter-State Conference of Employment Security Agencies that opposition by many state agencies was a factor in the failure of the 89th Congress to adopt federal standards on unemployment compensation.

During hearings, Seidman noted, "Congress was assured time and again the states could remedy the situation if left to their own devices."

Congress, he said, "granted this wish, and the states have been left to their own devices." But only a few of the 47 legislatures that met this year made any significant improvement in their programs, and benefits in most states cover a smaller percentage of lost wages than in 1939, when the program was just getting under way.

"If unemployment insurance is to be the nation's first line of defense against recession and poverty, it must be regarded as a national responsibility requiring federal action," Seidman stressed.

He suggested that it is only "a historical accident" that the social security system is completely federal while unemployment insurance is essentially a state program.

"Is there any logical reason," Seidman asked, "why retired workers all over the country should receive benefits determined by a single federal formula while different criteria in each state determine the unemployment insurance jobless workers receive?"

The AFL-CIO, he stressed, will continue to push for enactment of federal jobless benefit standards just as labor fought for years for medicare until it was finally enacted.

He told the state administrators that their support of the federal standards bill introduced by Sen. Eugene J. McCarthy (D-Minn.) and 12 co-sponsors "could do much to develop an unemployment insurance system that would assure real protection to the living standards of workers and their families."

Whelan New President Of Oregon AFL-CIO

Eugene, Ore.—A changing of the guard highlighted the Oregon AFL-CIO convention with Pres. J. D. (Rosy) McDonald, 72, bowing out after 12 years as titular head of the merged federation preceded by another 12 as chief of the former Oregon Federation of Labor.

Succeeding him as president is Edward J. Whelan, 41, who brings to that office the executive authority he has held for two years as secretary-treasurer, as the result of a constitutional amendment adoptfied by the delegates. Whelan, a Fire Fighter, was unopposed.

The new secretary-treasurer, Glenn E. (Pat) Randall, 40, is a former Eugene Carpenters local business representative. He was the winner of a three-man race for the post, which delegates vested with administrative and fiscal responsibilities.

George Brown, 64, veteran political and legislative director, was re-elected without opposition to his last term. The 1966 convention adopted a 65-year age limit for elective officers.

Other Officers

Earl B. Kirkland, 41, of the Portland Building & Construction Trades Council was elected first vice-president, and Nellie Holmes, Portland Retail Clerks Local 1257, was re-elected as second vice-president.

Concern over rising medical and hospital costs, auto insurance abuses, air and water pollution and conservation of natural resources, discrimination by employers against injured workmen, the rights of public employes, the sad state of the merchant marine, support of farm workers, and the need for beefed-up labor political participation was reflected in the more than 80 resolutions on which the five-day convention took action.

Gov. Tom McCall (R), reported on his recent trip as a U.S. observer during the South Viet Nam election, describing the voting as "a turning point" and expressing hope that the troubled nation is "on its way to strong, representative democratic government."

AFL-CIO Support Pledged 3M Strike

The AFL-CIO "completely supports" the strike of 3,300 employes of the Minnesota Mining & Mfg. Co., Federation Pres. George Meany wrote Pres. A. F. Grospiron of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers.

OCAW members on Sept. 17 carried their fight for an equitable new contract to the picket lines at 3M plants in St. Paul, Maplewood and Hastings, Minn. They "have the backing of the entire union movement," Meany told Grospiron.

Though 3M is a "giant in its field" with more than 70 plants from coast to coast, the strikers can count on the support of their 14 million fellow members of AFL-CIO unions, Meany said.

Milwaukee Honors Its Labor Press

Milwaukee — The 25th anniversary of the Milwaukee Labor Press was a civic as well as a trade union event here.

Both the Milwaukee Common Council and the County Board of Supervisors passed resolutions paying tribute to the weekly publication of the Milwaukee County Labor Council, which goes to 127,000 union families.

Mayor Henry Maier, speaking at the anniversary celebration, said the newspaper has been in the "forefront" of the fight for "every progressive issue affecting the welfare of the working man in our city, our state and our nation."

By Public, Government:

Kenin Sees Growth In Support for Arts

London, England—"A tremendous, almost unbelievable" improvement in the public climate for the performing arts has occurred in the United States over the past six years, Pres. Herman D. Kenin of the Musicians declared here.

The two most "discernible trends," Kenin said, have been an increasing popular enthusiasm for the arts and a "growing concern" about their status by the government.

"In both these fields," he noted, "organized labor has taken a consistently purposeful role."

Kenin discussed current programs for support of music, theater and other arts—as well as prospects for the future—before the annual convention of the Intl. Secretariat of Entertainment Trade Unions, an affiliate of the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions.

The meeting brought together representatives of entertainment unions from all parts of the globe. Among others attending from the United States were John L. Dales, national executive secretary of the Screen Actors Guild, and Chester L. Migden, SAG's associate national executive secretary.

Kenin, an AFL-CIO vice president, told the convention that labor has promoted the arts in the U.S. in two principal ways: By improving the material status of workers so as to give them greater opportunity to enjoy entertainment and take part in cultural activities, and by pressing for more government interest in the arts.

'Continuing' Effort

As an example of the latter, he described how more than 600 Musicians' locals in the U.S. have a "continuing" program of political activity that emphasizes to Congress "our special interest in expansion of the performing arts."

Kenin noted that in 1961, when the bill was first introduced in Congress to provide for a Federal Advisory Council of the Arts, it carried no appropriation except $100,000 a year for administration.

By contrast, he reported, Congress now has before it legislation to appropriate $139 million next year to support the "most extensive federal arts program in the nation's history."

Although the prospects are not bright for enactment of the total appropriation, Kenin continued, "the most encouraging aspect of this proposal is that it is being made" and being given "serious consideration" in Congress.

The development and interest in art in America is such that "it is no longer the pet of the few," Kenin said. "It has been taken over and now belongs to the masses, in the true sense of the word."

"I may be unduly optimistic," he concluded, "but I think I see a tide rising for the performing arts in America. I believe that we are not too far away from tremendously exciting cultural accomplishments."

SPACE Council Opens D.C. Office

The Council of AFL-CIO Unions for Scientific, Professional & Cultural Employes — its initials spell SPACE — has opened a headquarters office at 2600 Virginia Ave., NW, Washington, D.C. 20037. The telephone number is 337-5077.

Eighteen unions representing workers in the professions, sciences and the arts are affiliated with the council, which was established last spring as a coordinating agency. Pres. Herman D. Kenin of the Musicians is president of the council; Pres. Charles Cogen of the Teachers is vice president, and Pres. Jerry Wurf of the State, County & Municipal Employes is treasurer. The group's full-time executive secretary is Jack Golodner.

Pilot Project Promotes Union Cultural Activity

A pilot project aimed at stimulating organized labor's participation in community cultural affairs is being undertaken following approval of an Executive Council study.

The program will be a joint effort handled by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Community Services and the new Council of AFL-CIO Unions for Scientific, Professional & Cultural Employes. The pilot program will involve local central labor bodies in four geographic areas, yet to be named, of varying sizes and cultural backgrounds. Community Services Dir. Leo Perlis and Executive Dir. Jack Golodner of SPACE, will head the operation.

In each community the goal will be the promotion and development of the arts by labor, "including the sponsorship or co-sponsorship of orchestra and other musical concerts, theater and other stage performances, art shows and other museum exhibits," according to a report made to the Executive Council by a subcommittee of AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Vice Pres. Herman Kenin.

The purposes of the proposed program, outlined in the report, are to enrich the quality of life; to promote the constructive use of leisure time; to create a more responsive community climate for organized labor, and to help improve labor's public relations.

The subcommittee had been asked, the report noted, "to study ways and means by which the AFL-CIO can assume 'responsibility toward the goal of true involvement of labor in the cultural life of these United States.'"

The report noted that a mail survey had been made among AFL-CIO affiliates as to the extent of their involvement in the arts and cultural activities and revealed a "diversity of activity, interest and possibilities."

Inquiries Made

The survey was followed up by more detailed inquiries to central labor bodies in potential test areas. The subcommittee then chose to narrow the pilot operation to four cities on a one-year trial basis, after which it will report its findings to the Executive Council.

The subcommittee also recommended that all AFL-CIO affiliates and members be urged to participate more actively within local cultural groups as volunteers and on policy-making boards and committees that "promote, develop and utilize artistic and cultural activities."

At LPIU Convention:

3 Printing Trades Leaders Stress Need for 'Total Unity'

Los Angeles—Leaders of three unions in the printing industry joined in a call for merger of all unions in the industry as they addressed the biennial convention of the Lithographers & Photoengravers.

While the more than 300 delegates spent most of their week-long convention reviewing the progress of the LPIU and the effects of the unification of the photoengraphers and lithographers into the present structure, most of the speeches by leaders of other unions were on the subject of total unity in the printing industry.

LPIU Pres. Kenneth Brown and Bookbinders Pres. John Connolly in the opening sessions of the convention told the delegates that old jurisdictional lines were being wiped out by new technology and full unification of printing unions is urgently needed.

Then, Pres. James Sampson, of the Stereotypers & Electrotypers joined the call for merger.

"We are weary of the bickering and the expense involved in the constantly mounting issues over jurisdiction," Sampson declared.

Sec.-Treas. Frank Creamer of the Stereotypers added his voice to the call for unification, admitting that "possibly we suffer from a trauma of being a small craft union which has an abnormal fear of being swallowed up, and this may be our major problem."

But Creamer and Sampson said their union of about 11,000 members is overcoming such fears. Creamer said the merger of the photoengravers and lithographers "has demonstrated more than anything else that merger can work."

"You have a new organization," he told the LPIU delegates, "one which is geared not just to these years, but to the next century; one which is not tied to archaic organizational structures fashioned 100 years ago, but one which is capable of meeting today's problems and the problems of the next century."

He said that printing union gains at the bargaining table "are being dissipated by jurisdictional disputes, raids of membership, and battles before the National Labor Relations Board."

His own union, he noted, has a six-member board which is "totally united on the value of merger between LPIU and our union."

Creamer also called attention to the merger talks going on between the "two giants of the printing industry" — the Typographical Union and the Printing Pressmen — "which might prove fruitful."

"We cannot succeed unless we fashion a craftsman that will be able to meet competitively not just the needs of the U.S. but the competition from abroad," he said.

Brown predicted merger will come first between his union, the Stereotypers and the Bookbinders, but said that a general merger of all the unions in the industry is essential.

Brown was nominated for reelection without opposition along with Executive Vice Pres. William J. Hall, Recording & Financial Sec. Donald W. Stone, and Treas. Daniel A. Streeter Jr., in addition to other incumbent vice presidents.

Streeter and Stone reported that the LPIU's general fund income is estimated for 1967-68 at $1,982,000, with the current net worth level at $8,079,271, up $634,251 above the 1965 level.

They also reported strike benefits totaling $552,962 were paid out to members during the past two years.

Railroads Reject Pact Based on Board Terms

Chicago—Negotiators for six rail shopcraft unions and the nation's railroads met here briefly but failed to reach agreement on the recommendations of a special Presidential board in their dispute.

After meeting in the office of John P. Hiltz, Jr., chief negotiator for the carriers, spokesmen for both sides emerged to say that no further talks were anticipated.

Vice Pres. Thomas Ramsey of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, spokesman for the shopcrafts, said the unions had entered the meeting willing to sign a voluntary agreement with the same provisions as the board recommended, but the carriers refused to do so.

He said that as far as the unions were concerned the panel's recommendations would now go into effect Oct. 15, as the law creating the board specifies in the event the parties cannot reach agreement voluntarily.

If imposed, the settlement will remain in effect until the parties reach a contract agreement, or until Jan. 1, 1969, at the latest.

Meanwhile, the carriers still held forth the possibility that they will challenge the recommendations in court.

Board's Proposal

The five-man board, headed by Sen. Wayne Morse (D-Ore.), recommended an 11 percent general wage increase over two years for the 137,000 shopmen, plus skill increases amounting to 20 cents an hour for nearly three-fourths of their number.

Board members in addition to Morse are AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, former Sen. Leverett Saltonstall (R.-Mass.), Fred Kappel, retired head of the American Telephone & Telegraph Co., and Theodore Kheel, New York mediator.

Unions involved in the dispute, in addition to the IBEW, are the Railway Carmen, Machinists, Boilermakers, Sheet Metal Workers and Firemen & Oilers. They bargain jointly through the AFL-CIO Railway Employes Dept.

Auto Talks Deadlocked As 160,000 Stay Out

Detroit—The Auto Workers made two counter-proposals in contract negotiations with the struck Ford Motor Co. here but there was still no sign of a break in talks with Ford and the other two members of auto's Big Three—General Motors and Chrysler.

Responding to a press report that Ford Pres. Henry Ford II had accused the union of doing "nothing substantial" toward reaching agreement, UAW Pres. Walter P. Reuther returned to the bargaining table. He proposed that management consider doubling its pension increase offer of $1, and make survivor pension benefits automatic, instead of optional. The answer, the union reported was no to the first, and a qualified yes to the second.

Meanwhile Chrysler Corp. returned to the main bargaining table for the first time since Sept. 6, when 160,000 Ford workers struck and contracts expired at GM and Chrysler. But after a 37-minute session management agreed only that it would continue negotiations on the subcommittee level.

The three companies announced price hikes after the Ford strike began. Chrysler added $133 to the price of new 1967-68 models, GM $110 and Ford $114. Chrysler later amended its price increase to $101, and Douglas Fraser of the UAW bargaining committee told management progress could be made if the company's labor relations policies were as "flexible" as its carpricing policies.

The UAW said that while the corporation blamed the hikes on worker costs and new safety features, the truth is that "neither safety costs nor labor costs provide a legitimate excuse for higher prices." In fact, it added, productivity and high profits "make price cuts rather than price increases possible and desirable." It urged that Congress and Canada's Parliament investigate auto "prices, costs and profits."

The union will hold a special convention here Oct. 8 at which delegates from all UAW locals will be asked to raise dues temporarily from $5 a month to $20 to finance the Ford strike and the struggle for contract improvements elsewhere. All Ford strikers were invited to meet Oct. 1 at a separate rally in Cobo Hall.

In another development, the Rubber Workers announced "100 percent support" for Ford strikers. Earlier the AFL-CIO Executive Council had pledged its full support and said success of the strike is a "matter of concern to the entire" labor movement.

While auto talks continue, UAW bargainers reported little progress in negotiations with six major farm implement companies employing 150,000 union members. Contracts expire Oct. 1 at firms where 100,000 UAW members work — Intl. Harvester, Caterpillar Tractor and Deere & Co.

IUE District Votes Recall Of 2 Officers

The Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers announced that members of the union's New York-New Jersey district voted to recall Milton Weihrauch as president of IUE District 3 and Joseph Iozzi as treasurer. Weihrauch and Iozzi asked for a court order to restrain the union from removing them from office.

Ballots in the recall election were cast by 116 local unions representing 84,941 members. IUE trustees certified the vote as 83,955 for recall, 986 opposed, the union said. The IUE executive board previously had found that the two men violated the IUE ethical practices code in their use of union funds.

Weihrauch and Iozzi denied any violation and asked the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia to issue an injunction restraining the IUE from taking any action.

IUE Pres. Paul Jennings said in a statement he is "looking forward" to court hearings that will permit the union to state its case and require Weihrauch to take the witness stand. Until now, Jennings said, Weihrauch has "refused to answer the charges against him under oath" and also declined in IUE trial procedures to cross-examine witnesses.

Vermont Labor 'Adopts' Handicapped Children

Brattleboro, Vt.—The Vermont AFL-CIO called on the state legislature to expand the state rehabilitation programs for the handicapped and, to point the way, voted to "adopt" the state-subsidized Calverly Child Health Center and its residents, 50 handicapped youngsters.

Convention delegates from 110 local unions collected $200 in cash and pledged additional aid. As long as the need exists, the state labor council will call twice a year—at Christmas and Easter — for donations from every local union, Pres. Ralph E. Williams pledged.

Council officers discovered the need for more help when they went to the center in Pittsford, Vt., to present toys paid for from the proceeds of booths run by labor at the two annual Vermont state fairs. The state's subsidy does not begin to meet the needs of the children, they reported.

The rehabilitation program for crippled persons, mentally retarded, sufferers from alcoholism and the like was begun a few years ago with labor's support. It needs more funding, more teachers and staff members and more training programs, the convention declared.

Delegates also called for a system of free college education, for lowering the voting age to 18, and for a full employment program. They reiterated labor's opposition to a state sales tax.

Williams Re-elected

The convention re-elected Williams and Sec.-Treas. Carroll P. Comstock, Jr., both of Rutland, for one-year terms and chose Martin Berger of the Ladies' Garment Workers as executive vice president; Ruth Colombo as women's activities director and Jane Noury as executive committee member-at-large. Both are from Barre.

Williams reported that, in the year just past, labor was successful in three legislative areas—passage of Vermont's "little Wagner Act" leading to the state's first labor relations board; substantial increases in workmen's compensation benefits; and creation of a state department of labor and industry to supplant the old industrial relations department.

Texas Unions Spur Disaster Relief Effort

than 4,500 of whom found shelter in Texas towns and cities.

Among those directing unionists in rehabilitation activities were Oscar H. Reyna, president of the AFL-CIO Coastal Bend Labor Council, and Mrs. Rosa Walker, head of women's activities for the Texas AFL-CIO.

Others heading various clean-up activities included George Osborn, Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers; Georgia Ann Lesterjett, Walter Jauer and Sarah Jane Fry, all of the Communications Workers.

Labor's key role in the disaster relief effort was exemplified in the use of CWA Local 6137's hall here as state Red Cross headquarters for the emergency.

"It would have been impossible for us to set up quickly—or perhaps set up at all—without the help we received from unions," one Red Cross official said.

Agents Vote On New Pact At Prudential

The Insurance Workers called off a two-day work stoppage against the Prudential Insurance Co. of America when union and management negotiators reached agreement on terms of a new contract covering 17,000 agents in 35 states and the District of Columbia.

The union said it will ask Prudential agents to vote by Oct. 15 on accepting or rejecting a company proposal to increase contract benefits by $6.45 a week.

The offer includes a $5 increase in the special debit allowance, plus other improvements in paying commissions. A major gain, the union reported, was a management offer to pay 50 percent of pension costs, now paid largely by the agent himself.

The agreement was reached in Washington as the union executive board was preparing to vote on strike authorization and the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service offered to help mediate. IWIU represents all organized Prudential agents except 1,900 for whom an unaffiliated union bargains.

Demands $5 Billion Slash:

GOP-Led Coalition in House Moves to Gut Key Programs

took his fight to the House floor. When his amendment was ruled out of order, he then moved to send the bill back to committee.

Bow told the House that a vote to recommit would be in effect a vote to instruct the committee to add the budget-cutting directive to the legislation.

Appropriations Committee Chairman George H. Mahon (D-Tex.), himself a conservative, argued in vain that the House would be abdicating its responsibility for appropriations by delegating to the President the job it should do itself—if it wanted spending reduced.

He held some, but not enough, conservative Democrats with him on the argument. The Republican leadership, on the other hand, garnered the vote of the small but sometimes decisive moderate-liberal GOP bloc, most of whose members had voted against heavy slashes in domestic programs.

In the background of the conflict was the tax increase controversy. A number of influential congressmen of both parties have said they will support the higher taxes sought by Pres. Johnson only if it is accompanied by spending cuts. Johnson has promised that after Congress acts on appropriations, he will review the situation and, wherever possible, order federal agencies not to spend their full appropriations.

This pledge apparently didn't satisfy the economy bloc and the move to force a specific spending cut followed. Significantly, Chairman Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.) of the tax-writing Ways & Means Committee was one of the Democrats voting with the Republicans for the $5 billion slash.

The labor movement has confidence in America, Biemiller said, which the House majority apparently doesn't share. AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, he noted, has "made our position quite clear—we believe America can afford to defend freedom in Viet Nam and simultaneously meet the problems on the home front."

Democratic leaders balked at the budget-slash rider and were seeking a way to put through an emergency resolution to finance the government beyond Sept. 30. Most federal agencies will apparently have to operate without funds until the deadlock is broken.

The administration also faced a long-range problem of overcoming demands for ironclad assurances of heavy spending cuts as the price of a tax increase.

There was better news on the Senate side of the Capitol.

On the floor was an anti-poverty bill which called for an expansion of the program beyond the Administration's budget request.

The bill also includes a billion-dollar a year emergency job program, not sought by the Administration but strongly urged by labor and a bipartisan liberal bloc. It is designed to create 200,000 jobs for the hard-core unemployed this year and 300,000 next year. Its co-sponsors are Senators Joseph S. Clark (D-Pa.) and Jacob K. Javits (R-N.Y.).

A Republican attempt to "spin-off" the highly-praised Head Start program from the Office of Economic Opportunity to the Office of Education was soundly beaten, 54-35.

If successful, it could have paved the way for other amendments completely dismembering the government's anti-poverty agency and assigning its programs to old-line federal departments.

While the Senate continued to debate the bill, the House Education & Labor Committee wrestled with a companion measure. Committee Democrats had hoped to reach an agreement with Republicans to avoid a major battle on the House floor. But the effort apparently failed, over Republican demands for transfer of key programs out of OEO.

A foreshadow of the problems that may face the anti-poverty bill on the House floor appeared when a relatively non-controversial juvenile delinquency bill became the focus of a states' rights battle.

As proposed by Pres. Johnson, $25 million in federal grants would have gone directly to states, cities, and local agencies for programs to combat juvenile delinquency.

The House conservative coalition took over and amended the bill to hand over 75 percent of the money to states to use as they see fit. Another amendment adopted barred any funds from going to any agency or group financed by the Office of Economic Opportunity.

It isn't home rule by any means, but residents of the District of Columbia would be able to elect their own school board, under a bill that passed the House, 324-3. Pres. Johnson hailed the action and urged swift Senate approval so that the first election can be held next spring.

A bill long sought by the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept. moved a big step forward. The House Rules Committee cleared for floor action legislation to establish an independent maritime agency. The Maritime Administration presently is under the Dept. of Commerce and union opposition last year blocked an Administration attempt to include it as part of the new Dept. of Transportation.

Action Urged to Bar Alien Strikebreakers

who have come to the United States to live as well as to work.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council, at its recent meeting, charged that the Immigration & Naturalization Service has interpreted the regulation curbing alien strikebreakers so narrowly that it has been rendered "impotent and devoid of meaning."

Its interpretation, the council said, is that "foreign strikebreakers are not in violation of the regulation unless they came directly from a foreign land for the specific purpose of taking a job in a struck field. Therefore, 'green card' holders already in the states are being used as strikebreakers and growers who are not struck are importing workers who are then transferred into the strikebound fields."

The council called for a flat prohibition against the use of alien labor "at any time, in any place and in any form" as strikebreakers and a strict enforcement policy.

Strikebreakers Imported

Chavez and Kircher told the subcommittee, headed by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), of the use of alien strikebreakers at the Giumarra Vineyards, near Bakersfield, Calif.

On Aug. 3, Chavez recounted, "over 800 workers walked out of the Giumarra field" after management refused the union's request for a representation election. The workers were primarily Mexican-Americans, permanent residents of the area.

For a week there were no workers in the fields, Chavez said. Then the owners brought in between 200 and 300 people "recruited from the Mexicali-Tijuana area . . . and transported 200 miles into the company camps."

Chavez said he asked the local immigration officer to enforce the regulation. Said Chavez: "He finally told me they were not going to go into the fields behind the picket lines to investigate our complaints because if they did they were going to surely incur the wrath of the growers and they didn't want that."

Chavez told the subcommittee: "The Immigration Service has a game they play. We call the local office and we are told the man in Los Angeles is in charge, and if we call the man in Los Angeles we are referred back to the officer in Bakersfield."

Kircher stressed that the "law is clear that immigration which threatens to depress American standards of wages, benefits and conditions, or the breaking of strikes designed to achieve such standards is not to be permitted."

Labor's quarrel, he said, is with the Immigration & Naturalization Service's interpretation of its regulations which leaves "a large loophole through which American employers are enabled to obtain and utilize the services of green card holders as strikebreakers."

He said the the loophole can be closed by administrative action "and it is this kind of action that we have urged, and again urge, the attorney general to take and assure."

Jack T. Conway, executive director of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., told the subcommittee that the present ineffective curbs

"allow unscrupulous employers to continue to exploit poverty-stricken alien workers and deny the democratic rights of our own workers."

He stressed that "the losers are the workers—whether they are Mexican nationals or Mexican-American citizens. Both groups have long been the victims of unprincipled employers who play one against the other in order to keep both in economic bondage."

40-Year Pattern

Immigration & Naturalization Service Commissioner Raymond F. Farrell told the subcommittee that the green card system has been in effect 40 years and his agency doubts whether major changes can be made without congressional action. He said, however, that the attorney and the secretary of labor have been conferring "to see what else might be done."

Wirtz, in his testimony, cited "convincing evidence that alien commuters have harmed American labor standards, particularly on the Mexican border."

Those most hurt, Wirtz declared, are "those United States residents who are the most disadvantaged, who are the least able to compete for better paying jobs."

McGee Blames 'R-T-W' For 'Stagnant' Economy

Casper, Wyo.—Sen. Gale McGee (D-Wyo.) charged here that Wyoming's "right to work" law "was not a home-grown product, but an outgrowth of a large-scale and extremely damaging injection of right-wing money" into the state.

In an address to the Wyoming State-CIO convention, McGee also cited statistics to show that the state has suffered from a "stagnating economy" since passage of the law banning union shop agreements in 1963.

Meanwhile, delegates to the convention launched a new drive pledging labor to "do everything in its power" to get the law repealed when the state legislature meets again in 1969. This year a repealer passed the House only to be bottled up in a Senate committee.

Funds Solicited

McGee read to the delegates from a letter written by the head of one Wyoming corporation to other state businessmen soliciting funds for the National Right to Work Committee to fight against any repeal effort.

Noting that the letter openly boasted that "help" from outside the state had been instrumental in getting the law passed, McGee said: "This kind of help, Wyoming can do without."

He cited statistics to show that since "right to work" the state has lost citizens at the rate of 8.2 percent a year—the highest "move-out" rate in the nation and now has the second lowest industrial growth rate among states.

Also, he pointed out, in the first two years under "right to work" the state's level of per capita income had dropped from a point of $18 above the national average to $188 below the national average.

The senator charged that extremists "are again coming out of the woodwork in our state, and one of their foremost goals is defense of the 'right-to-work' law."

A convention-adopted resolution asking each affiliated local to contribute $2 per member toward a repeal drive stressed that the law not only has hurt unions but also has "sapped the forward progress of all citizens."

Sharing attention with "right to work" at the convention was an election in which the delegates chose Mark E. Nicksic of the Steelworkers as president and Roy G. Stouffer of the Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen as vice president.

Teachers Fight New York Fines, Jailing

Vow Court Battle on State Law

New York—The American Federation of Teachers pledged a determined fight "through the highest court in the land" if necessary to void a jail sentence pronounced against the president of its New York local and a $150,000 fine levied on the local.

The parent AFT called the sentence one that "smacks of police state tactics" and declared that "the nation's teachers will not submit" to any form of "involuntary servitude." The New York State AFL-CIO convention here offered its "full resources" to the 50,000 city teachers who submitted mass resignations and withheld their services for two weeks until an acceptable contract had been negotiated.

State Supreme Court Justice Emilio Nunez imposed a 15-day jail sentence and a $250 fine on Pres. Albert Shanker of the United Federation of Teachers—Local 2 of the AFT — and a $150,000 fine on the local after UFT members voted to accept contract terms and reported to their classrooms. He found the defendants guilty of "willful disobedience" of a court order to end an "illegal strike"—a strike he held was prohibited under the state's Taylor Act forbidding strikes by public employes.

The court delayed imposition of sentence 10 days to allow time for filing an appeal. Shanker said the union will wage an all-out legal fight in defense of the right of teachers and other public employes to withhold their services during a bona fide labor dispute.

Appeal Set

"We plan to appeal the court's decision," Shanker said, "and we don't intend to pay any fines until we have taken this appeal" through the highest court.

In Washington, AFT Pres. Charles Cogen issued a statement charging the fines and jail sentence were "based on outmoded concepts of law and government" that led to the Declaration of Independence from Great Britain and the Revolutionary War.

Asserting that New York teachers were "fighting for improved conditions for the students as well as benefits for themselves," Cogen declared "if these harsh penalties are allowed to stand, collective bargaining for

Senate Backs Expansion Of Anti-Poverty Program

Meany Asks Controls on Doctor Fees

Soaring physician fees to medicare patients were sharply condemned by AFL-CIO President George Meany as he called for federal cost controls "to prevent severe hardship to elderly medicare participants."

Meany urged immediate, effective controls on doctor fees in a letter to Health, Education & Welfare Sec. John W. Gardner.

He noted that Gardner had recently reported that premiums for more than 17 million participants in the supplementary medical insurance program might have to be raised next April from $3 to $4 a month—a one-third increase.

Including the $50 deductible feature, patients would have to pay out nearly $100 a year before getting any reimbursement for medical bills, Meany pointed out.

He observed that the major reason given for the higher costs "is the unprecedented rise in physicians' fees" in the past two years.

"There is no excuse whatsoever for this relentless escalation in physicians' fees, especially those charged under the medicare program," Meany charged.

He said doctor fees have risen nearly three times the increase in the overall cost-of-living. And he addded that "physicians' incomes, now probably averaging $35-$40,000 a year, have risen even more

GOP Leads Coalition:

House Renews Battle Over Budget Slash

The House backed down from a demand that Pres. Johnson slash $5 billion from non-defense programs, but a Republican-led coalition opened a series of new attacks on the Administration's budget.

Caught in the crossfire was the appropriations bill for programs of the Labor Dept. and the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare. The $13.1 billion money bill had already been trimmed in House-Senate conference $146 million below the budget request. The House voted 226-173 to send it back to conference for possible further cuts after an angry, shouting debate erupted over the sincerity of GOP economy demands.

Another casualty was the President's request for a tax hike. Ten of the 15 Democrats on the House Ways & Means Committee joined all 10 committee Republicans in voting to set aside the tax bill "until such time as the President and the Congress reach an understanding on spending curbs."

Committee Chairman Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.) said bluntly that at the present time "there is no chance" of getting either committee or House approval of higher taxes.

House Democrats did manage to close ranks sufficiently to reverse a stunning defeat on the budget issue a week earlier.

A solid Republican bloc, aided by 34 breakaway Democrats, had on Sept. 27 blocked passage of a routine bill allowing government agencies to meet their payrolls and expenses during October.

The bill would not pass, GOP leaders said, unless it included an unprecedented order to Pres. Johnson to cut $5 billion from non-defense programs. Since some non-defense items such as interest on the national debt can't be reduced, the effect would have been to slash domestic programs by nearly 25 percent.

Digest Accused of Social Security Lies

AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller accused Reader's Digest of lying to the American people about social security and promoting its article with a "horrible" advertisement.

In a wire to the magazine Biemiller said the AFL-CIO is "appalled by your ad" for an article attacking the social security system. "Your article is false and misleading," Biemiller declared, adding: "Social security is completely secure and you know it."

The ad in the New York Times shows a ripped social security card under a heading "How Secure Is Your Social Security."

Job Plan Loses by Slim Vote

The Senate voted to expand the nation's anti-poverty programs and came within a few votes of adding a new, labor-backed emergency job program for the hard-core unemployed. It gave a strong vote of confidence—and authorized a substantially higher spending ceiling—for the Office of Economic Opportunity.

As sent to the House, the bill lifts the ceiling on appropriations for anti-poverty programs to $2.26 billion this year and $2.4 billion next year. The Administration's budget request had only $2.06 billion for the current year.

Faces House Fight

A powerful economy coalition in the House is expected to try to cut back the poverty program and "spin off" many OEO programs to other agencies.

All these moves were soundly beaten in the Senate and the bill's chief sponsor, Sen. Joseph S. Clark (D-Pa.) told his colleagues that the Senate's action in raising the spending ceiling will give its conferees needed "wiggle room" in negotiating a compromise.

Equally significant with the strong boost for the existing poverty programs was the impressive bipartisan support rallied for an emergency job plan.

Initially, the Senate Labor Committee tacked a two-year, $2.8 billion emergency job plan onto the poverty bill. Co-sponsored by Clark and Sen. Jacob K. Javits (R-N.Y.), it would have created 200,000 jobs this year and 300,000 next year in the public-service sector of the economy. It would have been, the AFL-CIO said, an important first step towards creation of a needed one million jobs.

Strong Showing

Since the Adminisration was opposed to such a program, most observers expected the proposal to be routinely rejected on the Senate floor.

Its sponsors, however, succeeded in forming a strong bipartisan alliance behind a compromise introduced by Sen. Winston L. Prouty (R-Vt.). This included a smaller-sized emergency job program with measures to encourage—but not subsidize—private employers to train disadvantaged youngsters for existing jobs.

California Board Sets $1.65 Minimum Pay

Mrs. Dorothy Colton went to work last summer for $1.30 an hour.

As a result of her experience, the minimum wage for women and minors in California will rise on Feb. 1 to $1.65 an hour.

Mrs. Colton is the public member of the State Industrial Welfare Commission. She voted with the two labor members for the 35-cent increase in the wage floor.

The two employer members of the commission complained that the increase was too much. They termed it "capricious, arbitrary, despotic."

Mrs. Colton was unimpressed. She took a $1.30-an-hour job as a telephone reservations clerk "to get a better personal understanding of what it costs to have a minimum standard of living." She met and worked with women "living in degrading poverty" at the $1.30 level.

In announcing her decision to vote for a $1.65 minimum, Mrs. Colton said it is "impossible" in California to live at a "minimum, decent level" on less than that.

Mrs. Colton and the labor members—J. J. Rodriguez of the Meat Cutters and Ruth Compagnon of the Hotel & Restaurant Employes—also voted to reduce the maximum straight-time workweek from 48 to 40 hours.

The commission majority rejected an employer proposal to set a lower wage floor for farm workers. The $1.65 minimum applies to farms employing five or more workers. Agriculture,

NABET Votes On New Offer From NBC

New York—The Broadcast Employes got a second contract offer from the National Broadcasting Co. and sent it to referendum but reported "no movement" in talks with the American Broadcasting Co., where 1,500 NABET members have been on strike since Sept. 22.

The NBC offer was "considerably better" than one rejected by the unit last month, NABET said. It "broke the 40-hour barrier" by proposing to reduce hours to 37.5 in November 1968 — five months sooner than in the previous proposal. Also it added $8 a week to beginning minimums and contained other improvements, the union reported.

Referendum ballots cast by members at NBC will be counted Oct. 10.

An ABC meeting called at the request of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service brought no change in the position of labor or management. Union members are picketing ABC stations in New York, Chicago, San Franciso, Los Angeles and Washington, D.C., in a strike for contract improvements.

NABET reported that other broadcast unions are honoring its picket lines. It said members of its Cleveland Local 42 at Station WKYC-TV voted to donate half their weekly pay to the ABC strikers, and other locals are considering similar action.

RETIREMENT congratulations are extended to Harry W. Flannery, AFL-CIO radio coordinator, by Federation Pres. George Meany. Flannery retired Sept. 29 after 16 years of service to the federation and the former AFL.

AFL-CIO Broadcaster Harry Flannery Retires

Harry W. Flannery, radio coordinator for the AFL-CIO Dept. of Public Relations, retired Sept. 29 following 16 years of service to the federation and the former AFL.

A charter member of the St. Louis local, American Federation of Radio Artists (now American Federation of Radio & Television Artists), he was elected local president in 1937. He is also a long-time member of the Newspaper Guild, the Screen Actors Guild and a former council member of the Radio Writers Guild.

Flannery, now 67, began his journalism career at the age of 16 as a reporter and later sports editor of the Hagerstown (Md.) Mail. He also worked for the Baltimore Sun, the Chicago City News Bureau, the Albany Evening News, the Ft. Wayne Hoosier Observer, the Los Angeles Examiner and the Catholic Digest.

Flannery pioneered in radio journalism, beginning as news editor of WOWO, Ft. Wayne, in 1932, and news editor and analyst for KMOX, St. Louis, from 1935-1940. During 1940-41, he was CBS correspondent in Berlin. He then became war correspondent for CBS in the China-Burma-India theater. After World War II he spent eight years as news analyst for the CBS West Coast Network.

Throughout his career, Flannery has been closely associated with union and social action movements, both secular and religious. He is a former president of the Catholic Association for Intl. Peace and a founder of the Catholic Labor Institute, Leo XIII School of Social Action.

Wrote 4 Books

A frequent contributor to national magazines and other publications, Flannery is the author of four books: Assignment to Berlin, Pattern for Peace, The Church and the Working Man, and the soon-to-be published Which Way, Germany?

He became editor of the AFL News-Reporter in 1952 and AFL-CIO radio coordinator following the merger in 1955. He produced and moderated such federation radio programs as Washington Reports to the People, As We See It, and Labor News Conference.

Flannery earned his degree in journalism at the University of Notre Dame in 1923. He was the founder and first editor of the Notre Dame Daily, as well as the editor of the Dome, the Scholastic and the Juggler.

His broadcast scripts, tapes and personal papers are now in the files of the Mass Communications History Center at the University of Wisconsin. Scripts of his 1940-41 CBS broadcasts from Berlin are in the library of the Broadcast Pioneers of History Project in New York City.

Flannery and his wife, Ruth, plan to make their home in the Los Angeles area during retirement.

Teachers Pledge Fight To Void Fines, Jailing

public employes everywhere will be undermined."

The nation's teachers, Cogen said, "will continue to strive for genuine free collective bargaining. Otherwise they would be subjected to a form of involuntary servitude."

He said the court decision "only strengthens our determination to press forward until all teachers are free."

Delegates to the New York State AFL-CIO convention denounced the sentence as a "union busting tactic" and said labor will not permit a return to the days of "government by court injunction." The gathering pledged a fight to repeal the Taylor Act.

In pronouncing sentence, Justice Nunez said "law means nothing unless it means the same for all." He declared there was no question that the Taylor Act, substituted recently for the Condon-Wadlin low, prohibits strikes and that the UFT and its president violated that law. Charges against union Vice Pres. George Altomare and Treas. David Wittes were dismissed by Nunez because of insufficient proof.

The teachers started the school year Sept. 29 after staying out nearly three weeks in a contract dispute. The School Board obtained a temporary restraining order a day before schools were due to open and Nunez issued a temporary injunction.

UFT members voted down a school contract proposal Sept. 10, and stayed out until new terms were put in writing and ratified.

Months ago the UFT put the city on notice that reasonable contract terms would have to be negotiated before school opened. Frequently it charged that school officials were "dragging their heels" and that union members would not report for work without a vote to ratify. Several warnings that a delay was in the offing were issued before the starting date arrived.

The final vote to accept the contract came Sept. 28 at a union meeting in Madison Square Garden. By a vote of 18,177 to 3,442, local members accepted a 26-month contract providing wage improvements, reductions in maximum class sizes, free periods giving teachers class preparation time, and establishment of a $10 million fund for school improvements of benefit to both pupils and teachers.

Lashman Named To HUD Staff

Housing & Urban Development Sec. Robert C. Weaver has announced the appointment of L. Edward Lashman, Jr., as his assistant for congressional services.

Lashman, 43, has been an AFL-CIO legislative representative for the past two years, served earlier on the COPE staff and has done full-time union work since 1951. He was assistant publicity director of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers from 1955 to 1964.

Replacing Lashman on the AFL-CIO legislative staff is Ray Denison, who has been with the federation's Dept. of Public Relations since 1963. For five years before that, Denison was administrative director of the Seafarers' Great Lakes District. Earlier he served 10 years as managing editor of the SIU's Seafarers Log and on the staff of the Auto Workers' newspaper, Solidarity.

Staff Chief Named for U.S. Labor Policy Study

Louis S. Wallerstein has been named staff director of Pres. Johnson's review committee on federal employe - management relations. Wallerstein is chief of the federal employe-management relations division of the Labor Dept.

The cabinet - level committee, headed by Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, has announced that public hearings will be held during the week of Oct. 23.

Ford Walkout in 5th Week

Deadlock Triggers Caterpillar Strike

Detroit—Stalemated contract negotiations triggered a strike by 26,000 members of the Auto Workers against Caterpillar Tractor Co., largest U.S. maker of earth-moving machinery.

As UAW contracts with Caterpillar, Intl. Harvester Co. and Deere & Co. expired Oct. 1, the union chose to strike only one of the three. At the unstruck firms it agreed to contract extensions while continuing to negotiate terms similar to those it seeks in the auto industry.

The Caterpillar strike occurred as 160,000 UAW members entered the fifth week of their strike against Ford Motor Co.

The UAW announced it would provide work crews to remove finished parts from several closed plants for shipment to the Army in Viet Nam. Both union and management said they would honor the request of the General Services Administration for Ford parts "which cannot be supplied from dealer stock."

UAW negotiators reported that the three big farm implement firms followed the same pattern in negotiations as their management counterparts in auto—one modest contract proposal on a "take it or leave it" basis. The resulting strike was called at Caterpillar plants here and in Peoria and Aurora, Ill.; Davenport, Ia.; Denver, Colo.; Cleveland, O.; York, Pa.; Kansas City, Mo., and Shreveport, La.

Same Issues

The issues are the same in farm machinery as in auto—a wage increase keyed to higher productivity and increased profits, protection against wage erosion due to steadily rising prices, and against job erosion caused by subcontracting; salary status rather than hourly wage payments; higher wage increases for workers in skilled trades, and other contract improvements.

At Caterpillar the UAW negotiating committee rejected an offer of 10 cents an hour more for the first year of a three-year contract, and an increase of 2.8 percent the second and third years. This, the union said, is far out of line, with 1966 Caterpillar profits of more than $150 million for a 23 percent return on stockholders' investments.

The UAW also is negotiating with other firms whose contracts have not expired—Allis-Chalmers, the Oliver division of White Motor Co., and Massey Ferguson Inc. The union represents 150,000 employes of all farm equipment firms.

Shortly before the Caterpillar strike, 4,400 other Auto Workers walked out at the Detroit plant of Burroughs Corp. after voting to reject company contract offers. The turndown had no relation to the issues in the auto strike but reflected membership dissatisfaction with delayed benefits in a 3.5-year contract, the union said. Burroughs makes business machines.

Meanwhile, the UAW reported no progress in continuing contract talks with the struck Ford Motor Co. and with General Motors and Chrysler Corp. where members remain on the job. Ford announced layoffs at plants in Windsor, Ont., and said a shortage of parts normally produced in the U.S. would soon require a shutdown of all its Canadian plants. Canadian contracts have not yet expired but negotiations there are dragging, too, the UAW said.

The union held a report meeting for Ford strikers Oct. 1 in Cobo Hall and scheduled a special convention here Oct. 8 to vote on a temporary dues increase. At the Ford meeting, UAW Pres. Walter P. Reuther told an audience of 8,000 that "Ford workers have been shortchanged in their equity" and pledged that "so long as the company denies us our fair share, so long will there be no Fords produced."

Ford Board Chairman Henry Ford II did not accept a union invitation to address the meeting.

Sub-Par Pay, Conditions Cited by 3M Strikers

St. Paul, Minn.—Inferior wages and working conditions led 3,300 members of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers to strike the Minnesota Mining & Mfg. Co. (3M) and will keep them on the picket lines until a fair agreement is reached, the strikers said.

Members of OCAW Local 6-75 at the main 3M plant here and of Local 6-418 at the Hastings, Minn., plant walked out Sept. 17, when both plants stopped operations. They gave this report on conditions that caused the dispute:

- The company clings to an "unusually poor" pension system requiring employes to pay a larger share of the premiums than in most other successful firms.
- Wages are pegged to "area surveys" that include rates paid by smaller companies. The union said 3M's best offer would have frozen St. Paul and Hastings wages to area surveys for the next three years.

Union members want a contract of no more than two years' duration, plus a cost-of-living escalator or a reopening clause for protection against rising living expenses.

Better vacation language, higher holiday pay and other items also are in dispute but, in addition to money, an accumulation of grievances led to the vote to strike, OCAW said.

The main source of dissatisfaction, according to strikers, is their awareness that modest wage increases in the last contract have disappeared—eaten up by the high cost of living.

"They want a contract that will assure us that cannot happen again," a spokesman said.

Former contracts expired Aug. 27 but were extended to Sept. 17 in an effort to achieve settlement. During negotiations, 3M representatives walked out of a bargaining session because the OCAW committee was accompanied by two members of other unions representing 3M employes in some of the company's 67 other plants.

The union filed a refusal-to-bargain charge and, while it was being heard, the National Labor Relations Board asked for a temporary injunction compelling management to comply with the law. Company negotiators returned when an injunction was issued by U. S. District Judge Philip Neville here but its attitude toward contract improvement did not change, the OCAW said.

The 3M company makes adhesive tape and other products in a nation-wide chain of plants. It has contracts with 55 local unions and more than 20 international unions.

First Session in 6 Weeks:

New Union Proposal Stirs Copper Talks

Salt Lake City—Long-stalled bargaining in the non-ferrous metals strike began to show some movement as the Steelworkers submitted a new contract proposal to Kennecott Copper Corp. and federal mediators stepped up efforts to bring about a settlement.

The walkout by 40,000 workers against Kennecott and seven other producers began July 15.

The USWA proposal, submitted by Vice Pres. Joseph P. Molony, followed the first meeting in six weeks between management and representatives of the 19 unions coordinating their bargaining efforts. The session was held at the invitation of Gov. Calvin L. Rampton (D).

The USWA said its offer would cost Kennecott 99 cents an hour more in wages, pensions and other benefits over a three-year period. But a company spokesman said the union had "failed to present a reasonable, coherent counterproposal."

The parties were called together again the next day by Federal Mediator S. Lyle Johnson, and the talks were continuing at the Federal Building here as the AFL-CIO News went to press.

Malony said the unions have been prepared to bargain for weeks but could not get any of the companies to return to the bargaining table until now. An agreement can be reached separately with Kennecott, he said, emphasizing that local bargaining committees have full authority to settle with that firm and the others—Anaconda, Phelps Dodge, American Smelting & Refining Co., Magma Copper Co., Inspiration Consolidated Copper Co., U.S. Metals Co. and Miami Copper Co.

Meanwhile in Washington, Senate Democratic leader Mike Mansfield said he had asked Pres. Johnson to name a committee to study the impact of the copper strike on national defense and to consider "all available means" to end the stoppage.

Mansfield said that an 80-day back-to-work order under the Taft-Hartley Act would not be helpful, nor would compulsory arbitration. He urged that labor and management get together soon on settlement terms.

In Pittsburgh, the USWA Research Dept. issued a report detailing the 20-year fragmentation of bargaining in basic copper and in the copper and brass mills. This year, the report said, the picture was sharply altered by the merger of the two largest unions—the USWA and the Mine, Mill & Smelter Workers—and the coordination for bargaining purposes of 19 AFL-CIO affiliated unions.

Charging the industry with "shortsightedness . . . in failing to adapt" to changed conditions, the USWA listed the reasons for the walkout:

Poor Contracts

"Every plant has a separate agreement. Termination dates vary. There are no company-wide agreements such as long since have become commonplace in most industries.

"Wage levels are inadequate. Pensions are among the lowest in American industry. With one exception, all major companies have refused to install a job classification program to rationalize their wage structures."

In many plants, the study showed, rates for the same jobs are different. Even within each company, nearly every plant has a different level of wages.

MacDonald Named Acting CLC Chief

Ottawa — Donald MacDonald, secretary-treasurer of the Canadian Labor Congress, has been named acting president by the CLC's Executive Council. MacDonald has been carrying out the duties of the office since the illness of Pres. Claude Jodoin early this year.

MacDonald, 58, is a former Mine Worker and holds membership in the Woodworkers. He became secretary-treasurer and chief executive officer of the former Canadian Congress of Labor in 1951. On the merger with the Trades & Labor Congress of Canada in 1956, he was elected secretary-treasurer and re-elected at each convention since.

CONSERVATION of resources was a "lifelong ideal of Philip Murray," Steelworkers District Dir. Joseph Germano said in dedicating a 40-acre grove of California redwood trees as a memorial to the late president of the USWA and the former CIO. The grove in Calaveras State Park is part of a 2,500-acre tract bought with contributions from the union and other groups and matching funds from the state of California.

Redwoods Memorialize Philip Murray

Calaveras State Park, Calif.—Labor joined with civic and government organizations here in dedicating a grove of towering redwood trees as a memorial to the late Philip Murray, who headed both the Steelworkers and the former CIO before his death in 1952.

Dir. Joseph Germano of the USWA's Chicago district, speaking for USWA Pres. I. W. Abel, said that conservation of resources was a "lifelong ideal" of Murray who "believed that our union should concern itself not only about the immediate needs of our members but also should help preserve the blessings of our land for future generations."

Abel sent a message saying that saving the redwood trees "is a fitting tribute to a man who had deep compassion for people" and who therefore was "most deserving of this perpetual memorial."

Germano and speakers representing the Calaveras Grove Assn. and the Resources Agency of California spoke at a ceremony held in the shade of redwoods—some 30 feet in diameter and 300 feet high.

The grove memorializing the Scottish-born Murray is part of a 2,500-acre park section bought with donations by the Steelworkers and other groups, and matching funds from the state.

Cabaret Performers Win ID Card Repeal

New York—Future visitors to "Fun City," as New York City often calls itself, are likely to get better cabaret entertainment from happier entertainers because of an action taken by the city council.

By a 35-to-1 vote, it repealed the city's 36-year-old law requiring entertainers in cabarets and dance halls to carry identification cards and Mayor John Lindsay signed the repeal legislation.

The law is a carryover from the prohibition era when it was used to keep entertainers from appearing in speakeasies. Until last year, entertainers also were being fingerprinted when they obtained cards.

The statute had been an anathema to entertainers' unions for many years. They helped to get the license commission to drop the fingerprinting procedure and their representatives were leading witnesses at a council hearing that preceded repeal.

Among those testifying in favor of the repeal legislation were Sec.-Treas. Morris Iushewitz of the New York Central Labor Council and Pres. Conrad Nagel of the Actors & Artistes, which charters performing unions.

Big Grievance

Iushewitz told the council that the law "has been a tremendous grievance on the part of the theatrical unions."

He noted that performers in Carnegie Hall or restaurant waiters do not need an ID card, but once they worked in a cabaret they were "discriminated" against by being forced to obtain the card.

Penny Singleton, a vice president of the Variety Artists, testified that the city "would have many more entertainers" if the law were abolished. "Business in hotels and clubs would improve greatly," she added.

Actor-folk singer Theodore Bikel, vice president of Actors Equity, charged that the law "violates the assumption of innocence which is guaranteed to other citizens."

"It is demeaning to the dignity of a human being to have to show proof of innocence before being allowed to ply his trade," he added.

New York's license commissioner Joel Tyler testified that the law "is no longer relevant" and R. Harcourt Dodds, deputy police commissioner, said the cards did not increase the police department's capacity to protect the public.

Just before the council voted on repeal, Michael J. Lazar, Queens councilman, read a telegram from singer Frank Sinatra. He thanked the council for taking up the matter and pointed out that the law was his reason for refusing New York nightclub dates.

"It has been difficult for me to understand why the city of New York, which aspires to be the entertainment capital of the world, has continued to treat people who work in cabarets as second-class citizens," Sinatra declared.

Penn State U. To Preserve USWA Papers

Pittsburgh, Pa.—The Steelworkers announced that Pennsylvania State University has agreed to keep the union's official records and documents for use by scholars and historians in chronicling labor history.

USWA Pres. I. W. Abel and Penn State Pres. Eric A. Walker said union personnel and members of the university's Dept. of Labor Studies will travel around the country taping interviews with members who helped organize and build the union. The tapes will be transcribed and deposited in the archives as a part of the record, they said.

30 Talks Recorded

Penn State already has transcribed interviews with 30 "old timers" who remember the pioneer efforts of the 1930s, Dr. Walker said.

Inactive USWA records, manuscripts and archival material will be transferred to Penn State's Pattee Library at University Park, near State College, Pa. The material will include the papers of USWA headquarters here and 29 district offices in the U.S. and Canada.

Abel said the history of the union, and the labor movement, is "an all-important part of our heritage" which should not be destroyed. Walker said the story of Pennsylvania is "not complete without the story of labor." The university considers it part of a broad program for the study of all aspects of cultural life, he said.

Rockettes Prefer Picket Line Pace To Dancing to Management's Tune

New York—A human interest story became a trade union story as the strike of Rockettes and ballet dancers against the Radio City Music Hall moved into its fourth week.

It was a human interest story when the 100 girls voted down management's contract offer and the American Guild of Variety Artists set up New Yorks prettiest picket line.

A curious public learned that there's more grind than glamour backstage in the world's largest theater.

A Rockette rehearsed without pay for the high-kicking precision dances which brought millions to the theater each year, then made about $4.12 for each of four daily shows. Time Magazine researchers figured that came to two cents a kick. If a dancer was sick, she wasn't paid. And there wasn't much glamour in a workday that ran from noon until 10:30 p.m.

It became a trade union story when management put on the squeeze and broke off an exchange of contract proposals and counterproposals to issue a "take-it-or-leave-it" ultimatum.

The price of an improved wage offer was put as abandonment by the union of a long list of other contract proposals.

Just as other employers have done, the Music Hall management sought to bypass the union and mailed each striker a glowing account of the benefits under the company's offer. A misleading account, the union noted.

Full page advertisements in New York's newspapers repeated the management theme, adding a strong hint that live performances might have to be abandoned if the dancers turned down the offer.

AGVA Vice Pres. Penny Singleton commented that the $15,000 management spent on the advertisements could have brought the dispute closer to settlement if spent on employe benefits.

Even though the 100 dancers know that AGVA's strike assistance funds have been largely exhausted, they refused to trade their walking shoes back for dancing shoes without a satisfactory contract. Music Hall musicians have chipped in to pay for meals for the pickets at a nearby restaurant. The Hotel & Restaurant Employes made a substantial contribution.

Meanwhile, visitors to New York can see the Rockettes free—on the picket line.

Meany Scores Doctors' Fees, Urges Controls

than their fees partly because they are now receiving full fees from many medicare and medicaid patients who were previously treated at reduced rates."

Meany noted that the AFL-CIO has urged that physicians be required to accept "reasonable" fees for treating medicare patients and that increases be kept in line with increases in the consumer price index.

There may be other ways to control fees, Meany wrote Gardner. "I urge you to establish such controls now in order to prevent severe hardship to elderly medicare participants."

The National Council of Senior Citizens also called for control of doctor's fees in a telegram to the Senate Finance Committee.

Council Pres. John W. Edelman described the escalation of physicians' charges over the past two years as "outrageous."

"I object with all the force at my command," he wired, "to the proposal to pass on the cost of these exorbitant doctor charges to the elderly, including millions living on low incomes who simply cannot bear this added burden."

Edelman urged Congress to impose "reasonable controls on fees charged by doctors who treat medicare and medicaid patients."

Union First Aid Training Pays Off in Emergency

Harrisburg, Pa.—The first aid training that Kenneth Crook received as a member of the Operating Engineers helped save the life of Henry Daniels, a drill tender at the site of the Peach Bottom atomic power plant in Delta, Pa.

Crook was working as a shovel operator for Glasgow, Inc., when a drill rig overturned, pinning Daniels beneath the boom. Crook ran to the scene, found Daniels without perceptible pulse or respiration, and called for an ambulance after helping free the injured man. Crook kept administering mouth-to-mouth rescuscitation until an ambulance crew arrived. Daniels is recovering in York, Pa., Hospital.

The Lancaster county chapter of the American Red Cross gave Crook a certificate of appreciation for extraordinary personal action. Later the Red Cross gave him its certificate of merit, an award not often given. Crook also was honored at the Dist. 4 meeting of his IUOE Local 542.

He was a member of the initial first aid training class sponsored by his local and underwent further instruction in a mandatory course for all Local 542 apprentices. Crook now is an instructor in the local's apprenticeship program.

Magic Chef Boycott Approved by Council

The AFL-CIO Executive Council has approved the request of the Stove Workers for a consumer boycott of stoves and other household appliances marketed by Magic Chef, Inc.

The union and the federation's Union Label & Service Trades Dept. first put the corporation on the Do Not Patronize list for products made under unfair conditions at the Magic Chef Pan Pacific Division plant at Industry, Calif., but extended the boycott to all other company plants with the sanction of the Executive Council, granted at the council's September meeting in New York City.

Stove Workers' Pres. James M. Roberts and Sec.-Treas. Edwin F. Kaiser reported that Magic Chef management prolonged negotiations after the union won an election and was certified by the National Labor Relations Board as bargaining agent for an employe unit at Industry. They charged that the company then conducted an antiunion campaign to discourage membership in it.

The officers said that Magic Chef management delayed contract negotiations over a 12-month period, whittled down the union's membership from 56 to half a dozen employes, and presented the weakened unit with a "final offer" which contained no significant benefits.

The company is a major U.S. manufacturer of gas and electric ranges using the brand name Magic Chef and Dixie. It also markets garbage disposal units, Dixie-Narco Inc. soft drink vending machines, and small refrigerators made in Turin, Italy, by a subsidiary—Magic Chef Italiana—and sold in the U.S., the union said.

Minnesota Convention Backs McCarthy Bill

St. Paul—Major improvements are needed in the 28-year-old federal-state unemployment system not only to give workers more protection but to strengthen the nation's entire economy, Sen. Eugene J. McCarthy (D-Minn.) declared in an address to the Minnesota AFL-CIO convention.

McCarthy stressed the importance of legislation, introduced in Congress by himself and 12 other senators, to set federal standards for state benefits and extend their coverage.

The convention pledged support for McCarthy's effort, heard addresses from a number of government officials, and took actions to bolster the federation's organizing, legislative and political activities.

More than 800 delegates attended the convention, presided over by Pres. David K. Roe. The attendance was described by Sec.-Treas. Neil C. Sherburne as "the largest we have had for a non-election convention." The Minnesota AFL-CIO meets annually, elects its officers every two years.

McCarthy said his bill is "designed to strengthen the protection for workers in an area of serious hazard: unemployment."

Also, he added, the measure would be "effective in maintaining purchasing power and offsetting effects of a recession. . . . It would provide far more adequate protection for individual workers and serve as a better deterrent to economic recessions."

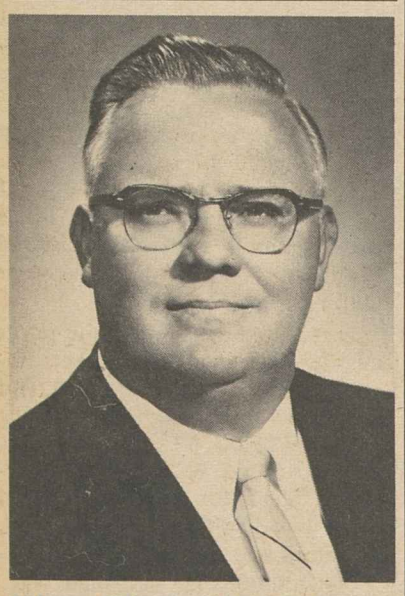
A highlight of the convention was a testimonial dinner honoring Robert Olsen, president-emeritus of the state AFL-CIO.

Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz, principal speaker at the banquet, praised Olsen as a man who had accomplished his goals in nearly 30 years of labor leadership in Minnesota. Wirtz urged unions to continue their role as the "architect" of progress in America.

In a resolution attacking "unreasonably high rates" and "abuses" in private insurance, the convention called for a program of "federally financed and regulated insurance for lower income families."

Another resolution viewed "with great concern" the growing activities of the John Birch Society and other "radical right" groups. It called upon unionists in the state "to use all resources to expose and defeat this threat to democracy."

Other resolutions supported: home rule for the District of Columbia, "truth in lending" legislation now before Congress, an increase in state workmen's compensation to $75 a week, reduction in the size of the state legislature, and the closing of loopholes in the federal income tax law that "allow the very wealthy to escape from most if not all tax liability."



NEW CITY COUNCIL for Washington, D.C., includes J. C. Turner, president of the Greater Washington Central Labor Council and business manager of Operating Engineers Local 77. Turner was one of nine civic leaders appointed by Pres. Johnson to legislate for the nation's capital.

New York State Convention:

Delegates Endorse LBJ's Viet Policy

New York—More than 1,800 delegates and alternates to the tenth convention of the New York State AFL-CIO pledged "unstinting support for all measures" Pres. Johnson considers needed "to halt communist aggression and secure lasting peace in Viet Nam."

The delegates also overwhelmingly endorsed the new proposed state constitution and plans to put it across at the November election on the ground that it contains many advances for workers and consumers. Its drafting had been completed a week earlier after a 6-month constitutional convention in Albany.

This action was coupled with equally strong backing of a $2.5 billion transportation bond issue and a four-fold increase in bond financing for the State Job Development Authority, also up for voter action next month.

An hour after the convention adjourned, the executive council set in motion detailed plans for a massive education and information campaign to obtain approval of the new constitution and the two bond issues, starting with the raising of $100,000 to finance the activity.

The convention reacted forcefully when on its third day a court here sentenced United Federation of Teachers Pres. Albert Shanker to 15 days in jail on conviction of criminal contempt for not obeying an anti-strike injunction, fined him $250 and imposed a $150,000 fine on the 49,000-member local of the American Federation of Teachers. (Story, Page 1.)

Repeal Urged

The delegates gave unanimous and vociferous approval to a resolution that the State AFL-CIO use its full resources to seek reversal of the convictions and remittance of the fines and take maximum measures for the repeal of the law that made the penalties possible. The law was enacted at the 1967 session of the legislature.

State AFL-CIO Pres. Raymond R. Corbett told the delegates he had repeatedly insisted to the legislators and Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller that such a law, prohibiting strike action by public employes, would not bring labor peace between government workers and employers but "just the opposite."

He said that if the New York City Board of Education had not relied on this law to force teachers to work against their will but had negotiated in good faith before, rather than after, the date for schools to open, there would have been no problem and no delay in starting school.

The delegates in a related action approved a resolution condemning the New York City human rights commissioner, William H. Booth, for public statements attacking teachers for belonging to a labor union and urging them instead to form a professional organization. The resolution called on Mayor John V. Lindsay to dismiss the commission chairman.

Labor Backs New Charter In New York

New York—Leaders of the New York State AFL-CIO have come out strongly for ratification of a proposed new state constitution which includes the same language as the U.S. Constitution on the separation of church and state.

Pres. Raymond R. Corbett, Sec.-Treas. Louis Hollander and 11 other union officials have formed a statewide committee to support ratification of the new constitution.

Besides repealing the so-called Blaine Amendment—a harsh prohibition against even indirect help to children in schools where religion is taught—the constitution contains a number of major reforms and improvements, Corbett said.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany strongly endorsed elimination of the Blaine Amendment in a message to a Madison Square Garden rally of Citizens for Educational Freedom.

The safeguards incorporated in the federal constitution are fully adequate, Meany declared. "Surely there is no good reason to require the children of the people of the State of New York to suffer harsher restrictions or to deny them the degree of access to funds enjoyed by those of other states."

Meany said labor's concern is not "with the promotion of institutions but with the educational betterment of children—all children."

Illinois AFL-CIO Assails Legislature, Renews Drive for Key Measures

Peoria, Ill.—Failure of the Illinois General Assembly to pass laws to help working people was assailed by resolutions adopted at the 10th annual convention of the Illinois State AFL-CIO here.

Pres. Reuben G. Soderstrom charged that the political infighting in Springfield "created an antagonistic, rancid atmosphere which stifled the efforts to properly solve the minimum wage, taxes, housing and other problems vital to working people of Illinois."

"The Senate Republican majority leadership," he said, "was particularly obstinate, stumbling, bumbling and fantastically persistent in an effort to drive back and kill the spirit of humanity and equality in its opposition to the minimum wage and civil rights and other proposals."

The 2,400 delegates launched a unified labor drive to achieve legislative goals bypassed by the General Assembly. These include:

- Collective bargaining rights for public employes.
- A state minimum wage.
- Improvements in workmen's compensation and unemployment compensation.
- A ban on the importation of strikebreakers.
- A strong fair housing law.

The delegates also opposed wiretapping, asked for more spending in education by state and federal governments and urged passage of federal legislation to strengthen meat inspection laws and improve social security benefits.

Soderstrom, Executive Vice Pres. Stanley L. Johnson and Sec.-Treas. Robert G. Gibson and the executive board were declared elected by the delegates since they had no opposition.

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz brought a message of "simple humble thanks" from Pres. Johnson "for an understanding and support of what it takes to keep freedom in the world."

"I think the American labor movement is playing its role as far as meeting change is concerned. I hope never to be around when American labor is satisfied," Wirtz said.

Illinois Gov. Otto Kerner expressed disappointment over the failure of the General Assembly to improve job injury and unemployment insurance benefits.

Kerner's appeal for support of the proposed $1 billion bond issue to control air and water pollution, which will be on the ballot in November 1968, was followed by adoption of a resolution calling on all voters to back the bond issue.

The delegates voted support of a new organization, the Illinois Federation of Consumers, called for the creation of an Illinois State Labor History Society, and opposed anti-strike legislation.

The convention voiced strong support for farm workers striking in Delano, Calif., and elsewhere to improve their basic economic conditions.

Labor Blasts Reagan Action Lending Convicts to Growers

San Francisco—Gov. Ronald Reagan's dispatch of convict labor to aid farm employers in harvesting crops and his likening labor leaders to "stupid dogs" has drawn the wrath of labor in California.

Reagan authorized the use of 400 prisoners, confined to state institutions, to work in fig and grape fields in Merced and San Bernardino counties. He said they were needed "to prevent substantial crop loss."

He also designated prisoners to work in Monterey county, but county officials objected on grounds the prisoners would only help "a single large employer"—the Salinas Strawberry Co. The prisoners weren't sent into the county.

The convict labor was being paid "prevailing wages," Reagan said, with part of the money going into the state treasury and the rest into a fund paid to prisoners upon release.

These developments followed:

● State AFL-CIO Executive Sec.-Treas. Thomas L. Pitts charged Reagan with "appeasing special interests," short-changing domestic farm workers and a "gross perversion" of a law allowing convicts to work in private employ under certain conditions.

● Director Cesar Chavez of the AFL-CIO United Farm Workers sent a wire to Reagan offering "to supply all the domestic farm labor" needed to harvest the grapes and figs "provided the growers enter into a collective bargaining agreement."

He also reminded Reagan that "neither your office or the growers have contacted us requesting workers." Chavez's offer was ignored by the Republican governor.

● Reagan held a press conference at which he was asked about the labor leaders' reaction. "Sometimes they remind one of a dog sitting on a sharp rock, howling with pain and too stupid to get up," he commented.

Reagan said that Pitts "wouldn't even be satisfied if I offered to go into the fields to harvest crops."

Pitts answered that it was the "agri-business" interests who could best be compared to "stupid, howling dogs" since they clamored for the convicts and "adamantly refused to offer wages sufficient to attract" farm workers.

As for Reagan's offer to go into the fields, Pitts said he'd take the governor up on that since it might help him to "appreciate" the toil of farm workers.

In asking for the convicts, the growers contended that there was a shortage of U.S. workers to harvest their crops. But Pitts challenged this, declaring that if such were the case the employers could have applied for imported workers. He said the Labor Dept. informed him no application had been made.

Pointing out that such application requires proof of an effort to hire American workers, Pitts said that it was clear that the growers "have not made any realistic attempt to recruit domestic labor by offering decent wages and working conditions."

What Reagan is doing, he charged, "is trying to aid growers who are determined to flout both the Congress and specific rules set up by the Labor Dept. and the Immigration Service to meet labor shortages without undercutting wages of domestic workers."

Accusing the governor of "gross perversion" of the state's work-furlough law, Pitts said the law specifies that prisoners may be used in private employment only when such employment is to have a rehabilitative aspect.

'Simply Ridiculous'

"It is simply ridiculous to pretend" that fig and grape picking "will contribute anything to the prisoners' rehabilitation," he said.

He called attention to a recent report from the state department of employment that showed Merced and San Bernardino counties had unemployment rates of 6.2 and 6.4 percent respectively. The report cited an "oversupply of unskilled workers" in both counties.

Pitts challenged the governor to spell out the "prevailing" wage being paid to the prisoners and their conditions of work. He asked if the convicts would receive the $1.60 an hour the Labor Dept. requires for imported workers.

He received no answer from the governor, but Ray Roth, chief of the California State Farm Labor Service, conceded that the convicts would not be given the $1.60 rate.

The people who will be "really hurt" by the governor's "appeasement of special interests," Pitts concluded, "are some of the lowest paid workers and the taxpayers who will have to foot additional welfare costs for domestic workers displaced by this action."

Meanwhile, in Austin, Tex., Texas AFL-CIO Pres. H. S. Hank Brown proposed that the federal government pay the expenses of moving flooded-out farm workers to California to harvest crops if there is truly a shortage of domestic farm workers there.

Texas Labor Pitches In For Hurricane 'Mop-Up'

Brownsville, Tex.—Organized labor took a major role as cities and towns across South Texas began a massive "mop-up" operation in the wake of Hurricane Beulah, the most devastating storm in the state's history.

At the height of Beulah's fury, more than 250,000 people were driven from their homes by wind damage and raging floods. Thousands of evacuees remained in Red Cross and Salvation Army shelters. Total damage was set at more than $1 billion.

Pres. Johnson flew into the devastated area, inspecting shelters and damage in Harlingen and Rio Grande City. After his tour, he declared 24 counties disaster areas and said $2.5 million in federal funds would be made immediately available to finance the repair and replacement of public facilities.

Henry Villarreal, a State AFL-CIO vice president, directed the clean-up operations for labor from his office here. He estimated that at least 1,000 unionists were involved in the rehabilitation effort along the Rio Grande Valley.

Hundreds of additional union members pitched in to aid the clean-up of homes and towns along the banks of three other rivers that overflowed their banks—the Arroyo Colorado, Neuces and San Antonio.

Much of the work, Villarreal said, centered on repairing, rebuilding and reclaiming homes. Shovels and water hoses were being used to clear away huge deposits of mud, silt and slime.

In Austin, Texas AFL-CIO Pres. H. S. Hank Brown "almost hourly" reports to his office indicated "this was the most destructive hurricane in the history of Texas."

He recalled the harsh blow dealt the state by Hurricane Carla in 1961, but said Beulah was "even more cruel" in that it lashed along the Rio Grande Valley "where the poorest of the poor live."

He estimated that "at least half" of the more than 8,000 union members and their families living in the valley were forced out of their homes by floods.

"But the worst aspect of this hurricane," he said, "is that most of the people living in the valley are farm workers. These people are so poor they won't be able to recover from the loss of all their worldly possessions."

Brown reported that cash contributions to aid Beulah's victims are pouring into the State AFL-CIO office. The federation earlier proposed that affiliates give at least $1 per union member.

Tennessee Tax Reform Urged to Salvage Cities

Nashville, Tenn.—Local government and local taxes can no longer meet the pressing problems of Tennessee's cities, Pres. Matt Lynch reported to delegates at the State AFL-CIO convention here.

"There just is not any way for local government to meet even emergency needs without placing an unbearable hardship on already overtaxed citizens," he said.

At the same time the needs of the cities are expanding, the move of those with more money to the suburbs is cutting into the taxable resources, Lynch noted. "Thousands of people," he stressed, "drive into cities to earn their living and have one thought in mind—get in and out at the fastest pace."

Lynch told the convention delegates: "Many of these people are our members, but we must be honest and recognize that they are not concerned with air pollution, riots, overcrowded schools, slums, inadequate mass transit, substandard housing and other multiple problems facing our cities. Their paycheck will be spent in adjoining counties . . . beyond the taxing power of local government."

The recourse, he stressed, is to "look to state government to use its taxing powers to reach the available sources of revenue and, in turn, funnel these resources into programs to save our cities, where the need is so apparent."

This must be done, Lynch declared, through taxation based on ability to pay. "No longer can we permit more and more of this burden being placed on the people least able to pay through sales or other regressive taxes."

The convention called for both state and federal legislation to improve living and working conditions and protect consumers.

It urged the state legislature to pass a minimum wage law "at least equal to the federal law, covering all workers not covered by the federal law."

It called for improved education at all levels and more pay for teachers.

Delegates urged both federal and state action to obtain lower automobile insurance premiums and end abuses on cancellation of policies.

The convention reaffirmed its support for the Kingsport Press strikers, approved plans for a drive to get 100 percent affiliation of unions with state and local central bodies, and called for an expanded political education program.

Sec.-Treas. Lee Case reported a growth of 15,000 affiliated members in the two years since the last state convention.

He, Lynch and Vice Pres. Tommy Powell reported on successes in the last legislature, including improvements in the garnishment law and unemployment and workmen's compensation.

Major speakers during the convention included Gov. Buford Ellington, Sen. Albert Gore, and Representatives Richard H. Fulton and William R. Anderson.

The entire slate of incumbent officers was re-elected without opposition. Earlier delegates rejected —on recommendation of a convention committee—a proposal to increase the term of officers from two to four years.

General Board To Meet Dec. 9

A meeting of the AFL-CIO General Board has been called for Saturday, Dec. 9, at 9 a.m. in the Americana Hotel at Bal Harbour, Fla., during the AFL-CIO convention.

The General Board is composed of the principal officer of each affiliated union, trade and industrial department, plus the members of the AFL-CIO Executive Council.

Furniture Pact Sets 50c Hike In New York

New York — The Furniture Workers won raises totaling 50 cents an hour and protection against living-cost increases in a new three-year contract for 2,000 members in 28 shops here.

After a week of bargaining and a strike which began Sept. 1 when the old pact expired, UFWA Local 76 reached agreement on terms with members of the Upholstered Furniture Manufacturers Association, Inc.

Retroactive to Sept. 1, the terms include wage hikes of 20 cents immediately, 15 cents in 1968 and again in 1969; minimum hiring rates of $3.60 an hour for mechanics, $1.65 to $2.50 in four-month steps for apprentices, and $1.65 to $2.10 for shipping clerks, operators and general helpers.

Highlighting the settlement was a clause giving Local 76 the right to reopen negotiations for wage increases to offset a rise in living costs. It includes the right to arbitration if no agreement is reached in bargaining.

Local Sec.-Treas. Frank Marino said the new pact—"one of the best we ever negotiated" — was reached with the aid of UFWA Pres. Morris Pizer.

Partisan Obstruction

HOUSE REPUBLICANS have responded to the nation's complex and difficult domestic problems with a compellingly simple proposal—cut $5 billion from the President's budget and let the problems take care of themselves.

By unanimous party votes on two rollcalls GOP members in the House set a new mark for political irresponsibility by refusing to indicate where and how the budget should be reduced by the arbitrary $5 billion figure.

But the intent is clear. The senseless, slashing attack would cut every domestic program and proposal aimed at meeting the urban crisis. It would bring to a complete halt the progress that has been made to date in strengthening the nation's economic and social fabric and combatting poverty and injustice.

At the outset of the 90th Congress, House Republican leaders proclaimed that with their increased strength they would forego the negative and obstructionist role for "constructive alternatives" to Administration proposals.

The record to date, however, is one of destructive opposition, of restoring the GOP-Dixiecrat coalition to defeat progressive proposals such as rent supplements, model cities and even rat control—although public indignation forced a reversal on the latter.

The coalition, led by the GOP, forced through the $5 billion budget slash proposal on the first vote and only an intense effort by the Administration defeated the ploy the second time around.

The Republicans in the House have apparently decided that the immediate solution of critical national problems is of secondary importance to their goal of winning the 1968 elections.

If they are to win the election contests next year the House GOP would be well reminded that Americans place the national interest and the national welfare ahead of political partisan advantage.

Nailing the Digest

THE TOP congressional expert on the social security system, Rep. Wilbur Mills (D-Ark.), chairman of the House Ways & Means Committee which handles social security legislation, has nailed the Reader's Digest in its attack on the system.

Mills told the House: "I have read the article very carefully and find that it contains a number of half-truths that lead to misleading conclusions."

He backed his views on the Digest article by placing in the Congressional Record a detailed reply by Under Sec. of HEW Wilbur J. Cohen (excerpted on the opposite page) demolishing the charges raised by the magazine.

The congressman went on to say:

"The Committee on Ways & Means has recently completed a most exhaustive re-examination of the contributory wage-related social security program. This program is actuarially and financially sound."

Mills stressed the importance of "rebutting the erroneous implications" in the article, which is currently being promoted by the magazine with newspaper ads showing a torn—and by implication—useless social security card.

The Digest's phony charges must be exposed for what they are so that Americans will not be misled about the keystone social insurance program.

Changed Economy:

Crisis of Nation's Cities Linked To Massive Shift from Farms

The following is excerpted from an address by William J. Pachler, president of the Utility Workers Union, as an AFL-CIO fraternal delegate to the recent British Trades Union Congress.

TODAY, WE ARE a nation of nearly 200 million people, and over 70 percent of the population lives in urbanized areas. It was not always this way; at the turn of the century, when the population totalled 75 million, the majority of our people lived in rural areas.

As a matter of fact, in 1900, about 40 percent of our workforce was employed in agriculture. Now, its only about 5 percent and that 5 percent is feeding a considerably larger population at home and many millions of people in various parts of the world.

In these figures you can readily see the impact of technology—not on industrial jobs alone, but on our whole economy, our entire society. It has forced the shifting of people in large numbers—off the farms and into the developing industrial and commercial areas.

First they crowded into the cities, and now they have moved into the suburbs, creating the almost-endless urban sprawl. And as the first groups moved to those suburbs, new waves of people off the farm moved into the cities to replace them. And many of those more-recent migrants to the cities have been Negroes.

While this has been a long and continuing trend, it has run in spurts, And to give you some idea of the magnitude of the problem, it is necessary only to point out that, since 1950 alone, employment in agriculture in America has declined by some 3.5 million.

During most of the 1950s unemployment was high and rising. And for America's Negroes—who because of discrimination suffer from a lack of education and training—the situation was much worse than for our white citizens. It still is.

Let me assure you, however, that substantial progress has been made. The stepped-up rate of economic growth that has been the direct result of the policies of the Kennedy and Johnson Administrations has helped to cut deeply into this problem. Not, to be sure, as much as we in the AFL-CIO would like, but the evidence of progress is there nevertheless.

The key point I wish to make, however, is that the problem of America's Negroes today is, in very large part, a direct result of advancing technology. Moreover, that advance in technology makes the problem more visible. It is no longer spread throughout the rural areas. It is heavily concentrated in the cities.

I am convinced that the development of the civil rights revolution in the United States is due more to the advance of technology than to any combination of individuals, and that includes, above all, a young man named Stokely Carmichael, who carried his message of violence to your shores just a few months ago. He offers no solution, no remedy, and no programs, except one that preaches hate and advocates destruction.

Fortunately, despite the impression he tries to create, he represents few people, and he represents none at all who are sincerely concerned—as is the labor movement—with creating a society in which a man's position depends on his abilities and talent and not on his color.

WE NOW HAVE on the statute books legislation which guarantees equal opportunity in employment and equal access to public accommodations.

We now have on the statute books legislation aimed at abolishing poverty.

We now have on the statute books legislation which provides special federal financial aid to schools in poor neighborhoods.

We now have on the statute books legislation through which we hope eventually to eradicate slums and to greatly improve the social services in the neighborhoods.

We now have on our statute books legislation designed to provide skill training for the entire workforce but especially for the most disadvantaged.

I would go on and mention much more that has been done recently, but the point I wish to convey is that we have been moving ahead.

But we must do more. And in the view of the AFL-CIO that means stepping up public investment — to create more jobs, to improve our education systems, and to build more and better housing. In short, it means to create more economic security, to improve the quality of our human resources and to create a healthy environment for all Americans—regardless of their race, color or creed — because these problems—though I have presented them to you most specifically in terms of the needs of Negroes—are problems for all Americans, now and generations to come.

Digest Attack on Social Security Misleads, Obfuscates, Confuses

The October issue of Reader's Digest carries an attack on the social security system characterized by Under Sec. of Health, Education and Welfare Wilbur J. Cohen as totally misleading and confusing. Here are some excerpts from Cohen's analysis of the article.

CHARLES STEVENSON'S article on "How Secure is Your Social Security?" in the October issue of the Reader's Digest is misleading, and, in my opinion, creates anxiety and fear about the financing of our social system that are groundless.

I state categorically that: The social security system is soundly financed. Present and potential future beneficiaries of social security will get the benefits provided by the social security law.

The article says that the social security program puts a "squeeze on the young." This is not so. The fact is that even without taking into account that social security benefits have been and will continue to be increased from time to time as changes occur in wage levels and cost of living, young workers as a group will get social security protection worth 20 to 25 percent more than they will pay in social security contributions.

Young workers could not buy comparable insurance protection from private insurance companies at anywhere near the amount they pay for their social security protection.

The article takes no account of the fact that the benefits provided by the present social security law are very much lower than the benefits that will actually be paid when today's young workers reach retirement age. As wages rise—as they have throughout the history of the country—benefits can be increased without increasing the contribution rates.

As a matter of fact, if benefits were not increased as wage levels rise over the years, the contribution rates scheduled in present law would be too high, and they could be reduced. Whether benefits are increased or contribution rates are reduced the result would be the same, namely, more protection in relation to contributions than is shown by analyses that assume no change in wage levels and in benefits.

The calculations referred to in the article assume that the covered employe would have within his control an amount of contributions paid by his employers equal to the amount of his own social security contribution. This assumption rests on a misconception of the nature of the social insurance program and indeed the nature of private group insurance. If such an assumption were used, the whole fabric of private group life insurance, annuity insurance, and other forms of group insurance in this country would have to be regarded as inequitable.

As a general rule, under private group insurance plans the employer contribution is not allocated to each employe in an amount related to the employe's own contribution. On the contrary the employer contribution, as in the case of social security, is what makes it possible to pay larger benefits to workers and their survivors who are in the upper age brackets when the group insurance plan goes into effect than could be paid only on the basis of the worker's own contributions.

I believe it bears repeating that even without taking into account the fact that benefits will be increased in future years, even young workers covered under social security will get insurance protection worth 20 to 25 percent more than the value of their contributions. . . .

IN DECIDING whether younger people get their money's worth it must be kept in mind that social security provides not only retirement protection but also survivors and disability insurance protection. While Mr. Stevenson's figures do not take into consideration the fact that social security provides protection against loss of income due to death and disability and also provides hospital insurance protection at age 65, most of his discussion ignores the importance of these parts of the program.

That importance may be illustrated by an example: The value of the social security survivors insurance protection provided under the House-passed bill in the case of the worker whose earnings are about the median earnings of regularly employed men ($550 per month) who dies at age 35 leaving a wife aged 32 and two small children is about $56,000. Were this worker to become disabled at age 35, the value of the disability insurance protection to him and his family would be about $59,000.

Social security is a sound and equitable program for the young and the old.

The article attempts to show that social security is unsound by referring to "unfunded outstanding obligations" of $350 billion and stating that under the Administration bill this amount will rise to $417 billion. The $350 billion referred to is the amount that would be needed—if social security were a private, voluntary insurance program—to pay off all obligations on the assumption that there would be no new entrants into the system. The idea of there being a huge unfunded liability in the social security system is wholly meaningless and irrelevant for any practical purposes. There is no need in a government program such as social security for funding on the basis referred to in the article. It would not only be unnecessary but also unwise to build up such a huge accumulation of social security funds.

No life insurance expert nor social security expert, nor business nor labor organization, and no Advisory Council or Committee of the Congress has ever recommended such funding.

Mr. Stevenson has not clarified any fundamental issues. He has not pointed out the great unmet social needs. What he has done has been a great disservice to the millions of social security beneficiaries and the millions who are counting on social security benefits in the future. He has obfuscated and confused the major policy issues in social security. A critical and constructive review of social security would be welcome. A glib and superficial attack on a program so important to millions of Americans is not a contribution to the American people.

Key to Public Confidence:

Viet Government Must Spur Social Progress, Sullivan Says

SOUTH VIET NAM's new government must move quickly in social advancements to keep the confidence of the people, an official U.S. observer during the September elections said in a network radio interview.

Pres. David Sullivan of the Building Service Employes said that in large measure, higher living standards, improved housing and education in Viet Nam will hinge on success of the pacification program. The AFL-CIO vice president appeared on Labor News Conference, broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m. EDT, on the Mutual Radio Network.

Sullivan said the only instruction given the election observers was to keep "an open mind." He noted that aside from necessary precautions for their personal safety, the observers were free to move around, talk with the candidates and gather whatever information they felt necessary to evaluate the conduct of the elections. He said he was impressed with the interest and enthusiasm of the people in choosing their government officials.

"In my judgment," he said, "the elections were conducted in a proper manner, bearing in mind that here you have a people at war who were risking their lives" to vote.

SULLIVAN SAID the growing Vietnamese labor movement is determined to "play a prominent part in the government," but equally determined not to become "part of the political operation." They want to be free to "criticize the government when it is wrong," he said.

The Vietnamese people have "great hopes," he said, "that theirs will be a democratic nation that will play its part in the world, along with our country and other free countries."

Reporters questioning Sullivan were William Eaton of the Chicago Daily News and Alexander Uhl of Press Associates, Inc.

IT IS ESTIMATED that some 2,100 children who are or will become mentally retarded will be born every week in 1968.

Today, there are about six million Americans who are considered mentally retarded in some degree not necessarily helpless or lifeless, but limited in what they can do and understand, slow to learn.

Many of these Americans can be useful members of society—if they are given the education and training they need.

Nearly five years ago a panel of the nation's leading authorities on mental retardation appointed by Pres. Kennedy undertook a survey and made 95 recommendations.

The panel said the nation could make significant progress if:

- We as a nation confront mental retardation as a major national social, educational and health problem calling for legal and moral commitment at all levels.
- The problem does not continue to be considered the exclusive province of a closed, professional group but is exposed to the widest possible citizen awareness, interest, involvement and action.
- Mental retardation is treated as a problem in human resources, and as many retarded as possible are launched as self-sufficient contributing citizens.
- Adequate funds and manpower are provided to make real progress in such areas as research, planning, prevention and services.

Recently, the President's Committee on Mental Retardation reported to the President the progress made during the past five years along these lines. Surveys, field interviews and fact-finding meetings led it to the conclusion that "the last five years have seen an historic emergence of mental retardation and the mentally retarded from isolation and public indifference."

AS OF TODAY all 50 states plus the District of Columbia, Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands have a written plan for providing comprehensive services for the retarded.

In marked contrast to conditions five years ago, trained mentally retarded workers now are slowly moving into the labor force. Industrial launderers, department stores, motels and electronic component assembly plants are reporting success with mentally retarded.

There has been action on the state level, steps to prevent or treat conditions that lead to retardation. Thirty-eight states now have passed legislation accepting the testing of infants at birth for phenglketonuria (PKU), a prime factor in retardation.

A total of 12 mental retardation research centers and 14 university-affiliated training facilities have been set up as a beginning network for basic research and training resources in mental retardation.

Special legislation enacted by Congress is aiding many of the 77,000 retarded children of members of the armed forces who previously were lost in limbo between national neglect and state residency laws.

The President's Committee noted that while these limited successes have been taking place there are new, long-term trends arising.

"Soon, for example, 90 percent of Americans will be city dwellers, their lives shaped daily by mass technologies. . . . Effective and meaningful living requires that the individual obtain more and more formal education. . . . The spiraling growth of the American population—some 70,000 babies are born each week—strains the already undermanned teaching and other social service professions to meet even the needs of the normal."

State and local mental retardation authorities are asking such questions as:

- What effect will automation have in the lives of the retarded: Will it take over those jobs which the retarded can now handle? Will it create new jobs for them?
- How can the schools develop and utilize special education techniques that will fit the retarded student for social adequacy and economic productivity in tomorrow's society?

Into many communities the retarded are still shunted aside to become a burden on society. But progress is being made.

How to Buy:

'Shocking' Price Parade Puts Sharp Squeeze on Workers

By Sidney Margolius

WITH COLD WEATHER you'll get a little respite from what has become your toughest financial problem: the high cost of food. Food prices will begin to level off this month although they will remain close to present record-high peaks.

Recent and still current meat prices especially have been shocking, with many of the more desired cuts of beef bearing tags of $1 to $1.50 a pound.

There is no valid reason for these excessive prices. Beef production is about 7 percent higher than last year, the U.S. Agriculture Dept. reports. Even poultry prices have been higher. Stores have been offering fewer specials despite wholesale prices so low that poultry farmers have been taking a serious financial beating.

Increasing supplies of both beef and pork will enable you to find some better buys this fall in these meats, and also will help push down poultry prices.

Not only are many of the price increases unnecessary, but they are putting a sharp squeeze on working families and compelling demands for higher wages to meet these higher living costs.

There are two ways you can try to cushion the impact on your family of the recent and pending price increases: (1) anticipate the price increases where possible on goods you know you will need; (2) plan your buying around sales and specials.

Here are some tips on buying in October:

CLOTHING: The annual Columbus Day sales offer the first price cuts of the season on women's and children's coats. There also will be more reductions in next month's Veteran Day Sales.

One of the few bright spots for your family is the relatively reasonable cost of no-iron clothing this year. This is due largely to the lower prices of polyester and cotton fibers. The preferred blend for no-iron shirts, blouses and slacks is roughly 50-50 or 65-30 polyester and cotton.

Corduroy coats for girls and small children also are popular and reasonably priced.

In boys' coats we nominate poplin shells of 50-50 polyester and cotton with zip-in linings for cold weather.

REFRIGERATORS: With prices rising, look for best values in the top-mounted models at prices from $200 to $300. The side-mounted refrigerators are still very expensive—$400 and up.

Frost-free or frostless models are a genuine convenience. Otherwise make sure you really need or want such expensive extra features as automatic icemakers which require additional installation costs.

FOOD: Most beef roasts are still very expensive, with the best supermarket specials usually on chuck and chopped beef. In pork, smoked hams and calis are relatively reasonable. Turkey is a good buy this fall with supplies in storage almost double those of a year ago. Eggs are unusually reasonable for this time of year, with mediums still a better buy, seasonally, than large eggs.

From Soup to Nonsense:

'Absolutely Free' Offer Means Someone's Going to Get Stuck

By Jane Goodsell

THIS MORNING'S MAIL brought a certificate entitling me, as a member of the Curtis Publishing Co. family of readers, to receive "completely free of charge or commitment" the first volume of an encyclopedia of American history.

The accompanying brochure assured me that this handsome volume was mine absolutely free with no future obligations, and that I was also entitled to receive later volumes at a special discount price for a 10-day free examination with the privilege of notifying the company to discontinue shipments at any time.

Later in the afternoon I was dismayed to see my middle daughter inserting the special History Token into the "Yes, Please" pocket of the Reservation Certificate.

"Hey!" I said. "Do you realize what you're doing?"

Katy stared at me in surprise. "Why not?" she asked. "It doesn't cost anything so we might as well get it."

Katy is 19 years old and I—not to put too fine a point on it—am not. I think this explains why we both reacted as we did. She has the confident impulsiveness of youth and I the wary caution of age and experience.

When I brood, as I am wont to do, the complications of my life, it seems to me that I nearly always get myself entangled via Katy's deceptively logical argument that there's no particular reason not to. The dinner invitations I accept so casually. The committees I agree to serve on because—well, just because. Why not join the car pool, give to the charity, sign up for French lessons, try isometric exercises?

I plunge in, thinking (if I think about it at all) that I am committing myself to no future obligations. If, after a trial examination, things don't work out satisfactorily, I can opt out. And, theoretically, I can—and probably should. It is senseless to feel obligated to invite to dinner a couple who are—well, nice people but not much fun to be with, and who doubtless feel just as unenthusiastic about us. And yet, I do feel obligated.

Sure, I can resign from a committee, stop contributing to a charity, drop out of a car pool, return a book unread, quit French lessons and stop doing exercises. And yet, somehow, I feel committed—or, more accurately, stuck with it. However much of a trial a free examination may be (And it is sometimes trying enough to drive you smack out of your mind), it is never "absolutely free." If you elect to exercise your right to withdraw, you are left to square with yourself the charge that you are a quitter who copped out.

BUT I CAN'T PRETEND that it's conscience alone which prevents me from opting out. That's the flattering side of the picture. The other side, which isn't so admirable, is plain and simple inertia. It is more trouble to write a letter explaining why I'm resigning from a committee than it is to stay on it.

It requires less effort to stick with the doctor who isn't curing the bursitis in my shoulder than to go to the trouble of finding another doctor who might. At least this one knows my case history and my insurance card number.

But these are the meditations of a weary cynic, and they are not proper thoughts to communicate to an eager 19-year-old who, in her innocence, doesn't realize the odds against "absolutely free trial examinations," and figures she will luck out. Lord love her, I hope she's right. But just in case she doesn't get around to returning those later volumes (does she realize this involves wrapping, mailing and writing an accompanying letter instructing the publishers to discontinue shipments?) I am planning to give her for her birthday a 16-volume set of American history.

Consumer Spending Seen Rising Slightly

ANN ARBOR—Consumer spending on autos, appliances, leisure-time pursuits and the like—will be higher during the forthcoming Christmas season and early in 1968, but there are no indications of a spending spree, according to the University of Michigan's Survey Research Center.

The latest SRC quarterly survey, conducted in late August and early September, indicates an improvement of consumer attitudes for the third consecutive quarter. This optimistic trend, however, is tempered by a certain lack of consumer confidence in the long-range business outlook and personal financial prospects.

The center's Index of Consumer Sentiment (based on answers to five questions) rose from 94.9 to 96.5 in the last three months. Recovery during the last nine months has amounted to 8.2 percentage points, while the decline during 1966 had been 14.3 percentage points.

Economist George Katona, director of the nationwide economic surveys which have been conducted regularly since 1951, said that optimistic indications derived from the rise in the index during 1967 are tempered by the following considerations:

- Improvement in the various index components was not uniform. While people's evaluation of recent changes in their personal financial situation and of current buying conditions improved almost to high 1965 levels, expectations about business trends and personal financial prospects improved less and remain far below 1965 levels.
- The index calculated for upper-income families remained stable during the last three months, although during the preceding six months it had advanced more than the index for all families.

AMONG THE FACTORS contributing to the improvement of consumer sentiment are income developments and evaluation of the effects of the war in Viet Nam on domestic business. In the August survey the proportion of families who reported making more money than a year ago remained close to record levels, and a high proportion of respondents continued to think that Viet Nam stimulates the domestic economy.

"Most Americans believe that the prices of things they buy will go up and a fair proportion expect sizable price increases," the report states. "Among all respondents, 31 percent expect prices to go up by 5 percent or more during the next 12 month, 14 percent expect prices to rise by 3 or 4 percent, and 37 percent by 1 or 2 percent. Among many people the expected prices increases make for pessimism regarding personal prospects."

The opinion that next year will be a good time to buy has not improved in the last three months with regard to cars, but has improved for houses and major household goods.

Most respondents believe that there may be an income tax increase, but only half of them think it would have an effect on business conditions. The most commonly expected effect is a reduction in demand, while only a few respondents spoke on a dampening effect on inflation.

To Safeguard Jobs:

Woodworking Panel Sets ILO Guidelines

Geneva — Forward-looking guidelines to guarantee workers against any adverse impact from the introduction of technological changes in the woodworking industries were adopted here by a special Intl. Labor Organization conference.

Union, employer and government delegates of 27 countries agreed unanimously that "appropriate arrangements" must be made in advance to assure that workers who may be hit by such changes are:

- "Smoothly transferred" to other suitable jobs.
- Compensated for any time lost.

A "very fair compromise" was reached on the issue of the advance notice to be given by employers of impending technological innovations, according to Vice Pres. William Sidell of the Carpenters. He and Pres. Thomas F. Murphy of the Bricklayers represented U. S. workers at the two-week session.

The conference's worker delegates had urged that at least three months' notice be given of any projected introduction of a technological development.

This was strongly opposed by the employers. They asserted that the conference should not stipulate any fixed period because too many variable factors were involved.

But the two sides agreed on a formula declaring that advance notice is "essential." It should be long enough, it was stated, to make certain that the recommended measures to guarantee the workers' future can be taken in time.

The compromise, Sidell observed, was typical of the "general atmosphere of cooperation and of concern for the future" that prevailed at the session.

Discussion Topics

The discussion covered safety, health and welfare conditions in the industry in addition to the problems raised by automation.

The conference drafted a series of conclusions all based on the principle that the "improvement of safety and health in the woodworking industries is of common interest to all."

"The urgency of any operation," it stressed, "must never result in safety and health measures being neglected."

The AFL-CIO delegates praised a unanimously adopted resolution calling on the ILO executive committee to make meetings dealing with the woodworking industries a regular feature.

In another resolution the conference recommended that a special effort be made to assist the woodworking industries in the underdeveloped countries.

The ILO, the resolution said, should work with other international organizations with the aim of helping the poorer lands develop their exports of semi-finished and finished wood products.

ILG Retirees Given Boost In Pensions

New York—A $5 increase in the monthly pension benefit for nearly 45,000 retired members of the Ladies' Garment Workers, effective next January, was agreed to by union and employer members of the ILGWU national retirement fund.

Honorary Pres. David Dubinsky presided at the meeting Sept. 27 at which fund trustees voted unanimously to increase the monthly benefit from $70 to $75 for New York cloakmakers and from $60 to $65 for all others.

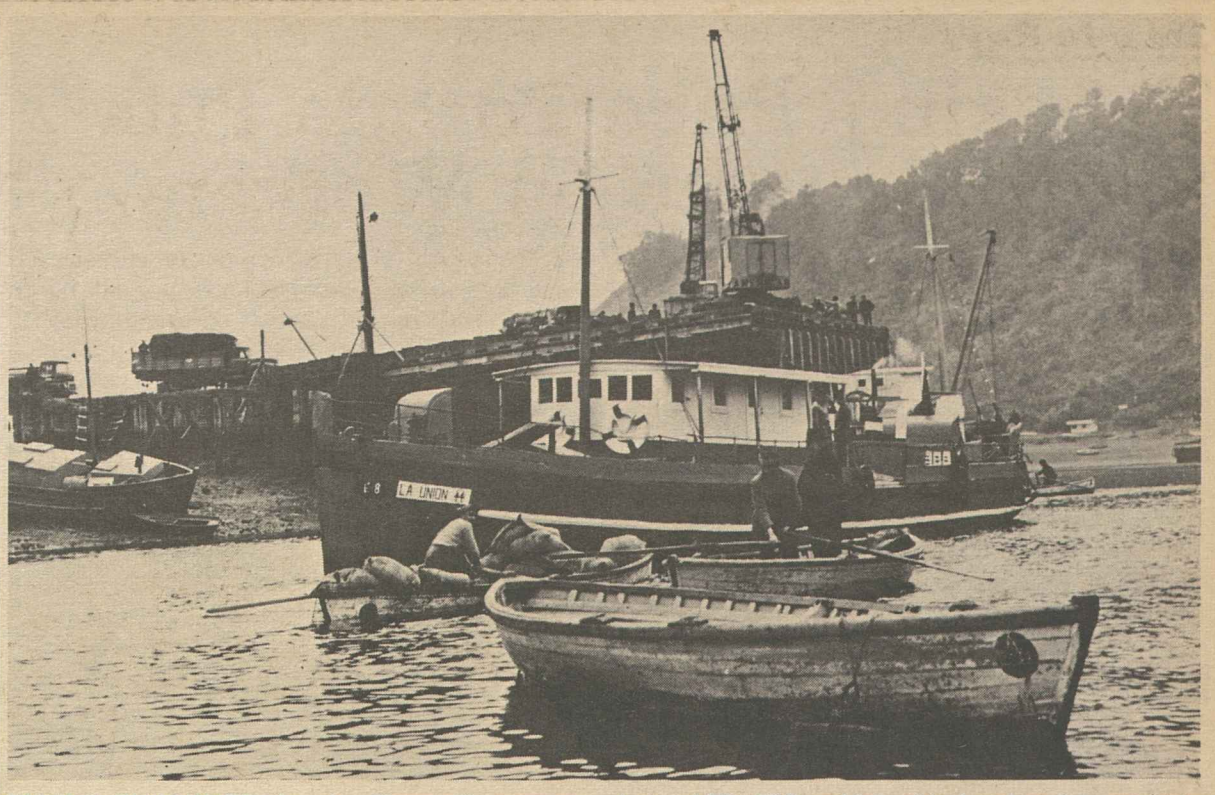
Present benefits have been in effect since January 1966, when the first increase in almost two decades was voted. The new rate will add some $3 million a year to the $32 million currently being paid out, ILGWU Pres. Louis Stulberg said.

The rise in rates followed a survey by George E. Immerwahr, fund actuary, and a report to fund Administrator Louis Rolnick.

The fund, into which employers contribute 2-6.5 percent of payroll, now has $253 million in reserves.

Stulberg complimented trustees for the spirit in which they had approved the union's request. Dubinsky, acting as director of the ILGWU Retiree Service Dept., expressed appreciation for the increase on behalf of retirees.

Besides raising the benefits, trustees liberalized eligibility rules for disabled applicants and those over 70.



FUNDS PROVIDED by the "impact" program of the AFL-CIO, which aids local action projects of the American Institute for Free Labor Development, helped purchase this launch to carry fishing catches for farmer-members of cooperatives in the Calbuco, Chile, area. 60,000 Rail Workers Awarded Out-of-Town Expense Allowance

Some 60,000 rail workers in five non-operating unions, whose jobs require them to travel, are to receive new payments for meals and lodging under an award issued by a voluntary arbitration board in Washington.

Effective Oct. 15, the award covers members of the Transportation-Communication Employes, Railway Clerks, Maintenance of Way Employes, Railroad Signalmen and Hotel & Restaurant Employes on most U.S. railroads.

Employes will get meal allowances from $1 to $3 a day, depending on whether the railroad provides facilities and a cook. If lodging is not provided, the men will get up to $4 per day. Payment must also be made for travel time and expense where employes travel between work points.

The decision also requires that lodging facilities furnished by the railroad "shall be adequate for the purpose and maintained in a clean, healthful and sanitary condition," including bed, mattress, pillow, bed linen, blanket, towels, soap, washing and toilet facilities.

The board's decision was signed by all six members—two from the unions, two representing employers and two neutrals. The neutral members were Paul D. Hanlon, Portland, Ore., attorney, and David H. Stowe, a Washington, D.C., arbitrator.

Many of the employes involved are quartered in "camp cars"—remodeled box cars or passenger coaches; and Hanlon and Stowe asserted that "it seems beyond dispute that even under the best conditions, the living conditions in the camp cars are difficult and unsatisfactory."

They found present treatment of these employes contains "radical variations and contradictions" from railroad to railroad, for which "no logical rhyme or reason can be discerned."

Presidents G. E. Leighty of the Transportation - Communication Employes and Harold C. Crotty of the Maintenance of Way Employes, the arbitration panel's labor members, described the award as "a good beginning toward a remedy for a long injustice."

They said it gives "these men a meaningful part of the money they have to pay out. It is a good beginning toward a remedy for this old injustice. It is a basis on which to build."

Leighty and Crotty stressed that even today some railroads' "camp cars" are "nothing more than rolling slums." They singled out the award's standards for living conditions as "a great gain."

The issue of away-from-home expenses was postponed for later negotiations last winter when the five unions and railroads settled on wages and vacations. After conferences failed early last summer, the parties agreed to voluntary arbitration. The board held hearings later in the summer.

A statement issued by the unions emphasized that the procedure was "voluntary arbitration, with no strike threat" in contrast to the recent "compulsory arbitration award under a special anti-strike law" in a dispute involving railroads and shopcraft unions.

Although they signed the award, the board's two employer members later expressed "disagreement" and "disappointment" with many of the terms. They estimated it would cost the carriers about $600 million a year. The unions' estimate was half that much.

High Court Urged to Reverse Ruling Barring Union Legal Service Plan

The AFL-CIO has asked the U.S. Supreme Court to reverse a 1966 Illinois Supreme Court decision denying the right of United Mine Workers' District 12 to maintain a legal service plan for its members.

The ruling contradicts Supreme Court decisions upholding the constitutionality of similar plans and if allowed to stand "will seriously undermine the efforts of working men to provide themselves with effective legal assistance," the AFL-CIO asserted.

The issue of an organization's right to maintain its own group legal service plan at members' expense has been attacked by various bar associations. But such plans have twice been upheld by the Supreme Court.

In 1963, the high court ruled that a plan established by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People—supported by NAACP dues—was constitutional. That plan financed law cases aimed at ending segregation in schools.

In 1964, the Supreme Court sustained the constitutionality of a Railroad Trainmen's plan, which used union funds to maintain a legal aid department to assist members in accident litigation cases.

In both cases, the Supreme Court found that the plans were legal under the First and Fourteenth Amendments to the Constitution.

The high court considered possible conflicts between the individual and the group and found them insufficient to outweigh the constitutional right "to associate together to help one another to preserve and enforce (their) rights."

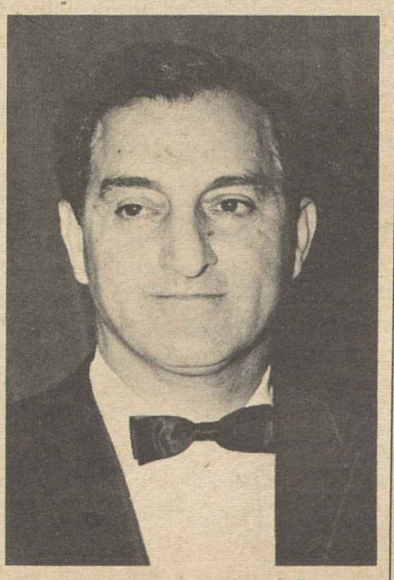
In a friend of the court brief, the AFL-CIO said the Mine Workers' plan, established in 1913 to provide legal services on workmen's compensation matters, should be upheld on the basis of these precedents.

The brief noted there was no evidence in the case to show "that the interests of a single member had ever been sacrificed under the plan" and that the complainant "significantly" was again the Bar Association (Illinois).

The brief charged that the Illinois Supreme Court's conclusion that the plan was a "threat to the attorney-client relationship" was "untenable" in line with the NAACP and Trainmen's decisions.

It pointed out the U.S. Supreme Court had declared it would require a showing of "substantive evils flowing" from group legal service plans before it would rule them illegal. "No such showing has been, or indeed can be, made here," the AFL-CIO said.

The Illinois court, it concluded, "deals only in passing with the serious consequences that the decision will have on workers' ability to secure truly adequate legal representation."



DANNY THOMAS

AGVA Elects Danny Thomas As President

New York—Danny Thomas, night club and television entertainer, was elected over three other candidates as president of the Variety Artists. He received 2,730 votes to 1,040 for his three opponents.

Jack Haley, who relinquished the presidency so Thomas could head a slate of candidates, was elected first vice president. Other winners on the slate: Penny Singleton, second vice president; Johnny Woods, third vice president; Roy Rogers, recording secretary, and Russell Swann, treasurer.

The officers were chosen for two-year terms, along with Paul Benson, elected to serve the remaining two years of an unexpired term on the national board. Three-year board terms were won by Frankie Avalon, Milton Berle, Blaze Fury, Harry Jordan, Billy Lee, Phil Maraquin, Jan Murray, Anne O'Connor, Romeo Perusse, Sally Rowe, Kathy Kurley Ryan, Lou Testa, Thomas, Haley and Miss Singleton, a past president.

Ballots in the election were tabulated by the American Arbitration Association. Names of some 60 candidates were on the ballot in the nation-wide contest.

House Rollcall Vote on Budget Slash

The House voted 202-182 for a motion intended to force Pres. Johnson to slash $5 billion from non-military federal programs. The Sept. 27th vote was "aimed at gutting the very domestic legislation the nation needs to meet the urban crisis," the AFL-CIO said.

Wrong votes (W) on the issue were cast by 168 Republicans and 34 Democrats. Right votes (R) against the attempt to compel the President to cut back programs voted by Congress were cast by 182 Democrats. Other symbols: PR—paired right; PW—paired wrong; A—absent and not paired. Numerals show districts; AL—at large.

At 14th Convention:

Brick Union Hailed For Southern Drive

Chicago—Three-hundred delegates to the 14th convention of the Brick & Clay Workers here drew strong encouragement in their fight to organize in the South from AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler and Organization Dir. William J. Kircher.

Schnitzler reported on the action of the AFL-CIO Executive Council supporting the strike of Brick & Clay Workers against Boren Clay Products in Greensboro, N. C. The council called on affiliates to back the union's boycott of the firm.

Kircher, who delivered the keynote address, said the union deserves much credit for launching an organization drive in the South and securing a beachhead.

Schnitzler reviewed legislative progress of the AFL-CIO and said the programs approved by Congress are reaching people. He noted that in 1964 job training was provided for 135,000 workers and that money has been appropriated to provide job training for 823,000 persons through 1968.

"We hear a lot about how we're getting fat and old," Schnitzler said, "but reports on our gains in membership show that somebody is working. We are not getting old. And we have a job to do."

Schnitzler said help will be needed to get legislation passed at the federal, state and local levels. One way an international union can participate, he suggested, is by making sure its local unions affiliate with their state and city central bodies.

The convention increased minimum dues from $4 to $5 a month, raised the monthly per capita payment by 50 cents, increased the international's share of initiation fees from $1.50 to $4 and boosted its share of the reinstatement fee by 50 cents.

Delegates kept a dues exemption for members who are on strike, laid off or sick, but otherwise revised the constitution to eliminate "double-bookkeeping" in levying dues.

Pres. Paul Pelfrey, Sec.-Treas. George A. Popovsky and eight union vice presidents were re-elected to new five-year terms by acclamation.

In a series of resolutions, delegates hit at the "dumping" of foreign ceramics and dinnerware on American markets, urged improvement in workmen's compensation and unemployment insurance, and called for a standard fee schedule for voluntary medical insurance under medicare.

The union is marking its 75th anniversary. It was formed by a group of brick and terra cotta workers in Chicago in 1887. The Chicago group and another from New Jersey met with Samuel Gompers at the first AFL convention in 1891 in Pittsburgh. Gompers suggested the groups form an international union and seek a charter in 1893.

Board Powers Upheld To Restrain Employers

The 10th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Denver upheld a temporary injunction obtained by the National Labor Relations Board to restrain an employer from labor law violations while charges against him were being processed.

A three-judge panel ruled the Board did not abuse its authority in obtaining an injunction against the Kansas Refined Helium Co. Moreover, it rebuked the NLRB for delay in seeking the restraining order.

The board sought the order under Section 10(j) of the Taft-Hartley Act to keep things as they were while it weighed charges by the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers that the company fired six workers and threatened others in 1966.

U.S. District Judge Wesley E. Brown of Wichita enjoined the firm from interfering with, restraining or coercing employes in the exercise of their rights and ordered it to reinstate the six fired men.

The employer appealed, arguing that a 10(j) petition should be filed only in rare emergency situations, that the NLRB abused its discretion because no emergency existed or was likely to exist before the case was settled, and that it failed to show anything other than reasonable cause to believe that unfair labor practices had been committed.

The appeals judges ruled, however, that nothing in the law limits the board to act only in emergencies. The board, they said, may seek a 10(j) injunction if it has reason to believe an unfair labor practice has occurred and a "reasonable apprehension" that a board order will be ineffective or delayed.

An order to reinstate the discharged workers was "clearly called for" under the circumstances as the purpose of the act "could be defeated if some temporary relief were not granted," the judges said. They upheld the lower court ruling with minor changes but added:

"It would appear that much of the problem . . . arose from the delay by the board in seeking the remedy. The more time that elapses between the time the incidents occur, the less effective injunctive relief becomes, and it becomes increasingly difficult to show it to be a 'just and proper' remedy. This could . . . reach a point where relief should be denied on that ground alone."

The employer fired the six union supporters on Sept. 20, 1966, and gave the remaining workers a raise the same day. But three months elapsed before the NLRB regional director filed a petition for the temporary injunction.

After the appellate court ruling, NLRB Trial Examiner Sidney Goldberg issued a report concluding that the company had coerced its employes and recommending that it be ordered to stop interfering with union activities and reinstate the discharged men.

Farm Workers Given Voice On Braceros

San Jose, Calif.—California farm workers will have a voice in shaping policies for importing foreign farm labor — braceros — under a pact reached between California Rural Legal Assistance, an anti-poverty agency here, and the Labor Dept.

CRLA previously won a court restraining order blocking the admission of 8,100 braceros from Mexico. The Labor Dept. had authorized their entry to help harvest California's tomato crop. With the agreement, the suit is dropped.

Study Panel

The pact provides for an independent panel of seven members—three named by CRLA—to reevaluate present procedures for authorizing foreign workers and submit recommendations to Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz.

CRLA has designated as its three panel members Dir. Cesar Chavez of the United Farm Workers' Organizing Committee; Michael Peevey, a representative of the California State AFL-CIO, and Bert Corona, president of the Mexican-American Political Association.

The pact calls for the Labor Dept. to meet with U.S. farm workers representatives to draw up new request forms whereby growers must pledge to comply with all of the department's requirements pertaining to the import of braceros.

A grower who is certified and fails to abide by the regulations will immediately lose his certification. The Bureau of Employment Security's investigative staff will be enlarged in California to make sure that regulations are being met.

Representatives of farm workers will be given seven days notice to submit evidence of non-compliance before a grower is certified.

House Coalition Battles To Force Budget Slash

House Democrats were called into an emergency caucus and Appropriations Committee Chairman George H. Mahon promised that his committee would start examining money already appropriated to see if some of the funds could be rescinded.

Even so, a new attempt to pass a resolution to allow the government to function for another few weeks barely succeeded. A Republican attempt to tack on the $5 billion budget slash was beaten by a scant 213-205. Again Republicans voted as a solid bloc, but 10 of the Democrats who had supported them on the first vote switched sides.

The recommittal of the Labor-HEW money bill to conference came about unexpectedly, since there was little controversy about the legislation.

'Economy' Warriors

Mahon, a fiscal conservative who supported the whittled down appropriations bill, took the floor to lash out sarcastically at House members who wanted to make the President cut spending but apparently couldn't find any fat to cut from money bills that came before them for approval. He criticized Republicans and Democrats by name and wondered aloud how "the economy warriors of yesterday" could vote for legislation that provided more money than was spent last year on similar programs.

House Republican Leader Gerald R. Ford (Mich.) replied caustically that Mahon's "eloquence" had changed his mind about the bill. Then the Republican-Dixie coalition sent the bill back to conference with instructions to House conferees to seek another $20 million in cuts.

The money bill—mostly earmarked for programs supervised by the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare—carries $138 million more than the House voted and $145 million less than the Senate voted. It includes $13.5 million for the Teacher Corps. The President had sought $33 million, the House had refused any funds, and the Senate had voted $18.1 million.

Johnson Launches Test Program To Spur Private Jobs in Ghettos

Pres. Johnson has announced a $40 million test program designed to spur a greater effort by private industry to create jobs in slum areas and train unemployed workers to fill them.

The program would reduce the risks for a business willing to build or expand in ghettos by providing several forms of government assistance. It also would supply additional funds to train unskilled workers.

In a letter to federal agencies involved, the President said "the heart of the new effort is to reach the forgotten and the neglected—those citizens handicapped by poor health, hampered by inadequate education, hindered by years of discrimination, and bypassed by conventional training programs."

To succeed, he added, the venture will "take more than promises of good intentions. It will require . . . the concerted action and involvement of the private sector, working closely with the federal government."

The test program, using funds already appropriated, will include these main devices:

- The Small Business Administration will guarantee leases on property, plant and equipment for a business willing to go into ghetto areas. If a new plant were burned out, for example, the rent would be paid.
- The Labor Dept. will designate ghetto and poverty areas in the test regions as labor surplus areas, enabling businesses there to bid on certain government contracts that are set aside for labor surplus regions.
- The government will pay all the cost of training unemployed workers for new jobs created under the test program.
- It also will finance technical aid provided by large firms to small ones setting up shops in slum areas, make funds available to transit companies that carry workers to ghetto plants, and pay for health services for employes.

Projects under the program will be launched in about five urban ghettos, as well as several rural poverty areas, the Administration said. Washington, Los Angeles, Chicago, Boston and San Antonio were listed as potential sites.

William E. Zisch, vice chairman of Aerojet-General Corp., was named by the President to head up an office in the Commerce Dept. that will direct the program.

At a press conference, Commerce Sec. Alexander B. Trowbridge and Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz expressed hope the program could "get off the ground" immediately and be expanded if it proves successful.

Plan Scored To Subsidize Home Builders

Subsidies and tax gimmicks to enrich private builders are no substitute for an adequately-financed federal public housing program, the AFL-CIO declared in a statement to the Senate Finance Committee.

The federation endorsed the objective—but not the method—of a bill by Sen. Robert F. Kennedy (D-N.Y.) to encourage more construction of low and middle-income housing.

But it said that "incentives" to guarantee builders profits of 13 to 15 percent with little risk would be squandering money urgently needed for existing programs, including rent subsidies and other non-profit operations.

The choice, the AFL-CIO said, is not between incentives to private industry and no program. It is between financing programs of proven value or diverting funds to "bribe" private capital into housing investments.

Although "well-intended," the effect of the incentive program would be to "divide the available resources of the nation," the federation stated.

Ben Robertson Named To Wage-Hour Post

Ben P. Robertson, a career federal employe, has been named deputy administrator of the Wage-Hour & Public Contracts divisions of the Labor Dept. Robertson has worked on the programs during his 26 years of service with the department.

Job Plan Loses Narrowly:

Senate Votes Boost In Poverty Program

voted for the plan; 29 Democrats and 18 Republicans opposed it.

The original Clark-Javits measure was then recommitted to the Labor Committee by a 54-28 vote.

On other key votes on the poverty bill, the Senate:

- Defeated, 51-36, an amendment by Sen. John J. Williams (R-Del.) to cut $198 million—the amount by which the Senate bill exceeds the President's budget request.
- Rejected, 49-30, an attempt to abolish the Job Corps and use part of the money saved for more vocational education.
- Defeated, 54-35, a move to "spin-off" the Head Start program from OEO to the Office of Education.
- Rejected, 57-28, a labor-opposed plan to pay a form of wage subsidies to employers who hire disadvantaged workers.
- Turned down, 45-41, an amendment by Sen. George Murphy (R-Calif.) to allow governors to veto OEO-financed programs to help migrant farm workers. As it emerged in the debate, the chief issue became one of allowing California's Gov. Ronald Reagan to block community programs which he says are helping farm workers' union organizing efforts.

The $2.26 billion authorization bill compares with last year's authorization of $1.75 billion for the poverty program. However only $1.5 billion was actually appropriated. Money voted by Congress almost always falls below the spending ceilings set by authorization bills.

While the budget battles were making the headlines, labor's effort to pass the on-site picketing bill met with a setback in the House.

The Rules Committee, acting at the request of Democratic leaders, voted to postpone action on the situs picketing bill approved by the House Labor Committee until after the Senate acts.

Majority Leader Carl Albert (Okla.) asked for the postponement at the request of Democratic regional whips. They said soundings among members showed a reluctance to cast a vote that would stir up business opposition without assurance of Senate action. House members have been gun-shy on labor legislation since the House-passed repeal of Taft-Hartley's Section 14(b) died last year in a Senate filibuster.

Labor Backs Gas Pipeline Merger Rule

The AFL-CIO asked Congress to protect consumers—as well as investors—when gas pipeline companies seek to merge.

A bill being considered by the Senate Commerce Committee would require the Federal Power Commission to certify that a proposed merger would be in the public interest.

The bill should be passed, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller said in a statement to the committee. He noted that the Securities & Exchange Commission sets up protections for investors when mergers are proposed, but "there is no existing federal law protecting consumers from the possible effects of such mergers on the rates they have to pay."

Biemiller noted that two major gas pipeline companies have been taken over recently and a third is being fought over by two holding companies.

"There is absolutely no review of such combinations as to their effect on the ultimate rate to consumers," Biemiller said.

He asked the committee, however, to drop one section of the bill which, under certain circumstances, would waive the Clayton Antitrust Act.

Bishop Orders Diocese To Take Lead on Pay

Beaumont, Tex.—Bishop Vincent M. Harris of the Catholic diocese has ordered the heads of all church institutions to put a minimum wage of $1.60 an hour into effect immediately for all employes, along with time-and-a-half for overtime.

The bishop, pointing out that the federal minimum wage law requires payment to newly covered workers of $1.60 in February 1971 and time-and-a-half after 40 hours in 1969, said in a letter to pastors and sister superiors "it is up to the church to lead, and not follow, in matters of social justice."

The new minimum of $64 for a 40-hour week may cause some hardships, the bishop wrote, but "every employe of the church must be paid a decent wage." Cases of special hardship "may be presented to me and I will help you figure out ways to save money in other areas" because no exceptions to the $1.60 minimum will be made, his directive asserted.

With living costs rising, "it is hard to see how anybody can live decently for less," said Bishop Harris. He added:

"I am sure . . . that all of you know of church employes working for starvation wages. May God forgive us. May He bless us as we turn over a new leaf."

Appeals Court Backs NLRB Address Rule

Richmond, Va.—The 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals upheld a National Labor Relations Board order that a hosiery manufacturer must supply the Textile Workers Union of America with the names and addresses of employes in plants the union seeks to organize.

The ruling was the first by an appeals court in a series of cases growing out of the NLRB's "Excelsior" rule governing voter lists in elections. U.S. district courts have upheld the board's orders in six other cases, refused them in one.

Appeals Judges Albert V. Bryan and Clement L. Haynsworth reversed a refusal by the District Court in Greensboro, N. C., to compel Hanes Hosiery Division of the Hanes Corp. to give the TWUA an address list of employes in its plants near Winston-Salem, N. C.

"It seems to us," the judges said, "that the board could justifiably consider an early release of the qualified voters' names and addresses necessary to an intelligent election. An informed electorate is essential if the result of an election is to be accorded its intended significance and accomplish its aims."

Rejecting all the employer's arguments, the court concluded that disclosing employes' names and addresses to a union is not an interference with the employes' right to organize, guaranteed by the labor law, but "in truth it is an assist to this end."

Backpay Order

Meanwhile, the union announced in Charlotte, N. C., that Hanes management has agreed to abide by a board order that it must offer jobs and $45,000 in backpay to eight employes it fired illegally during a TWUA organizing campaign in 1966. Two of the workers have refused re-employment with Hanes, the union said.

The dispute reached the federal courts when the NLRB ordered Hanes management to produce an address list in advance of an election set for Aug. 17, 1966. The company refused to obey the board order or a subpoena and the election was postponed. When the NLRB asked the District Court to enforce its order, the court refused, saying the list demanded was not "evidence" under the law.

The appeals judges disagreed. They cited an NLRB ruling in the Excelsior Underwear case, where an almost identical order was issued Feb. 4, 1966. They concluded that the board cited "sound reasons" for its Excelsior rule with logic "too obvious to warrant reiteration." They concluded:

"Fairness in the election process demands here . . . as in public or corporate elections, the opportunity of contesting parties to communicate their respective positions to the electorate." This, they said, includes "such completeness of information, and timeliness of its dissemination, as will allow the voters to make a reasoned choice."

Board Shifts Unit Policy, Bars Stockholder's Son

The National Labor Relations Board has modified past policy to exclude from bargaining units the children and spouse of a person with "substantial" stock interests in a closely held corporation.

The ruling came in a case in which the board directed that a ballot cast by Neal Chaykin, son of the president of a Miami firm, remain unopened and uncounted and that Retail Clerks Local 1625 be certified as the bargaining agent for employes of Foam Rubber City #2, doing business as Scandia.

Chaykin works full time in the warehouse and stores of Scandia, a corporation whose stock is split 50-50 between his father Adolph and uncle David.

The NLRB regional director in Miami ruled that Neal Chaykin enjoyed no special privileges because of his relationship, and was neither a supervisor nor a managerial employe but a salesman like any other. He permitted him to vote in a representation election, but the ballot was not counted when the union filed an objection. Without the ballot, the vote was 4 for the RCIA, 3 against.

An NLRB panel overruled the regional director despite the fact that he was applying past board policy. The corporation is owned and managed, the panel reasoned, by two individuals who possess full bargaining authority in precisely the same way as if they were co-partners.

"In these circumstances," the board said, "Neal Chaykin is an individual employed by his parent. To hold otherwise . . . on the technical ground that he is an employe of the corporation would be not only unrealistic, but also wholly at odds with the principle we follow" in co-partnership cases.

In the past, the board noted, "we have excluded individuals whose interests are more closely identified with those of management. Consistent with this practice we would exclude the children of the principals of closely held corporations."

It is obvious, the board concluded, that such children, "because of their relationship with a substantial owner of this type of enterprise, have interests more closely identified with management than with their fellow employes."

California Sets $1.65 Floor Under Wages

however, is exempt from the overtime pay requirements.

Domestic workers are one of the few groups excluded from coverage. But the commission voted to set up machinery to establish a minimum wage for domestics.

The special rate for students was raised from $1.05 and $1.10 to $1.35. Youngsters not in school working for a livelihood are covered by the $1.65 minimum.

Although the minimum wage does not apply specifically to men, both state and federal equal pay laws prohibit discrimination in pay among men and women doing the same work.

The federal minimum wage goes to $1.60 on Feb. 1 for persons presently covered by the $1.40 wage floor, but only to $1.15 for more than 8 million workers who were covered for the first time last year. Many other workers, in smaller establishments not in interstate commerce, are not protected by the federal wage-hour law and are dependent on state wage laws.

Sec.-Treas. Thomas L. Pitts of the California AFL-CIO said the state's labor movement will continue to press for a $2-an-hour minimum. But he said the Industrial Welfare Commission's action in moving the wage floor up to $1.65 and setting a 40-hour week "is without doubt the most meaningful step taken in recent years to improve the lot of millions of low-income workers in California."

California will be the only state other than Alaska, where living costs are traditionally high, to exceed the federal minimum wage.

Full Holiday Status Urged For Oct. 12

The AFL-CIO has expressed its support for a bill to make Columbus Day, Oct. 12, a federal legal holiday.

In a statement submitted to a House Judiciary subcommittee, the federation pointed out that the holiday is already observed in 44 states and provided for in a number of collective bargaining agreements.

"The date on which Christopher Columbus discovered the New World, marked an event that influenced the destiny of all humanity and the personal lives of all of us as immigrants and children of immigrants," the statement said.

"It is high time that the anniversary of Columbus's discovery . . . should receive the nation's recognition as a holiday."

The statement further noted that the AFL-CIO, through actions of conventions and the Executive Council, has been on record in support of making Columbus Day a holiday since 1963.

Nation's Jobless Rate Climbs to 4.1%

BLS Cites Huge Influx Of Women

By Robert B. Cooney

A huge influx of adult women jobseekers into the labor force pushed the nation's jobless rate to 4.1 percent in September while the employment situation remained strong, the Labor Dept. reported.

Arthur M. Ross, Commissioner of Labor Statistics, said the large increase in adult female jobseekers accounted "entirely" for the rise in the jobless rate from 3.8 percent in August. The rates for adult men and teenagers remained unchanged.

The seasonally adjusted jobless rate of 4.1 percent is the highest since November 1965 and the increase is the largest in five years.

There were several possible explanations for what Ross described as the "rather fantastic" increase of 1.4 million adult female jobseekers in the four-month period from May to September. Adult women in the labor force increased by nearly 1 million between August and September alone—500,000 more than usual.

Ross observed that when jobs are scarce, women tend to drop out of the labor force; when jobs become more plentiful, they rush in. He pointed out that, during the slower pace of economic activity in the first half of this year, the labor force participation rate of adult females was retarded, followed by a period of rapid expansion.

Another factor which increased to some degree the number of adult women involved in the September totals relates to a 1967 change in unemployment definitions. The new definition counts persons seeking work in the previous four weeks while the old definition counted only those seeking jobs in the week before the survey.

As the Labor Dept. noted, the August to September period is when many adult women enter the labor force to seek jobs as their children enter school. Thus the survey net would rope in many more adult women at this particular time.

"The employment of women also moved up strongly (in September), but not enough to equal the substantial labor force jump," the report said, adding:

"As a result, the number of unemployed women increased by about 250,000 and their jobless rate rose from 3.9 to 4.9 percent."

2 Million U.S. Workers Voted Pay Hike by House

JOB TRAINING program for the unemployed operated by the AFL-CIO Alameda, Calif. County Central Labor Council gets a surprise visitor. Vice Pres. Hubert Humphrey, who stopped by while on a West Coast speaking engagement, talks to welder trainee Wayne Weyart.

Federal Employes Promised Catch-up

By David L. Perlman

The House voted a two-step 11 percent pay raise for more than 700,000 postal workers and a three-step formula to bring 1.2 million other federal employes at least up to private industry pay levels.

It narrowly defeated, 211-199, a Republican-sponsored move to limit the bill to the first-year increase of 6 percent for postal workers and 4.5 percent for the classified civil service.

The bill sent to the Senate provides these first-step increases retroactive to Oct. 1.

Next July, postal workers would receive an additional 5 percent hike. At the same time, classified employes would receive increases sufficient to close half the gap existing between their pay and private industry rates for comparable jobs. Employes would be guaranteed at least a 3 percent raise, but the average would be considerably higher. In April, 1969, they would move up to full comparability.

The government's hourly-paid blue collar workers, whose pay is based on prevailing wages in the areas where they work, are not affected by the salary legislation.

Packaged with the pay bill was a postage rate increase aimed at bringing in an additional $890 million in revenue, slightly more than the Administration had sought.

It would raise the rates for all classes of postage, effective next January. The cost of letter and postcard postage would go up one cent, air mail letters and greeting cards two cents. Third class business mailing, including so-called junk mail, would be raised 32 per-

Southern States Lose School Plea

The Supreme Court has declined to review a sweeping school desegregation order affecting six southern states.

The high court rejected petitions by nine school boards in Louisiana and Alabama—two of the affected states—to review an order for top-to-bottom school desegregation issued by the Fifth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. The circuit court told the six states in its jurisdiction, including Florida, Georgia, Mississippi and Texas, to stop stalling on the issue.

It found that so-called "freedom of choice" plans that theoretically allow Negroes to attend white schools had failed to break down patterns of separate schooling. It ordered school officials to take "affirmative action" to bring about an integrated system "in which there are no Negro schools and no white schools — just schools."

$20 Million a Month:

Auto Workers Vote Boost in Strike Dues

By Eugene A. Kelly

Detroit—The Auto Workers voted strong backing for 200,000 members on strike at Ford, Caterpillar and 28 other companies and beefed up the union strike fund to the tune of an additional $20 million a month as long as the need exists.

By emphatic majorities at an emergency convention here, nearly 2,500 delegates voted an immediate increase from $5 a month to $25 in plants where the average straight-time hourly rate is $3 or more, $15 where the plant average is less than $3.

The debate was long and sometimes heated but the vote on eight proposed changes in the UAW constitution was virtually unanimous, except for an unexpected proposal to change the dues formula permanently after the emergency ends. That passed, too, but the margin was not quite so overwhelming.

The UAW has had 160,000 members on strike since Sept. 6 against Ford Motor Co. plants in 25 states, and 26,000 out at Caterpillar Tractor Co. since Oct. 1. Both walkouts followed last-minute "take it or leave it" offers far below union proposals.

Indications of a possible new offer by Ford came Oct. 10 when management asked union negotiators to stand by for a meeting on short notice. Both sides then announced a news "blackout"—first for 24 hours, then for an indefinitely extended period. It was still in effect as the AFL-CIO News went to press. Such blackouts in past years have preceded a break in negotiations.

At the Oct. 8 convention, 2,430 delegates from 903 local unions in the U.S. and Canada voted to raise dues for the duration of the emergency and, after it ends, to put a

Four Cities Selected for Arts Project

Four cities have been chosen for organized labor's pilot project aimed at stimulating union participation in community cultural affairs, AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Herman Kenin has announced.

The year-long projects will be run in New York City, which is a major production area, and Buffalo, N.Y., Louisville, Ky., and Minneapolis, Minn. In all four cities, strong support for the program has already developed, Kenin noted.

The decision followed a day-long meeting at AFL-CIO headquarters

Labor Board Election Results Show Sharp Surge by White Collar Unions

Dramatic growth in white collar unionism is revealed in a recent survey of National Labor Relations Board elections for the first half of 1967 and reports of major membership gains by three AFL-CIO unions.

The survey, by the Bureau of National Affairs, showed that white collar workers voted for union representation in nearly 64 percent of the 500 representation elections conducted by the NLRB among clerical, technical and retail sales workers.

Detailing the study in the publication White Collar Report, BNA said the statistics reflect a "rapidly accelerating increase" in white collar unionism.

The 500 elections were almost double the figure for last year's first half and close to the 580 elections held in all of 1966. This year's totals showed unions won 319 elections among 7,045 white collar employes — both figures close to 12-month totals for last year, according to BNA.

This is the first reporting period in which white collar union gains have exceeded 50 percent, it said.

Dir. William L. Kircher of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization said union membership growth among white collar employes has continued to make "dramatic strides" during 1966 and 1967.

He cited Bureau of Labor Statistics studies showing that unions added 300,000 such members in the 1962-64 period. While a final report is not yet available for the 1964-66 period, recent BLS studies indicate that three white collar unions alone accounted for a membership increase of 180,388 during the 1964-66 period.

This, Kircher noted, is "nearly two thirds of the total record rise for all white collar membership during the previous two-year period."

Citing BLS statistics, Kircher noted that membership in the Retail Clerks rose 15 percent from 1964 to 1966. In the State, County & Municipal Employes, the increase was 20 percent, and in the Government Employes, 44 percent.

Hawaii Labor Sets Program On Legislation

Honolulu—Strong support for labor's legislative objectives at both the state and national levels was the dominant theme of resolutions adopted by delegates to the Hawaii AFL-CIO convention here.

The three-day convention also heard addresses from a number of labor and government officials, changed the federation's constitution and by-laws and elected a new president, Francis J. Kennedy.

Kennedy, business manager of Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers' Local 1260, succeeds Carl J. Guntert of the Machinists. Kennedy was elected unanimously after Guntert and several others declined nominations.

Delegates adopted resolutions backing Pres. Johnson's Viet Nam policy and calling on Congress to enact pending legislation for truth-in-lending, fair packaging, pollution control, situs-picketing and liberalization of the Hatch Act.

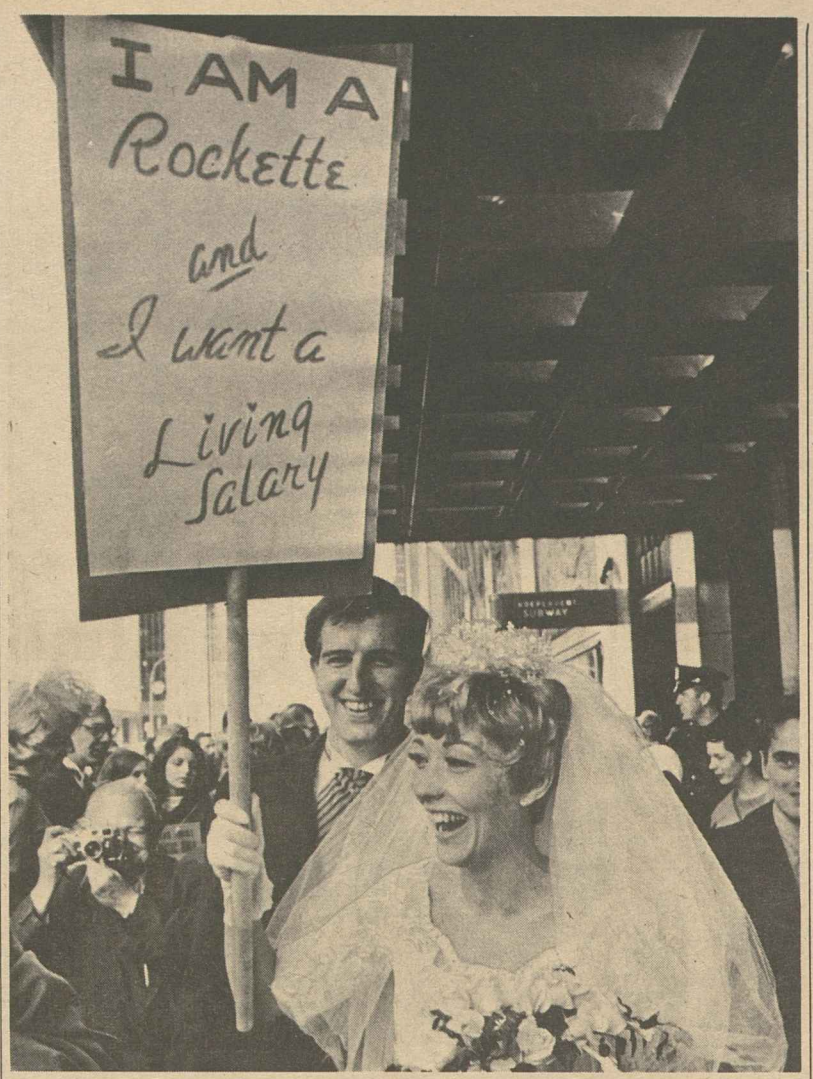
Legislation Urged

The convention also urged stronger industrial safety laws and more safety inspectors at the state level, supported an increase in the state's $1.25 an hour minimum wage law and asked the state legislature to probe the auto insurance business in Hawaii.

Another resolution urged Lt. Gov. Thomas P. Gill to take legal action seeking exemption of the island state from an oil import quota program that results in "overcharges" on oil and refinery products coming into the state.

Constitution and by-law amendments provide for a new five-member executive committee to guide day-to-day operations of the federation and boards for each of four island divisions—Oahu, Maui, Kauai and Hawaii.

Gill and Gov. John A. Burns were among featured speakers at the convention. Others included State Senate Pres. John T. Hulten, Speaker of the Hawaii House Tadao Beppu; Stanton Smith, AFL-CIO coordinator of state and city central bodies, and Executive Sec.-Treas. Thomas L. Pitts of the California AFL-CIO.



TIME OUT to get married and back to the picket line for this Radio City Music Hall Rockette—and she brought her new husband with her. The former Mimi Schwensen, now Mrs. Sergio Suarez, was married in nearby St. Patrick's Cathedral. The Rockettes are members of the American Guild of Variety Artists. They struck the Music Hall for a new contract with substantial increases in pay scales. The strike was subsequently settled.

Nebraska Labor Hits Sales Tax as 'Hoax'

Grand Island, Neb.—Tax reform—state and federal—was strongly urged by delegates to the Nebraska AFL-CIO convention.

The convention denounced as a "hoax" the state's substitution of a "regressive sales tax" for property taxes under the guise of "tax relief." The effect, a resolution charged, has been to increase the tax burden on lower income families.

Delegates pledged support for a genuine tax reform "based on ability to pay."

Another resolution called on Congress to close loopholes which have enabled wealthy individuals and corporations to escape a fair share of taxes, and urged raising the present $600 personal exemption to $1,000.

The convention re-elected Pres. Richard Nisley, Sec.-Treas. Nels Petersen and incumbent executive board members.

It also approved a two-cent increase in per capita payments—from 15 to 17 cents a month. The added funds were earmarked for legislative and educational programs.

Other resolutions included endorsement of a strong federal meat inspection law, covering the 15 percent of slaughtered meat and 25 percent of processed meat not subject to government inspection. Until such a law is passed, union members were urged to buy only meat with a U.S. inspection label.

The convention denounced compulsory arbitration, terming it "a cure that would kill the patient."

To Draft Standards:

World Parley Slated On Shipboard Jobs

Geneva—A two-week session of the Intl. Labor Organization's Joint Maritime Commission completed preparations for the drafting of new standards to assure a better life for the world's seamen.

The commission of 15 representatives of seamen's unions and 15 spokesmen for shipowners set 1970 as the target date for a full-dress ILO conference devoted exclusively to the maritime industry. The commission decided that the conference should be preceded in 1969 by a technical meeting of the principal maritime nations to sift the issues.

Vice Pres. Earl Shepard of the Seafarers told the commission he would ask the U. S. government to invite the ILO to hold the technical session in an American East Coast port.

Shepard's announcement was warmly endorsed by Ralph E. Casey, president of the American Merchant Marine Institute and U.S. shipowner member of the commission.

"We are working on a wide range of matters," Shepard reported after the session. "Although I am always impatient to see more get done, I am satisfied that we accomplished all that could be accomplished at this meeting."

Agenda Set

The 5-point agenda set for the 1970 conference, he said, "meets my idea of what the agenda should be. We will get something out of it."

The need to update the minimum international standards on crew accommodations, wages, hours of work and manning scales will be some of the key issues before the conference. Also to be examined are the crucial problems being raised for seamen by the technical innovations aboard the world's merchant ships.

Accident prevention, vocational training and welfare arrangements both at sea and in port are other matters to be dealt with at the 1970 conference.

Thomas J. Walker of the National Maritime Union, who attended the commission session as a deputy seaman member expressed satisfaction because "every item on this agenda is important and the seafarers' group worked hard for them."

"There was cooperation from all sides," Walker reported. "The meeting was a great success, even though many of the problems will take a long effort to solve because of continuing technological changes."

Another NMU representative, Harry A. Clark, attended the session as an adviser to the seafarers' group.

The seamen stressed in a document they presented that "far-sighted planning and effective cooperation" by all sides in the maritime industry are essential in these times of rapid technological innovations to assure a "smooth transition from the old to the new era."

It is important, they said, that competition among the various merchant fleets for cargo "should not be carried on to the detriment of seafarers."

"On the contrary," they continued, "their conditions should be maintained and further improved."

Advances in productivity, the seafarers insisted, should benefit the men who sail the ships in the form of "shorter hours of work, higher pay and generous and more frequent shore leave."

Ohio Doubles Per Cap, Spurs Political Action

Cleveland—A special one-day convention of the Ohio State AFL-CIO voted a major new political action program—and the money to finance it.

Delegates overwhelmingly approved doubling the state federation's per capita rate—from 5 to 10 cents a month for each member.

It will finance a computer data-processing system, in cooperation with the national AFL-CIO's Committee on Political Education, for use in registration and get-out-the-vote drives and in analyzing candidates' records. Also planned is a new publication to be sent to every affiliated union member in the state.

"Our goal is to establish a working year-round intensified political action program in every corner of this state," Ohio AFL-CIO Pres. Frank W. King declared.

National COPE Dir. Al Barkan told the 1,708 delegates that expanded political action is necessary to block anti-labor threats that "can't be stopped on the picket line or at the bargaining table," including campaigns being waged by the National Association of Manufacturers and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.

The only other resolution passed at the special off-year convention was a unanimous vote of support to the Auto Workers in the Ford strike.

Southern States Must Act To Desegregate Schools

The Supreme Court's refusal to review the decision left it in effect.

In another case, however, the Supreme Court refused to consider the argument that school officials have an obligation to reduce racial imbalance caused by neighborhood residential patterns in the North. It let stand a Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals ruling that school officials in Cincinnati have no constitutional duty to reduce racial imbalance that can not be traced to discriminatory actions by public officials.

The court also let stand decisions that:

- Upheld the right of the National Labor Relations Board to issue cease-and-desist orders to halt racial discrimination by unions.
- Upheld the constitutionality of a Pennsylvania law permitting state funds to be used to transport children to parochial schools. The issue is a significant one in New York State, where the present state constitution specifically bars such expenditures and the proposed new constitution substitutes instead the less-restrictive language of the federal constitution.

The high court refused to reconsider a recent 5-4 decision which upheld the contempt of court conviction of the Rev. Martin Luther King, Jr., and seven other Negro ministers. They led a civil rights march in Birmingham in 1963 in defiance of a state court injunction they branded unconstitutional.

The AFL-CIO had joined in urging the Supreme Court to reconsider the case, contending that it could lead to punishment of unions for ignoring obviously illegal injunctions designed to break strikes or block an organizing campaign.

Lower court decisions which the Supreme Court did agree to review include cases involving the rate-setting authority of the Musicians on band engagements and the question of whether insurance company debit agents are employes—as the NLRB and the Insurance Workers maintain—or independent contractors.

The court also agreed to decide if a federal district court in Mississippi should have enjoined enforcement of a state law forbidding the picketing of public buildings. The law was aimed at Negro demonstrators and was used the day after its enactment for mass arrests of Negroes picketing the county courthouse in Hattiesburg.

A PORTRAIT of Samuel Gompers now hangs in the ward room of the USS Samuel Gompers, destroyer tender named in honor of the founder of the modern U.S. labor movement. Presentation to the ship's captain, Harry Risch, was made by Pres. Paul C. Warner of the Bremerton, Wash., Metal Trades Council, whose 16 affiliated unions and their members built the ship.

IBEW Local Gets Training Contract

The Labor Dept. announced that Local 49 of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers will serve as subcontractor in the Portland, Ore., area for a $30,000 apprentice training program.

The union will develop subcontracts with appliance firms which agree to place 24 trainees as apprentices, 12 in radio-television repair work and 12 as appliance repair servicemen.

All trainees will take two weeks of pre-job training at Mt. Hood Community College in Gresham, Ore., before starting on-the-job training—36 weeks for appliance servicemen, 50 weeks for the others.

$20 Million a Month:

Auto Union Votes Strike Fund Boost

new and permanent dues formula into effect.

Delegates spoke for and against the proposed changes in a six-hour debate, then voted by heavy majorities to amend the UAW constitution as follows:

- For the period Oct. 8-31 this year, and each month thereafter during the emergency, dues will rise from a minimum of $5 a month by $10 or $20 a month, depending on average earnings figured plantwide.
- Where dues are higher than $5, dues will rise automatically by the amount of the voted increase, to stay at the new level unless a change is voted by the local membership.
- The new schedule remains in effect until the strike fund reaches $25 million and UAW board members declare the emergency ended. Then the dues will be the equivalent of two hours straight-time pay per month, based on each individual's actual earnings. That will mean average dues of $7 a month, the union estimated.

The convention authorized the UAW executive board to make exceptions when justified; specified how the dues income is to be divided, and how dues delinquents may be reinstated; and referred to the May 1968 UAW convention a proposal to increase strike benefits, now $20 to $30 a week, keyed to family status.

UAW Pres. Walter P. Reuther reported "this is the toughest strike" ever because the auto companies and major farm implement makers have "conspired together." He said the union may ask Congress to investigate the conspiracy charge and declared the Ford strike may last longer than the 113-day strike against General Motors in 1945-46 "unless Ford starts this week to negotiate in good faith."

Sec.-Treas. Emil Mazey reported that strike fund expenditures this year through Oct. 7 were $21.7 million, and the fund balance on that date was $51.6 million.

The new dues schedule should raise about $20 million a month, Mazey said, for the 200,000 members on strike against Ford, Caterpillar, and 28 other firms. Caterpillar strike benefits will take $750,000 a week. A Chrysler strike would cost an additional $3.25 million a week, and a GM strike $12 million.

"Nobody can tell with any degree of certainty when this Ford strike will end," he said, noting that "it could be over in two weeks" if management would "listen to this convention." Mazey added: "Unless GM agrees to some changes in grievance procedure and representation language, we're going to have a GM strike as well."

PILOT PROGRAMS in four cities to stimulate labor's participation in the arts were discussed at a meeting in Washington by representatives of the central labor bodies of the cities with AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Herman Kenin and representatives of the Dept. of Community Services and SPACE.

with the presidents and Community Services Committee leaders of the four cities. Heading the operation for the AFL-CIO are Leo Perlis, director of Community Services, and Jack Golodner, executive director of SPACE, the AFL-CIO's new Council of Scientific, Professional & Cultural Employees.

Initial programs are already being mapped for the promotion and development of the arts in each of these areas, Kenin said. Under consideration are the sponsorship or cosponsorship of concerts, theatrical and other stage performances, art shows and other events.

Since this is a demonstration project, Perlis and Golodner pointed out, different proposals will be undertaken in each of the areas, so that the final report to the Executive Council will be based on broad experimentation.

Labor Challenges Use Of California Convicts

San Francisco—Gov. Ronald Reagan's use of convict labor to aid farm employers in harvesting fig and grape crops in Merced and San Bernardino counties has been challenged in a court action initiated by the California AFL-CIO.

A federation suit asked Superior Court Judge Charles S. Perry to find that the use of prison labor violates the state's constitution and to issue a restraining order halting it. Judge Perry scheduled a "show cause" hearing for Oct. 16.

The suit charged that Reagan violated a provision of the constitution permitting the legislature to authorize convicts' labor "for the benefit of the state" and stipulating that prisoners may not be let out "by contract to any person, copartnership, company or corporation."

Further, the suit stressed that the labor was authorized at lower standards than those provided in a settlement agreement negotiated by the Labor Dept. to apply when the use of foreign farm workers is authorized in California.

The state was a party to that agreement through its department of employment, the AFL-CIO suit pointed out.

Commenting on the suit, State AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas L. Pitts declared, "Everyone from Gov. Reagan on down must recognize that if there are crops rotting in any fields worth saving, they must be worth the payment of decent wages to save them."

"Any other view," he added, "places the profits of a few growers above the plight of the people who harvest our crops, some of the most unfairly recompensed people in our state."

When Reagan sent convicts into the fields he said they were being paid "prevailing wages." However, Pitts countered that they were not, that domestic labor was available and that the use of the prisoners was "gross perversion" of a law allowing the use of convicts for "rehabilitative" purposes.

Meanwhile, in Washington, Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz said that California's farm employers have failed to use about 2,000 imported workers available to them — employing only 6,175 of the 8,100 braceros authorized by the Labor Dept.

In response to a report from Rep. John J. McFall (D-Calif.) on the state's estimated shortage of domestic farm workers, Wirtz said "we have some difficulty comprehending" shortages on the basis of these figures.

RCIA Gets Union Shop In San Francisco Pacts

San Francisco—The Retail Clerks here achieved a 30-year objective—union security—in new contracts covering more than 4,000 employes of 16 downtown and surburban store firms.

Identical agreements with the San Francisco Retailers Council were ratified by members of RCIA Locals 1100 and 410, representing department store employes and retail shoe and textile salesmen. Settlement was reached after members voted for strike authorization.

The new five-year pacts provide wage boosts of 25 cents an hour with a contract reopening on wages possible after three years, increased pensions, longer vacations, additional health and welfare benefits and increased holiday pay.

A modified union shop requires union membership as a condition of employment for all employes hired after Jan. 31, 1968, all present members and those who attain regular employe status by Jan. 31.

Union representatives said they expect the security clause will bring virtually 100 percent union membership to the stores within three years.

3-Step Raise

Under the settlement, sales employes get a 10-cent hourly increase retroactive to June 1, and additional 7.5-cent hourly raises June 1, 1968 and 1969—a raise the unions said would mean $1,092 for each full-time employe over three years.

"Big ticket" employes — those who sell furniture, appliances, men's clothing and shoes — will receive 10-cent raises in each of the three years for a total of $1,248.

Effective Sept. 1, pension benefits were raised to $100 a month for those with 35 years of service, with graduated increases for those with shorter service. An orthodontia benefit was added to health-welfare coverage, and a fourth week of vacation for 20-year employes will be effective next Jan. 1.

The agreements will be open for talks on more wages, eye care benefits and pension improvements in 1970, said Secretaries Walter Johnson of Local 1100 and William Silverstein of Local 410.

Jean-Paul Plante Joins CLC Research Staff

Ottawa, Ont. — Appointment of Jean-Paul Plante as assistant research director of the Canadian Labor Congress was announced by Acting CLC Pres. Donald MacDonald. Plante has worked for three research organizations and holds a master's degree in economics from Laval University.

'Knowledge Gap' Seen On Construction Jobs

Pacific Grove, Calif.—A "knowledge gap" is complicating the problem of providing construction jobs for Negroes, William E. Pollard of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights told a conference of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

The conference brought together some 400 delegates representing NAACP chapters in 13 western states, including Hawaii and Alaska.

Pollard cited a widespread misconception that the construction industry offers more job opportunities than actually exist. Automation in construction, he pointed out, has eliminated, and is continuing to eliminate "thousands of semi-skilled and unskilled jobs." He noted, also, that most jobs in the industry now require skills that can only be obtained through apprenticeship programs.

On the other hand, Pollard noted, some union officials "fail to recognize the lack of knowledge of apprenticeship in the minority community" and are not aware of the problem Negro youths have in getting job training.

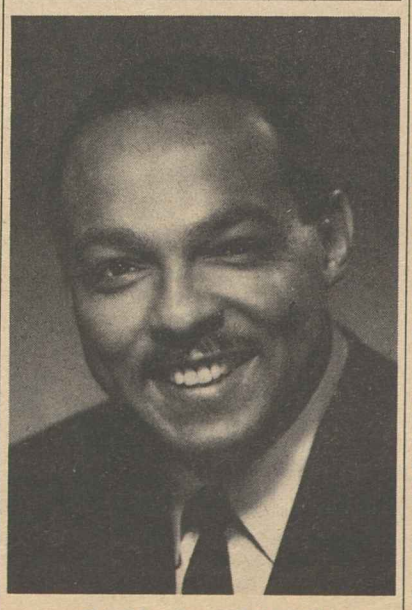
He said the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights has recognized this "gap" and is advancing programs that "should result in an increasing number of minority group apprentices throughout the nation."

The department, he noted, is cooperating with the Equal Employment Opportunities Commission, the Labor Dept. and other agencies to "bring knowledge of apprenticeship and its problems" to civil rights groups.

He described AFL-CIO activities in "working with a number of civil rights organizations to expand the intake of minority group youth in apprenticeship training programs."

As an example, Pollard pointed to the program jointly operated by the Workers Defense League and the A. Philip Randolph Educational Fund to recruit minority youngsters for apprenticeship opportunities.

He also cited programs in New York, Buffalo, Cleveland, Newark, Baltimore, Detroit, Oklahoma City, Philadelphia, Denver and Dayton where building trades unions are cooperating with government and private programs to train Negro apprentices.



CARL B. STOKES

Stokes Backed For Mayor Of Cleveland

Cleveland—The Cleveland AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education has endorsed State Rep. Carl B. Stokes for mayor with the declaration that he "offers Cleveland the greatest opportunity for leadership at City Hall."

Stokes, a Negro, defeated incumbent Mayor Ralph S. Locher in the Oct. 2 Democratic primary. He now faces the Republican nominee, Seth C. Taft, in the Nov. 7 general election.

Action Ratified

An endorsement statement, adopted earlier by a COPE scanning committee, was overwhelmingly approved at a meeting of 175 representatives of AFL-CIO unions in the city.

Noting that Cleveland must solve problems of securing more housing, clearing slums and creating jobs, the statement described Stokes as the candidate "with the greatest ability to provide the leadership it will take to get the entire community working together."

It said Stokes' record as a state representative clearly indicates that he understands and supports the basic objectives of organized labor."

An attorney, Stokes worked his way through both the University of Minnesota and the Cleveland-Marshall Law School. In 1962, he became the first Negro Democrat ever elected to the Ohio legislature. Before that he was an assistant city prosecutor for four years. In 1965, running for mayor as an independent, he was defeated by Locher by 2,143 votes of 237,000 cast.

Sullivan Named to Health Facilities Study

AFL-CIO Vice Pres. David Sullivan has been appointed by Pres. Johnson to a newly-established National Advisory Commission on Health Facilities.

The 14-member group will undertake a year-long study of the changing needs for hospital construction and modernization, and the financing of health facilities.

The Doctor Gouge

THE MEDICARE PROGRAM completed its first year with tributes to its successful beginnings in bringing hospital and doctors' care to the nation's elderly.

The basic legislative defects that labor had pointed up at the time of congressional passage were still there—co-insurance, deductibles and exclusions. But now a new factor has surfaced, the increasing costs of the program triggered by rising hospital costs and a sky-rocketing of doctors' fees.

As a result, the government is seriously considering an increase in the monthly cost to the elderly of the supplemental medical insurance program—an increase that could range as high as 33⅓ percent.

The unprecedented rise in doctors' fees is the major factor in the proposed increase in cost to the elderly. For the year ending June 1967 the boost in physicians' fees was nearly three times the rise in the overall Consumer Price Index.

Their incomes, estimated to be averaging in the $35,000-$40,000 a year bracket, have gone up even more sharply as they receive full fees from many medicare and medicaid patients who previously were treated at reduced rates.

For the year 1966 doctors' fees jumped 7.8 percent; for the 12 months ending August 1967 they spurted up at a rate of 8.9 percent.

Part of the spectacular increase is tied to the demand for doctors' services and the number of doctors available. The demand for services is expected to increase by one-third by 1975 while the supply of doctors is expected to increase only 17 percent—and most of these will be specialists. With demand running ahead of supply, fees are being geared to a tight market.

If the medicare program is to continue to operate effectively and efficiently, physicians must bring their fees into line and drop a system tied to whatever the traffic will bear. The alternative is a control system to protect the public interest.

Another Face of Poverty

GRINDING POVERTY and deprivation has many faces including the quarter of a million children who lead the rootless life of migrant farm workers.

They are members of migratory families that follow the picking season across the nation. They leave school in the spring when seasonal farm labor is on the rise and do not return until two or three months after the regular school term has begun.

The result, according to the Dept. of Agriculture, is "a lower educational attainment than any other group of American children."

Half of all migratory workers were in families with an income below $3,000 a year. The short work year and low wages spell deadend for these mostly white workers.

In the overwhelming concern for solutions to the urban crisis, the migratory farm workers must not be forgotten. Their poverty and the fate of their children call for the same attention as that given those in the slums and ghettos of the cities.

Variety of Programs in Effect To Prevent, Cure Disability

The following is excerpted from "Disability and Dependency" by Terence E. Carroll, director of the National Institute on Rehabilitation & Health Services, appearing in the October 1967 issue of the Federationist.

CHRONIC ILLNESS AND DISABILITY have become major health problems of our country. While there has been considerable quibbling over the statistical accuracy of the estimates of our handicapped population, based on both survey procedures and definitions, there are at least 22 million people whose mobility is restricted and over 4 million whose conditions prevent them from working, going to school or keeping house.

The economic costs and losses resulting from disability are impossible to measure precisely, but they represent an economic burden of staggering proportions. These are nevertheless a lesser factor to be considered than the personal loss; the inability of an individual human being to realize himself as a person.

Who then is disabled? We recognize with little difficulty the disability of a mentally ill individual in a state mental hospital, the aged stroke victim in the nursing home, the paraplegic confined to a wheel chair as a result of a rock fall in a mine. But what of the Puerto Rican immigrant who is illiterate in English, the language of the new culture in which he is immersed? What of the semi-literate former share cropper displaced by the cotton picking machine? What of the widowed or abandoned young mother with three small children to care for and little or no vocational skills? Are not these individuals also disabled? Practically speaking any unemployed person of employable age is disabled in the sense that he cannot function in an activity in which he is expected to participate, even if his unemployment results merely from his lack of social or vocational skills . . .

Disability can in most instances be both prevented and "cured." We can prevent disability by providing an adequate measure of health services, educational services, housing, diet and the other components which every individual is entitled to in our society. It can be cured by much the same approach by providing the individual who is disabled with the services which are required by him . . .

We have developed a variety of programs to provide both cash income and medical, social, vocational and educational services to aid the disabled in our society. Among those programs which provide income replacement to the disabled are public programs such as disability benefits under social security, workmen's compensation, veterans' pensions and such privately funded programs as the collectively bargained disability insurance programs and those which are individually purchased.

An area of disability insurance within the private sector which receives little attention, but which has over the last three decades expanded rapidly and promises to continue to expand, is that of total and permanent disability riders on mortgage and short term loan balances. Although the individually underwritten insurance in this area has been so ridden with abuse as to make a congressional investigation extremely likely in the near future, group creditors' insurance and particularly that provided by the credit unions, has provided remarkably inexpensive benefits.

Although public welfare is not in concept an income replacement mechanism it is nevertheless a source of cash benefits to many of the disabled, and considering the inadequacy of the benefits of all of the foregoing mentioned programs and the limitations on the duration of benefits of some of them, it has frequently become a final, albeit inadequate, source of income replacement for many of the disabled.

Any discussion of the adequacy of any of these programs in meeting the real income needs of the disabled is a depressing one. Workmen's compensation, which is our oldest social insurance program providing income replacement, falls far short of the mark of providing even the target goal of two-thirds of the earnings lost.

A DISABLED PERSON requires more than merely cash income; he also requires a wide variety of medical, social and vocational services in order to once more equip him as a functioning member of society.

Some of the major public programs providing services to the disabled are state-federal programs of Vocational Rehabilitation, Medicare and Medicaid, employment services programs (including MDTA), public health programs (primarily preventive in their scope of activities, although increasingly becoming involved in direct service medical care programs), public school programs (an increasing number of public school systems are becoming involved in training programs which are relevant to the handicapped), OEO sponsored health centers and workmen's compensation.

NAM, Chamber Aim for a Kill:

Anti-Labor Legislative Drive Points Toward 1968 Election

The following is excerpted from the Oct. 2 issue of Memo from COPE, published by the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education.

CONGRESSIONAL CONSERVATIVES and major elements of the business community have launched a twin thrust at labor's throat. It involves:

1. A softening-up process in Congress by way of a gradual build-up of sentiment for a series of anti-labor proposals; and

2. A massive grass-roots propaganda effort among memberships of powerful business groups to line up support for the big push in Congress.

The conservatives' jugular instinct was whetted by election successes in 1966. Their hopes for the kill rest on the outcome of the elections in 1968.

Their campaign, thus, is entirely political in nature. It relies wholly on election of a Congress willing to enact anti-union legislation. Deny the conservatives a political victory in 1968 and their whole strategy crumbles. Give them a political victory in 1968, and their success is assured.

Outside of Congress, the drive is spearheaded by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the National Association of Manufacturers. Each mildly refers to its campaign as one for "labor law reform." But there is nothing mild about the specifics of their plan.

Here's what they are proposing either outright or by inference:

- Antitrust law coverage for trade unions.
- Dismantling of the National Labor Relations Board and establishment of a so-called "Labor Court" in its stead.
- A prohibition against coordinated, multi-union bargaining.

The Chamber already has sent out its road show to 12 cities where "Labor Law Reform Workshops" have been conducted by teams of management labor relations men. Purpose of the workshops, according to one Chamber publication, was "to alert the business community to the long-overdue need for (labor) reform legislation."

The NAM is following up with a series of 11 workshops. The clinics will be conducted by Charles A. Kothe, author of an NAM-distributed book, "Industrial Freedom in the Non-Union Plant."

The propaganda barrage picking up tempo in the NAM and Chamber coincides with conservative efforts in Congress to build support gradually for specific legislation tailored to the programs of the giant and powerful business associations.

This year, on the heels of conservative election victories in 1966, trial balloons were launched in Congress for a spate of anti-union proposals. Any one of these would be damaging to the trade union movement. Taken together, they are dynamite. Here are just some of the bills that have been proposed:

- H.R. 333, introduced by Rep. Dave Martin (R-Neb.)—This would destroy industry-wide bargaining by clamping anti-trust laws on unions. It would revive the discredited "conspiracy" theory that dogged unions a century ago. It would leave local unions completely at the mercy of industrial giants.
- S. 1353, introduced by Sen. Robert Griffin (R-Mich.), co-sponsored by a cluster of conservative GOP senators and one Democrat, Sen. Frank Lausche (Ohio)—This would abolish the National Labor Relations Board and replace it with a so-called "Labor Court" comprised of 15 judges serving 20-year terms. Nominations for the "Labor Court" would be passed on by the Senate Judiciary Committee, which now is, and for the foreseeable future will remain, under Dixiecrat-conservative GOP leadership.
- S. 1744, introduced by Sen. Strom Thurmond (R-S.C.)—This would outlaw multi-union bargaining by a group of unions with the same employer at the same time such as occurred with Westinghouse last year. Joint bargaining arose in the first place as a necessary union response to the growth of conglomerate industrial giants.
- S. 1880, introduced by Sen. John J. Williams (R-Del.)—This would undermine labor's political efforts by preventing national COPE or any international union from collecting voluntary contributions from union members to give financial aid to endorsed candidates. It was proposed as an amendment to the campaign financial reform bill and was defeated in the Senate in September. It will come up again if the climate changes as a result of 1968 elections.
- S. 22, introduced by Sen. Paul Fannin (R-Ariz.) and co-sponsored by four conservative Republicans and southern Democrat Sen. Sam Ervin (N.C.)—This would prohibit "card checks" and other informal methods of determining whether a union is the choice of a majority of employes in a bargaining unit.

WHERE DOES the joint anti-union drive of business interests and conservative legislators stand today?

In one sense, it is standing still. There is little prospect that the present 90th Congress—despite its more conservative nature than the 89th—will enact legislation to stifle trade unions.

Yet, in another sense the campaign is moving ahead. Conservatives in Congress and the Chamber and NAM are using time to build support. Congressmen are sounding out and softening up their constituents. The NAM and Chamber are beating the propaganda drums, rallying their own memberships behind the thrust for anti-labor legislation.

The congressional conservatives and the Chamber and NAM don't deceive themselves. They know their campaign will rise or fall on the basis of 1968 election results.

Dead at 55:

Woody Guthrie Put Union Story to Music

New York — Woodrow Wilson Guthrie — "call me Woody" — great folksinging composer of a thousand songs of labor and the downtrodden is dead at 55.

For the last few years he had been immobilized by a blood disease, unable to read, speak or use his hands.

From the hard-bitten days of the depression and the Dust Bowl, Woody Guthrie's rasping, nasal voice and talented fingers on a beat-up guitar gave meaning and feeling to the aspirations of the poor and outcast.

He carried their message from any platform available—box cars, saloons or Carnegie Hall, as he wandered the length and breadth of America.

He came out of the Dust Bowl of Oklahoma and as a youngster knew starvation and oppression and they were his enemies.

Woody early took up the cause of the working people and their fight for unions. He was horrified when he saw, first hand, the "beating and sluggings and the cheatings and the killings that workers go through when they said they were going to form them a working man's union."

He wrote such songs as "On the Picket Line," "Union Maid," "Sit Down," "Write Me Out My Union Card," "Hard Traveling" and hundreds more.

One verse in "Union Train" went:

There's a Union Train a comin'
Down that Union track—
Ain't no scabs ride this train
Or hold that Union back.

In the spirit of Joe Hill, he pleaded with workers to organize: "So write us out our union card. Organize, we'll all fight hard. Time to fight those hunger blues away."

Woody Guthrie

As he roamed about the country Woody Guthrie went to North Carolina in 1929, to Marion where courageous workers and their families held out against hunger and evictions for nine weeks in a strike.

They went back with great promises from management but when none were delivered they walked out again and six strikers were killed by the sheriff and his deputies. In his song of the Marion Massacre, Woody Guthrie put into words and music the anguish and suffering of these people and their fight merely to exist.

He captured the same deep emotions in Detroit during the sitdown strikes and in the coal mines of Kentucky and in the dust storms of his native Oklahoma and in the "grapes of wrath" of California.

"I ain't no writer," he once wrote. "I want that understood. I'm just a little one-cylinder guitar picker. But I don't get no kick out of these here songs that are imitation and made up by guys that's paid by the week to write 'em up. . . ."

He said that he wanted songs that "will echo that song of starvation till the world looks level—till the world is level—and there ain't no rich men, and there ain't no poor men, and every man on earth is at work and his family is living as human beings instead of like a nest of rats."

Probably his best known song was "This Land is Your Land" in which he sang of the wonders of the mountains and wheat fields and redwoods and Gulfstream waters of our land.

But the songs that apparently meant the most to him were about working people—or as the title of his book with Pete Seeger and Alan Lomax spelled it out—"Hard Hitting Songs for Hard-Hit People." (PAI)

Digest Attack 'Unfounded':

Study Shows Social Security Actuarially, Financially Sound

CHARGES IN an October Reader's Digest article that the social security system is in danger of going broke are "completely unfounded," the AFL-CIO's top social insurance expert declared.

Actually, the Social Security Trust Fund "right now" could finance a 7 percent increase in benefits without raising contributions, said AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Bert Seidman. He made the statements on the network radio interview, Labor News Conference, aired Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EDT, over the Mutual Broadcasting System.

The allegation that social security is in shaky condition is "an old chestnut that keeps coming up from time to time," Seidman said. But, he declared, "there isn't the slightest danger that people who pay into the fund will not be able to get benefits out of it."

He pointed out that House Ways & Means Committee Chairman Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.), "who probably knows as much about the social security system as any man in America," took issue with the Reader's Digest article, noting that the committee's recently-completed "exhaustive re-examination" of social security found the program "actuarially and financially sound."

SEIDMAN NOTED that there is little likelihood the Reader's Digest will give anyone an opportunity to answer the "unfounded charges" against social security made in the article.

The Reader's Digest has never permitted anyone to reply to an article that states only one side of an issue, he said, pointing out that the magazine doesn't even have a letters to the editor column.

Questioning Seidman were Cecil Holland of the Washington Evening Star and Frank Swoboda of United Press Intl.

Medicare Plan B Sign-Up Extended

The open enrollment period for Part B of medicare — the voluntary insurance covering doctor bills and other supplementary benefits —has been extended by law through Mar. 31.

The Secretary of Health, Education & Welfare now has until January to determine what increase if any will be required in the current $3-a-month premium. Persons over 65 will then have three months to decide whether to sign up if they are not already participating in the voluntary insurance program, or to drop out if they wish. The new rates will take effect next April.

The federal government matches the premium paid by individuals so that the cost to participants is considerably lower than any privately-purchased health insurance with the same benefits.

Philharmonic Weekly Pay Raised $40

New York — The New York Philharmonic and Local 802 of the Musicians have agreed on a three-year contract that will make orchestra members the highest paid symphonic group in the nation.

The new contract, announced by Local Pres. Max Arons, is retroactive to Sept. 21. It gives each member a salary increase of $40 a week, with another $20 a week in the third year, raising the basic minimum pay to $250 this year and next, and to $270 in 1969.

Among features of the agreement, ratified by a 90-to-7 vote, is a recording guarantee of $1,000 a member each year.

Paid vacations will increase from four weeks to five weeks this season and to six weeks for the next two years. Rates for extra rehearsals are increased from the present $7 an hour to $8 this year, $9 next season, and $10 in the final year of the contract.

The existing pension plan will now be under joint labor and management supervision, administered by two members of the orchestra and two representatives of management. In addition, the Philharmonic will contribute $175,000 a year for the next two years, over and above its normal payments to build up the pension fund.

Special abilities will be recognized and paid for, resulting in increases of up to $20 a week for certain players.

Merger of D.C. Locals Highlights AFM Drive

Two separate Washington, D.C., locals of the American Federation of Musicians became one in real show biz fashion. The once separated Negro and white Locals 161 and 710 merged at a meeting attended by such notables as Washington's new "mayor" and the current and former heads of their international union.

AFM Pres. Herman Kenin hailed the merger in the nation's capital and noted that five more voluntary mergers will come before the end of the year. At present there are 18 cities that still have separate locals, including large northern centers like Boston, Bridgeport, Conn., Buffalo, and Philadelphia.

"After Jan. 1, 1968," said Kenin, there will an "executive order" issued by the international to end any remaining separation.

The 2.5-year-old program to combine locals that were set up separately early in the history of the union has been headed by former AFM Pres. James C. Petrillo who now heads the union's Civil Rights Dept. Petrillo told a press conference that the progress made to date in merging some 20 once-separate locals was done by "persuasion that it's the right thing to do."

Kenin told the first membership meeting of the new Local 161-710 that the end to all separate musicians' locals "cannot come too soon for us."

"We do not want dual locals in the American Federation of Musicians," he declared. "This is a situation which we in the federation inherited. We want to be disinherited as quickly as it is humanly possible to do so."

Also present at the merger meeting was A. Philip Randolph, AFL-CIO vice president and president of the Sleeping Car Porters. Randolph congratulated the new local officers and called the mergers "trade union victories." It will strengthen the union, he noted.

Walter Washington, the District of Columbia's newly-appointed mayor, greeted the union officials warmly and related some of his experiences working in New York City's ghettoes last summer.

"Hundreds and thousands of kids looked up at Negro and white musicians and it made no difference to them what color they were. All they said was, 'I like it, because I dig it, because he plays good stuff.'" Washington referred to the Jazzmobile concerts that toured New York City sponsored in part by the Musicians. He asked the new local for its help in establishing a similar program in Washington. "We need to jazz this city up," he said, "I'm going to ask you for your assistance."

Officers of the new local will be Pres. Sam Jack Kaufman, Sec. J. Martin (Marty) Emerson, Administrative Vice Pres. Louis H. Aikens, former president of Local 710.

Key Senate Rollcalls On Poverty Program

On labor's scoreboard, the 42 senators who voted to add an emergency job program to the existing anti-poverty effort cast Right votes on Oct. 4. Wrong votes against the program were cast by 47 senators.

The bottom rollcall, on Oct. 5, shows the 50 senators who voted Right against cutting the anti-poverty spending ceiling the Senate Labor Committee had recommended. Wrong votes for the cut were cast by 36 senators.

Nelson Addresses AIW:

Step-Up Pressed In Consumer Fight

Cincinnati—Sen. Gaylord Nelson (D-Wis.) urged organized labor to press forward in its battle against businesses that operate in the "anti-consumer" field.

Nelson, addressing delegates to the Allied Industrial Workers convention here, leveled a heavy attack on sellers of credit and drug manufacturers, both of whom he charged with accumulating "unconscionable" profits while duping the public. At the opening sessions, the convention's 500 delegates, representing 100,000 AIW members, also heard reports on the state of the union from Pres. Carl W. Griepentrog and Sec.-Treas. Gilbert Jewell.

Both top AIW officers were re-elected without opposition, along with executive board member-at-large Frank Evans. Their terms run for four years.

In an attack on revolving credit plans, Nelson pointed out that buyers are paying much greater interest than they are aware of—as much as $270 on a $500 purchase over 36 months. He also cited other examples of exorbitant interest.

He directed his strongest fire at the drug industry, calling on labor to push the fight against this "monopoly." Nelson is a member of a Senate subcommittee currently probing drug pricing practices.

He declared that older people on small retirement incomes are being burdened in their declining years with "unconscionable" drug prices. At the same time, he noted, the industry spends $800 million a year to influence physicians in their prescription of drugs.

Nelson cited an example of one drug, under patent to a reputable company, which sells for $17.90 a hundred to pharmacists under its brand name and as low as 50 cents a hundred under its generic name.

The brand name company, Nelson reported, supplied the drug at $12 a thousand to New York on a bid basis, sold it in Rome for $21.30, Rio de Janeiro for $5.30 and Switzerland for $4.27. Thus, he pointed out, Americans were forced to pay more for the product of a U.S. manufacturer than consumers in other countries.

He told how buyers might pay as much as $50 for a drug under its brand name when they could purchase it for as little as $2 or $3 under its generic name.

Nelson attributed the disparity in drug prices to the lack of true competition in the industry and to doctors who readily accept manufacturers' pressures to prescribe by brand name.

He charged that drug manufacturers are now engaged in advertising campaigns to make "a dirty word of generic." They are being aided, he said, by editorials in magazines and newspapers that seem to be out to protect the industry's high profits.

Nelson urged the delegates and all union members to join the drive against high drug prices. "In this battle, the consumer will only get a fair deal once he exerts his power," he declared.

New NBC Pact Approved by NABET Unit

New York — Engineers at five television and radio stations owned by the National Broadcasting Co. voted 604-378 to ratify a three-year agreement containing terms that were improved after a previous turndown by the Broadcast Employes' unit.

The new pact provides wage increases of $42 a week for experienced technicians over a three-year term; a work-week reduction from the present 40 hours to 37.5 on Nov. 1, 1968; retroactivity to Mar. 31, and other gains. The current top rate is $218 for engineers.

Struck ABC

NABET members who had voted to reject an earlier NBC offer stayed on the job while other members struck Sept. 22 at American Broadcasting Co. locations in New York, Chicago, Los Angeles, San Francisco and Washington, D.C.

The union said ABC management traditionally follows the pattern set by NBC. Negotiations assisted by two members of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service were recessed for the NBC vote but are expected to resume shortly.

The union represents some 2,500 technicians and 500 newswriters, maintenance personnel and other non-technical employes of NBC and ABC in the five cities. Contracts on both networks were due to expire Mar. 31 but NABET extended them five months while it successfully thwarted an attempted raid by an affiliate of the expelled Teamsters.

Members of other broadcast unions have been honoring NABET picket lines during the ABC strike. The stations stayed on the air with the aid of management personnel and the use of reruns.

Bipartisan Pledges Bar 'Work' Law in Colorado

Vail, Col.—Leaders of both political parties bid for labor's support at a special convention of the Colorado State AFL-CIO. The Republican state chairman joined with Democratic spokesmen in opposing any new effort to make "right-to-work" an issue in Colorado.

GOP State Chairman Howard Propst said Colorado voters had spoken loudly and clearly in 1958, when they overwhelmingly rejected a union shop ban. Propst said his party considers the decision final.

Democratic members of the state legislature stressed that they not only oppose a "right-to-work" law but are also pledged to repeal of a 1943 state law requiring a 75 percent vote of workers in a bargaining unit before a union shop can be negotiated.

Both the Republican governor—John Love—and the Democratic lieutenant governor—Mark Hogan—found themselves in agreement on another issue. They urged support of a 1968 ballot proposal to place the two offices on a single ticket vote so that "political party responsibility may be maintained."

The special convention, held in the new union-built resort village of Vail, near Leadville, approved a number of structural changes recommended by the state federation.

Conventions Shifted

Biennial conventions were shifted to off-numbered years, with state COPE conventions to be held in even-numbered election years. Delegates voted unanimously to extend until the 1969 convention the terms of Pres. Herrick S. Roth, Executive Vice Pres. R. C. Anderson, Sec.-Treas. A. Toffoli and the 27 vice presidents.

A single per capita tax structure was adopted, with a 20-cent-per-member monthly rate replacing the former 15-cent regular per capita and separate "COPE nickel." The constitution was amended to require that at least one-fourth of the per capita income be allocated for "labor education and political education programs."

A proposal from the executive board for an additional 2-cent per capita payment next July and a further 3-cent increase a year later narrowly failed of adoption.

Delegates heard reports on two major national programs — from John Evans, former secretary-treasurer of the Arizona State AFL-CIO and now an assistant to Housing & Urban Development Sec. Robert C. Weaver and Robert Perrin of the Office of Economic Opportunity.

North Dakota AFL-CIO Votes Per Capita Hike

Grand Forks, N.D.—The North Dakota AFL-CIO cleared the way for an expanded activities program in the year ahead by raising the per capita fee to provide more income and by launching a drive for all-out affiliation by the full memberships of all city central bodies and local unions.

Delegates from 80 of the state's 100 AFL-CIO unions attended the 10th annual convention, which officers called the "most productive" since merger. They voted to increase the per capita payment from 20 cents per month to 30 cents to pay operating expenses and provide expanded services.

Pres. Wallace J. Dockter reported that since the last convention, the state body successfully sponsored the first union leadership training institute in cooperation with the State University of North Dakota, the first state-wide conference for central body officers and delegates, and the first printed newsletter, issued every month.

The convention agreed to continue these activities and to survey all unorganized business establishments as one step in a cooperative organizing campaign like those carried out recently in Iowa and other states.

In other actions, the delegates urged more involvement by members of central bodies in health care services, and directed the executive board to give further study to a proposed reorganization plan under which counties in the state would be reduced from 53 to eight.

Re-elected without opposition were Dockter, Sec.-Treas. Robert Donegan, and Vice Presidents Jayson L. Graba of the Laborers, Grand Forks; Isadore Wetzel of the Carpenters, Grand Forks, and Roy Shuler of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Jamestown, in the newly created fifth district.

Newly elected officers are Vice Presidents Douglas Cusick of the Plumbers, Fargo; Warren McNamar of the IBEW, Bismarck, and John Gefroh of the Bricklayers, Minot.

A portion of the program was devoted to a eulogy of W. W. Murray, state president from 1935 to 1963, who died recently at Fargo.

Theo Glenn Dies, Green's Secretary

Miss Theo Glenn, long-time personal secretary to the late Pres. William Green of the former AFL, died in a Washington area hospital after an illness of several months and was to be buried Oct. 17 in Coshocton, O. She was in her seventies.

Miss Glenn was Green's secretary in Indianapolis, Ind., when he was secretary-treasurer of the Mine Workers, and moved to Washington when he became AFL president in 1924. She went on leave after Green's death in 1952 and retired shortly afterward.

Miss Glenn was a graduate of Bliss Business College, Columbus, O., and in 1937 earned a law degree from Columbus School of Law, now a part of the Catholic University of America. She was a member of the Office & Professional Employes, Washington, D.C.

Survivors include two sisters—Mrs. Annabelle Glenn Lawyer of Washington, formerly on the staff of the American Federationist; and Mrs. C. D. St. Clair of Hartsdale, N.Y.

Textile Workers Urge Carpet Tariff Extension

Atlantic City, N. J. — Jobs of thousands of carpet weavers and spinners depend on a continued high tariff on imports of wilton and velvet carpets, the Textile Workers Union of America declared.

The TWUA Executive Council urged Pres. Johnson to extend tariffs on these products which otherwise would expire Oct. 11. The council said the higher duty, in effect since 1952, "saved the industry from extinction."

Under tariff law, the higher rate will be discontinued unless the President acts.

TWUA Wins Debate —And Election, Too

Carlisle, Pa.—Workers at a big carpet plant here listened to a debate between their employer and the Textile Workers Union of America, then voted for union representation, 419-304, in an election held three days later.

Three years ago the TWUA lost at the same plant—the C. H. Masland Carpet & Rug Co.—in a National Labor Relations Board vote. The changed result was due, the union believes, to the reasoned atmosphere on the debate and also the help of a newly organized TWUA union at the Magee Carpet Co. in Bloomsburg, Pa., area central bodies, and the AFL-CIO.

Impartial Chairman

Prof. Benjamin James of Dickinson College was chairman of the debate at Carlisle High School. The debaters were Pres. Frank E. Masland of the carpet firm and TWUA Regional Dir. Sol Stetin.

Stetin said Masland stuck to the issues and treated union representatives in gentlemanly fashion. Other employers, including J. P. Stevens & Co., Inc., could well do the same, he said. The Stevens firm has repeatedly been found guilty of violating employe rights to organize a union, but so far has managed to delay enforcement of board orders pending court appeals.

TWUA launched its new organizing campaign about eight months ago. During the drive, Magee Carpet workers drove 60 miles through the mountains to lend their encouragement. The victory was the third in the last 16 months in the area. The others were Magee and the Montgomery Mills in Montgomery, Pa.

Clerks Ratify White Front Settlement

Hollywood, Calif.—Members of five Retail Clerks' locals have ratified a new 5-year contract that ends a six-week strike of 2,000 workers against 13 White Front Stores, Inc., in Southern California.

The settlement, reached with the aid of federal mediators, was described by the union as comparable to pacts negotiated previously with other major discount store operators in California.

The contract includes wage increases amounting to 62.5 cents per hour over the five years, with 22.5 cents in the first year; a cost of living clause; and improvements in sick leave, health and welfare, holiday, vacation and pension benefits.

White Front employes struck the company after a one-month extension of their previous contract and all negotiating efforts failed to bring an agreement.

Involved in the strike and covered by the settlement are members of RCIA Local 324, Buena Park; Local 770, Los Angeles; Local 905, Harbor City; Local 1167, San Bernadino and Riverside; and Local 1428, Pomona, Calif.

cent. Newspapers and magazines would also have to pay substantially more postage.

The House approved a motion by Florida Republican Edward J. Gurney to deny any salary increases to employes of the Office of Economic Opportunity, the key anti-poverty agency. Gurney charged that OEO employes were overpaid and that the agency had a higher ratio of top-paid officials than other departments.

Pres. John F. Griner of the American Federation of Government Employes denounced the OEO exclusion as "outrageous and disgraceful" and pledged a fight in the Senate to reverse the action.

OEO Dir. Sargent Shriver commented angrily: "The poor have always gotten the dirty end of the stick. . . . Now, even those working hardest to help the poor have gotten the same treatment."

Higher Price Tag

The pay bill—particularly as it affects postal workers—carried a higher price tag than Pres. Johnson had recommended. The Administration had asked a 4.5 percent raise for both postal and classified employes, with a two-step comparability catch-up to close half the gap in October of 1968 and the balance one year later.

Postal employe unions pressed vigorously for a reclassification to a higher grade as well as a pay raise, declaring that postal clerks and letter carriers spend their entire careers in a single grade without the opportunity for promotion and reclassification available to classified employes.

The House Post Office committee narrowly rejected an upgrading proposal and compromised on a higher first-step raise for postal workers.

When the bill reached the House floor, two fringe benefit amendments urged by the AFGE were adopted. One provided travel pay for employes who now receive no pay when traveling on weekends or after hours. The other raised the maximum 15 percent premium pay for law enforcement personnel and other groups working uncontrolled overtime to 20 percent.

The legislation also would set up a new system of setting pay for members of Congress, the judiciary and top government executives. A non-partisan commission would propose pay adjustments every four years, which the President would transmit to Congress, starting in 1970. The new rates would automatically take effect after 30 days unless rejected during that time by either the House or Senate.

The powerful House economy bloc suffered a rare defeat on the motion to limit the pay bill to the first-year increases. The motion was made by Rep. H. R. Gross (R-Iowa) and strongly supported by both House Republican Leader Gerald R. Ford (Mich.) and Rep. Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.), influential chairman of the Ways & Means Committee.

Rep. Morris K. Udall (D-Ariz.), floor manager for the pay bill, countered the Ford-Mills coalition with a double-barreled argument.

Back in 1962, he stressed, Congress had written into law the principle that federal salaries should be comparable to private industry pay scales. To eliminate the comparability catch-up, he charged, would be "to welsh and renege on promises we've made over the last five years."

And besides, he warned the economy bloc, next year will be an election year and the likelihood is that Congress would vote for an even higher increase for government workers.

Voting to limit the pay raises to the first-year step were 135 Republicans and 64 Democrats. Voting to keep the entire increase in the bill were 166 Democrats and 45 Republicans.

Huge Influx of Women Jobseekers Boosts Unemployment Rate to 4.1%

In contrast, the report continued, the jobless rates for all adult men and married men, 2.3 and 1.8 percent, respectively, remained near their record lows. The teenage rate, at 13.8 percent, was virtually unchanged.

It also was reported that the jobless rate for Negro men dropped to 3.5 percent, "the lowest rate since the series began in 1954 and below the rate for all workers for the first time."

Queried on this, Ross said it reflects the impact of special government programs like retraining, as well as general economic and fiscal policies.

The 3.5 percent jobless rate for Negro men 20 years of age and older was down from 4.3 percent in September a year ago. The rate for this group in the third quarter of 1967 was 3.9 percent, the lowest for any quarter, Ross stressed, adding that the rate for the year probably will be a 13-year low as well.

The overall jobless rate for Negroes, which had declined to 7.2 percent in July and 6.9 percent in August, swung back up to 7.9 percent in September—more than double the 3.6 percent jobless rate for whites. The jump in the Negro rate was attributed primarily to a substantial rise in unemployment among the Negro women.

Total unemployment stood at 2.9 million in September, up 200,000 from August. The Labor Dept. report said unemployment failed to show its usual seasonal drop due to the 250,000 rise in jobless adult women.

On the employment side of the picture, the Labor Dept. reported that non-farm payroll employment rose by 275,000 in September despite strike-caused layoffs.

About 235,000 more people were on strike in September than in August due to the Ford walkout (about 160,000) and Detroit and New York City teacher strikes during the survey week.

Strikers are counted as having jobs in the Census Bureau's survey of households, but they are not counted in the active payroll statistics reported by employers to the Labor Dept. For this reason, the Labor Dept. explained, seasonally adjusted payroll employment fell by about 100,000.

Ross said there were about 10,000 secondary layoffs among parts suppliers due to the auto strike.

The nation's total employment dropped by 93,000, seasonally adjusted, to 74.6 million because of a sharp drop of 300,000 in agricultural employment, the report said.

Ross summed up the job picture as one of "moderate expansion in employment since about May after a slow period in the first half of the year."

Putting the job figures in the context of such other economic indicators as industrial production, retail sales and a decline in initial jobless pay claims, Ross concluded that "we are in the midst of a moderate but sustained expansion."

The Labor Dept. report also showed the average hourly earnings of rank-and-file workers on private non-farm payrolls at $2.70 in September. This was up by 10 cents or 3.8 percent from a year ago. The workweek averaged 38.3 hours, down by 0.5 hour or 30 minutes from September 1966.

Average weekly hours of factory production workers were unchanged from August at 40.7 hours, seasonally adjusted. This was down 0.7 hour over the year.

Injunction Upheld to Bar Anti-Union Ordinances

Richmond, Va.—A federal appellate court has ruled that a union organizer doesn't have to get himself arrested in order to challenge "patently unconstitutional" city ordinances designed to hamper union activity.

The Steelworkers had asked a U.S. District Court to forbid the City of Statesville, N.C., from enforcing local laws requiring a special license to solicit union membership and special permission from both the chief of police and the city council to pass out union handbills.

The injunction request was refused by the district court, on the ground that there would be no "irreparable" damage if the injunction were not issued because union organizers could test the constitutionality of the ordinances if and when they were arrested for violating them.

A unanimous three-judge panel of the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals directed the district judge to grant the injunction sought by the union. It said the union's organizers are entitled to protection "against the enforcement of these unconstitutional ordinances."

The appellate judges added that a 1965 U.S. Supreme Court decision makes it clear that the threat of enforcement of a clearly unconstitutional law is grounds for injunctive relief.

The licensing ordinance requires each union organizer to obtain a license in order to solicit members. Applicants for a license must present character testimonials from two residents of the county and certify that they have never been a member of "any organization of communistic nature." Each day of noncompliance is treated as a separate offense, subject to 30 days in prison or a $50 fine.

Whether or not the ordinance is enforced, the appellate court said, "the threat of enforcement is strongly calculated to have a restraining effect."

It does not matter, the court held, that the Steelworker organizer did not apply for a license. "He was not required to comply with the ordinance in order to attack its unconstitutionality."

The opinion made it clear that "distribution of union literature and solicitation of members for the union . . . is within the First Amendment's protection of freedom of speech and of association. The 14th Amendment restrains the city of Statesville from enforcing ordinances which prevent or substantially restrict exercise of those rights."

Laundry Sued In Firing Over Wage Violation

Miami—The Labor Dept. filed suit here to compel Loucas A. Loucas, doing business as Shorecrest Cleaners & Laundry, to reinstate and give back pay to an employe unlawfully fired after receiving back wages of $143.55 in minimum wage underpayments.

The suit was the first since laundry employes were covered by the federal wage-hour law last Feb. 1. Filed in U.S. District Court, it asks the court to restrain Loucas from violating the discriminatory discharge provisions of the law.

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz said the employe was fired as the result of a wage-hour investigation conducted by the Labor Dept. under the new amendments. He asked that Loucas be ordered to rehire the employe under wage rates and conditions as favorable as those existing before his discharge.

House GOP-Led Coalition Hacks Key Program Funds

First Pact Negotiated In Copper

Tucson, Ariz.—A joint union bargaining committee won a 75-cent package of increased benefits from a copper firm here in the first contract settlement since a strike of 42,000 workers started July 15 against eight other nonferrous companies.

Five unions signed a memorandum of agreement with the Pima Mining Co. covering 650 workers. The pact, achieved without a strike, is subject to membership ratification.

The three-year wage-pension package offer will put Pima employes "well ahead of existing wages and fringe benefits in the industry," the unions said in a strike bulletin. They added that it "far exceeds anything offered to unions by the larger and much more prosperous companies" which have resisted all settlement efforts by mediators and the governors of Far West copper-producing states.

USWA heads a 20-union coalition which since March has been seeking to bring the contracts of the Big Four copper companies, and four smaller firms, closer to modern levels. No major company has "shown any real willingness to move off its original unrealistic offer," the unions said as the strike entered its fourth month.

No real bargaining took place, the unions reported, at recent meetings with four of the eight struck

Budget Cut Fight Shifts To Senate

By John M. Barry

House Republicans and Southern Democrats won a new battle to force drastic slashes in the federal budget as the House voted to order Pres. Johnson to cut nonmilitary expenditures to last year's level.

The directive, proposed by Rep. Jamie L. Whitten (D-Miss.), would compel agency-by-agency cutbacks of $7 billion to $10 billion from the amounts budgeted for such Great Society programs as Model Cities, rent supplements, the Teacher Corps and school aid.

To nail down the cuts, Republicans succeeded in attaching an amendment by Rep. Frank T. Bow (R-O.) setting an overall spending ceiling of $131.5 billion as against the latest Administration estimate of $144.2 billion.

Included in the measure are specific limitations of $1.2 billion for the war on poverty and $2 billion for foreign aid.

The 238-to-164 vote on the Whitten-Bow proposal found 171 Republicans and 67 Democrats voting for the budget slash, with 155 Democrats and 9 Republicans voting against it.

AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller called the House action "a demonstration of absolute irresponsibility."

"The members of the conservative coalition think they have gained a partisan advantage," Biemiller said. "They are completely wrong. The American people want their representatives to demonstrate lead-

Progress On Fringes:

Auto Talks Narrow Issues in Dispute

By Eugene A. Kelly

Detroit—The Auto Workers have moved closer to settlement with the Ford Motor Co. on non-economic issues like pensions, insurance and income security. But no "meaningful" progress has been made on wages, cost of living provisions and other major economic issues.

That was the report of union negotiators to 59 UAW local unions representing 160,000 Ford strikers in 25 states. It was sent after a week of almost continuous negotiations on contract terms the union wants to end the walkout launched Sept. 6 at all Ford plants in the United States and Canada.

As the AFL-CIO News went to press, talks were continuing after a brief recess in long sessions ranging up to 13 hours in length. During the break, UAW leaders wired Ford locals "to clarify speculative stories":

"Some meaningful progress has been made in areas of pensions, insurance and income security during periods of layoff, and technical details on these matters are being worked on by various subcommittees.

"No meaningful progress has been made on wages, cost of living provisions and other important economic matters."

In recent days, the message said, most of the bargaining effort has been devoted to major non-economic issues including working conditions, production standards, relief time, lines of demarcation among skilled workers, outside contracting and similar contract areas.

"Your negotiating committee will continue to press forward on these and other matters," the message advised, "to secure that measure of

House Passes Independent Maritime Bill

A labor-backed bill to transform the Maritime Administration into an independent federal agency as a means of bolstering the sagging U.S. merchant fleet passed the House with strong bipartisan support. The vote was 324 to 44.

The measure, which now goes to the Senate, is a prime legislative objective of the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept. The principle of an independent agency was supported by the 1965 AFL-CIO convention and has since been reaffirmed by the federation executive council.

Last year, the Administration sought to have the Maritime Administration, now under the Commerce Dept., made part of the new Transportation Dept. The move was opposed by labor and the House excluded it from legislation setting up the department.

Although the Senate later approved a Transportation Dept. bill including the Maritime Administration, a Senate-House conference committee took it out of the legislation as it was ultimately approved by Congress.

The House-passed bill, earlier voted out of the Merchant Marine Committee, 34 to 2, is titled the Federal Maritime Act of 1967.

It would create the new agency with a federal administrator at its head. He would be appointed by the President for a term of four years, with the appointment subject to Senate approval.

The bill would establish within the agency a maritime board, which

'Sweetheart Union' Bows To NLRB Agreement

Los Angeles—A paper "union" signed a National Labor Relations Board stipulation that it will go out of business forever, and a non-union employers' unit agreed to end its recognition—and its domination—of the counterfeit union.

The NLRB said Coye Jensen of the Brotherhood of Independent Workers signed a stipulation agreeing to disestablish the so-called union.

Interstate Employers, Inc., agreed at the same time to cease dominating and interfering with the BIW or any other union of its employes; to cease recognizing the BIW as a bargaining representative, and to stop enforcing the BIW agreement.

The Los Angeles Building & Construction Trades Council, AFL-CIO, filed unfair labor practice charges a year ago, asserting that the brotherhood emerged from the ashes of Mine Workers' District 50 to attempt to organize the construction industry in Southern California.

The attempt seriously jeopardized the wages and working conditions of building tradesmen, the council said, because BIW entered into a "sweetheart" agreement with Interstate.

The contract appeared to be a legitimate labor agreement but in reality never was enforced. It was maintained only to guarantee that Interstate employers could operate under non-union conditions and so thwart the organizing attempts of

New Budget Proposal Short of Reform Goal

A new approach to figuring the federal budget proposed by a special presidential commission would help in measuring the budget's impact on the economy but falls short of needed reform.

That's the view of AFL-CIO Research Director Nathaniel Goldfinger to recommendations to replace three different sets of figures now used in presenting the federal budget with a single estimate involving new definitions.

Goldfinger noted that the recommendations in general "represent a step forward toward making the federal budget a meaningful document for economic analysis." He added:

"However, these recommendations fail to provide a business-like, separate accounting of federal investments, except for government-guaranteed and insured loans.

"The AFL-CIO has long held the view that we need a capital budget, with clearly separate accounting of government investments—including public buildings, parks, hospitals and other facilities as well as the extension and repayment of loans."

The commission's report strongly recommended against a capital budget which would provide separate financing of capital or investment expenditures. But it said there was "considerable merit" in the continued publication and improvement of tabulations of capital items as part of the budget document.

Presently the budget sent to Congress by the President is presented from three different approaches—the administrative budget, the cash budget and the national income accounts budget. They exclude or include various trust funds, receipts and expenditures, loans and other transactions.

Using somewhat different accounting techniques, the commission recommended a single budget presentation that would be more complete and make it easier to evaluate the impact of government activities on the economy and make it easier for Congress to evaluate the consequences of its votes on government programs.

Long Campaign Brings IUE Victory

Springfield, Mass.—Several years of organizing effort by employes of Ren Electronics produced a National Labor Relations Board election victory for the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, 159-107, with 35 votes challenged. It was the third election at the plant in nearby South Hadley since 1965.

The first election was set aside by the NLRB because of unlawful interference. IUE lost the second vote by a narrower margin, but union supporters in the plant continued building the union with the assistance of IUE and AFL-CIO staff members.

The plant was listed as among the first objectives in the Hamden County cooperative campaign launched by AFL-CIO unions several years ago.

NLRB Revises Requirement To Admit Guilt

The National Labor Relations Board has agreed to tone down the language of a previous order requiring an employer to admit he violated the law when he conducted a private poll of employes to see if they favored a union.

The original order, issued last June 18, directed Harry F. Berggren & Sons, Inc., of Scottsbluff, Neb., to post a notice to employes of his street paving firm saying "we violated the law when we had you vote on the union"—Laborers Local 880.

The notice, which the employer protested, had other sections saying "we will not do this again" and "we will not fire anyone over the union again." The new notice substitutes this language:

"We will not hold unlawful elections to see if you want a union.

"We will not fire you because you join a union or favor a union."

The original language was written to eliminate all legalistic terms and make the meaning clearer. Since then, the 2d U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals told the NLRB to modify an order affecting J. P. Stevens & Co., Inc., giant textile firm found guilty in four union-smashing drives.

The appeals judges said of an order requiring company officials to read a board notice to assembled employes of 43 Stevens plants in North and South Carolina: the order "has an element not of obeisance, as the company claims, but of some humiliation."

It ordered Stevens to stop breaking the law but permitted the notice-reading by NLRB officials, if management would be too embarrassed, at 20 plants where the NLRB found unfair company practices instead of all 43 Carolina plants.

New Frontiers in Culture:

Labor, Industry Encourage Merger of Art, Technology

New York—A program to team artists and engineers on specific cultural projects related to the world's advancing technology was announced here with the joint support of labor and management.

Allied in the program are the American Foundation on Automation & Employment, Inc., and Experiments in Arts & Technology, Inc. Both groups are non-profit organizations broadly representative of industry and labor.

The foundation, whose co-chairmen are Pres. P. L. Siemiller of the Machinists and Vice Pres. Frank Gallucci of Essex Wire Corp., was set up in 1962 with the goal of encouraging the use of automation while seeking solutions to the employment problems it creates.

EAT, headed by Dr. William Kluver, an electronics engineer specializing in laser research at the Bell Laboratories, was recently established "to catalyze the interaction of industry, technology and the arts" by encouraging and helping artists and scientists to collaborate on specific projects. It has already received more than 300 applications for such aid.

Pres. Herman Kenin of the Council of AFL-CIO Unions for Scientific, Professional & Cultural Employes is a member of the EAT executive board, as is New York Arbitrator Theodore W. Kheel, president of the foundation. Pres. Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., of the New York City AFL-CIO is on the EAT advisory committee.

Alliance Announced

Kheel and Dr. Kluver, announcing the alliance of the two groups at a press conference here, said both organizations have similar objectives in that they "seek to enhance the contribution the new technology can make in providing individuals in our society today with new opportunities for self-fulfillment."

The foundation, they noted, addresses itself primarily to the business or industrial worker, whereas EAT is concerned about "the separation of the artist and the engineer when both have much to contribute to each other."

Kenin, who is president of the Musicians and an AFL-CIO vice president, said union members represented by the SPACE council are concerned "as practitioners in the arts and sciences . . . about the growing chasm between the disciplines . . . the growing impersonalization of their work" and "the frustrations they face in attempting to employ their knowledge and talents in making . . . a valid contribution to our civilization."

He stressed, too, the role of union members as consumers and audiences concerned with "the quality of the society to which they are asked to contribute their knowledge and talents."

EAT Vice Pres. Robert Rauschenberg, one of the nation's foremost artists who has made extensive use of machinery and electronics in sculptural assemblies, said he views the alliance of art with technology as "an exciting challenge."

"Nobody knows the kind of art that will be created if two or three men in diverse fields become collaborators," he observed.

Artists already have sought EAT's aid in solving problems involving synthetic fabrics, pigments, enamel finishes, translucent spheres, micro-organisms, electromagnetics, and "the range of sensory perception."

Works displayed at the press conference included a large drawing of a nude produced by a computer from information gathered from a photo transparency by a scanning device and stored on magnetic tape.

EAT will make its headquarters in the foundation's new building at 49 East 68th St., to be known as Automation House. An immediate objective is collaboration between the two groups to make Automation House a showcase for the merger of the arts and technology.

The announcement said Rauschenberg will head a team of artists working with the foundation's architect, Richard D. Kaplan, in designing the building as a center of communications employing the latest electronic equipment and building materials in functional art forms.

EAT Designed

Member engineers from EAT will help design the electronic and technical installations, which will be used by both EAT and the foundation-sponsored Institute of Collective Bargaining and Center for Job Training Information. Automation House also will be used to display art work produced by artist-engineer teams.

In addition, the foundation will aid EAT in fund-raising and administration. Kheel and Dr. Kluver said EAT will have an annual budget of $100,000 financed by annual dues from individuals, corporations and labor organizations. Specific projects involving artists and engineers will be underwritten by contributions from industry and foundations, the announcement said..

School Needs Stressed At Florida Convention

Hollywood, Fla.—Delegates to the Florida AFL-CIO convention here voiced strong concern over inadequacies in the state's public school system and appealed to the legislature for action to correct them.

The legislature will meet in a special session in November to deal with a school crisis. Thousands of teachers have submitted resignations to be effective if lawmakers do not provide more money for schools and teachers' salaries.

One resolution sent to each member of the state House and Senate called for legislation to provide additional funds for teachers salaries, new schools and expanded classrooms and improved transportation for students.

Another, calling for Florida unionists to join the fight for better schools, warned, "If we do not awaken to the needs of our educational system and make our demands for improvements known to our legislators and governor, the progress of this and future generations will be imperiled."

In another resolution, the convention urged Congress to enact pending appropriations for jobs, housing and education programs "so necessary to alleviate the impoverished conditions of millions of Americans."

In other actions, the 394 delegates supported legislation to give federal employes a pay increase, asked Congress to probe the "shocking" increase in hospital and medical care costs and called for new safeguards against wiretapping, eavesdropping and other invasions of privacy.

In reports from the federation's three executive officers, Pres. Charles Harris stressed the importance of labor's legislative programs, First Vice Pres. Art Hallgren emphasized political action and Sec.-Treas. William E. Allen gave a detailed financial report.

Their terms were not up for election this year but the delegates did elect a full slate of 12 district vice presidents and three vice presidents at large.

Disputes Plan Sanctions Lifted from Rail Firemen

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has removed sanctions imposed against the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen under Article XXI of the federation's constitution and has restored full rights to the union following its fulfillment of constitutional requirements relating to the removal of such sanctions.

The sanctions had been imposed effective last June 6 after a subcommittee of the AFL-CIO Executive Council found the union to be in non-compliance with the decision of an impartial umpire under the federation's internal disputes procedures.

The subcommittee's findings followed the refusal of the union to "withdraw its petition before the National Labor Relations Board as complained of by the United Steelworkers of America, involving the Kennecott Copper Corp., Utah Copper Division."

The NLRB election subsequently was held and was won by the Steelworkers. The Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen later appealed for removal of the sanctions and Steelworkers Pres. I. W. Abel assented.

Meany removed the sanctions following receipt from the union of the statement required under Section 16 of Article XXI that it intends to comply henceforth with the provisions of the article.

Unions still remaining in non-compliance and subject to sanctions are the Air Line Pilots Association, National Maritime Union, Brother of Railroad Signalmen of America, Journeymen Stonecutters of North America, Switchmen's Union of North America and the Intl. Typographical Union.

House Acts 324 to 44:

Independent Status Voted for Maritime

would be composed of the administrator and two additional members also appointed by the President.

The agency would have all the functions, powers and duties of the Sec. of Commerce and other offices in the department under the Merchant Marine Act of 1936 transferred to and vested in the administrator and the board.

In debate preceding House passage, many Democrats and Republicans alike pointed to deterioration in the nation's merchant marine and contended that its revival depends upon the concentration of an independent agency.

Strong Support

Rep. Edward A. Garmatz (D-Md.), floor manager of the bill, cited the fact that 104 members of the House had previously introduced bills to accomplish the purpose of the measure being considered.

"This is a clear indication of the strong sentiment in the House in favor of this legislation," he declared.

He recalled that following World War I the nation's merchant marine steadily deteriorated until 1936 when Congress "stepped into the breach" to pass the Merchant Marine Act which established an independent maritime commission.

The commission, he continued, built up the merchant marine over the next 14 years, only to be "downgraded" in 1950 when it was absorbed as a Commerce Dept. agency, a status it has remained in for the past 17 years.

Noting that the merchant marine "is currently suffering its lowest ebb in more than 30 years," Garmatz added:

"I submit it is not coincidence that the decline . . . developed and accelerated ever since the commission was robbed of its independence and submerged and emasculated by a larger agency—the Dept. of Commerce."

As for shifting maritime activities to the Transportation Dept., that would do no good since it would be merely transferring the same organizational structure "which has been so ineffective over the past 17 years," Garmatz added.

"What we need," he concluded, "is an independent agency with an administrator who thinks, talks and acts exclusively for the efficient administration of our maritime policy."

The House, by its vote, showed its overwhelming agreement.

firms—Kennecott Copper Corp., Anaconda Co., Phelps Dodge Corp. and Miami Copper Co. The others are the American Smelting & Refining Co., Magma Copper Co., Inspiration Consolidated Copper Co. and the U.S. Metals Co.

The companies made one wage offer, ranging in value from 30-35 cents an hour, before the walkout. Recently the unions offered to settle with Kennecott for 99 cents over three years.

New Gains Made

The Pima agreement includes successive increases of 12 cents an hour on Sept. 1, 1967, 1968 and 1969; a minimum rate for top-rated jobs of $2.98 an hour by Sept. 1, 1969; major pension plan improvements; an additional paid holiday—Dec. 24; improved medical coverage, and full company payment of all group life insurance costs.

Pension improvements called unique by the unions will provide a monthly benefit of $5 times years of service for both active and currently retired employes; full pensions after 30 years regardless of age; coverage for the widows of both active and retired employes; a monthly supplement of $130 for disabled employes; and improved coverage for those on early retirement, forced retirement or retirement before social security entitlement.

The Pima settlement involves members of the Steelworkers, Operating Engineers, Laborers, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and Teamsters.

Other unions with members in the copper industry are the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, Machinists, Auto Workers, Sheet Metal Workers, Iron Workers, Carpenters, Painters, Boilermakers, Bricklayers, Molders, Plumbers & Pipefitters, Blacksmiths, Railroad Trainmen, Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen, Railway Carmen and the Office & Professional Employes.

Intensive Auto Talks Narrow Issues Gap

equity and justice to which Ford workers are entitled. We shall make every effort to reach a sound and equitable agreement at the earliest possible date."

The wire went out after conflicting reports of progress were made by the two major news services—one that the two sides were close to agreement, the other that settlement appears "still not close."

The negotiating pace quickened after Ford strikers had walked picket lines for more than a month. Management asked for new talks two days after 2,400 delegates from all UAW local unions met here in special convention and voted a dues increase that will put $20 million more a month into the union strike fund for the duration of the contract crisis.

The union's strike fund stood at $51.6 million on Oct. 8 with Ford strike benefit payments reducing it by more than $4 million a week, rising to $5 million a week when insurance and health plan payments are added.

When the Ford strike is settled, the union will turn its attention to General Motors and Chrysler Corp., where 475,000 union members remain working without a contract. After that comes American Motors, where 25,000 members work under an extended pact.

Also on strike are 26,000 workers at Caterpillar Tractor Co. plants in five states. Out since Oct. 1, they were reported moving closer to settlement in contract talks at Peoria, Ill.

Delayed Offer

The Big 3 auto manufacturers waited until Aug. 29 to make their first contract offers to the UAW in separate talks that got under way July 10. They proposed new three-year agreements with benefits they estimated at nearly 4 percent a year, but union statisticians said the identical offers would give workers only 1 cent an hour or less in "new" money this year.

Locals representing all Big 3 workers voted overwhelmingly for strike sanction unless management's offer was improved. When the contract deadline arrived without any further offer, UAW members struck Ford but stayed on the job at Chrysler and GM plants until further notice.

Union objectives, outlined earlier by UAW Pres. Walter P. Reuther, include a substantial wage increase for every worker, improved job security, shorter work time, pension improvements including early retirement, wage parity for Canadian auto workers and skilled tradesmen, and replacement of the "degrading" hourly wage system with an annual income guarantee like that given office employes and company executives.

While the Ford strike continued, more than 60,000 union members enrolled in labor education classes reviewing issues lying at the heart of the strike, the state of the U.S. and Canadian economies, the need for vigorous political action, and other problems.

Strikers who attend class for two hours every week are given credits equivalent to those they could have earned by taking a turn on the picket line. Visual aids include a four-page brochure titled "You—and Your Share of Ford Progress;" charts, films and handbills.

More than 100 UAW staff members and volunteers are conducting classes under a program worked out by UAW Education Dir. Carroll Hutton and UAW Ford Dir. Ken Bannon.

AFL-CIO Brief Backs Job Rights of Strikers

The AFL-CIO has asked the U.S. Supreme Court to find that Fleetwood Trailer Co., Riverside, Calif., violated the National Labor Relations Act in ignoring reinstatement applications from employes who had been on strike.

The question, the AFL-CIO said in a "friend of the court" brief, is whether an employer violates the law "when he refuses to honor continuing applications for reinstatement as jobs open up and at the first available opportunity."

It pointed out that the Supreme Court in a case involving Mackay Radio & Telegraph Co., had previously decided that an employer violates the law when he refuses reinstatement to workers who apply for jobs that are available.

The same principle is involved in the Fleetwood case, federation attorneys declared.

In August, 1964, the Carpenters struck Fleetwood in a contract dispute. The strike lasted only two weeks. Some workers got their jobs back when it was ended. However, others submitted job applications that were passed over during a period in which the firm hired new employes.

Six strikers, who saw the trailer manufacturer hire new workers while their applications were pending, took their grievance to the National Labor Relations Board.

In 1965, the board found that Fleetwood had violated the Act. Although the six workers were later rehired by the firm, the NLRB said they must be reimbursed in pay and given seniority rights for the period in which they were passed over.

Fleetwood appealed the board's ruling and in 1966 the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals in California reversed the board in a 2-to-1 decision. The NLRB now has taken an appeal to the Supreme Court.

Compelling Reason

The AFL-CIO brief cited a "simple and compelling" reason to support a conclusion that an employer cannot prefer new job seekers to strikers applying for reinstatement, even where the strikers must wait for future openings:

"Congress specifically provided," it asserted, "that strikers do not lose their status as employes, unless they forfeit it." Another section of the labor law contains "a firm, clear guarantee against employer action to destroy that status."

In another aspect to the case, the board qualified its ruling against Fleetwood with an assumption there was no violation if the striker's job was considered permanently abolished or filled by a permanent replacement at the time the striker has made application for his reinstatement.

However, the AFL-CIO said "we believe this qualification is incorrect." It called upon the Supreme Court to decide that "an employer must honor a striker's continuing application for reinstatement" without regard to any permanency standard.

Company Ads Boast Of Union Contract

Ithaca, N.Y. — The Morse Chain, a division of Borg-Warner, got a fringe benefit of its own from its new two-year contract with Machinists Local 1607 here.

The contract gave IAM members annual raises of 5 to 6.5 percent, increased hospitalization and surgical insurance, longer vacations and other benefit improvements.

It gave management ammunition for its help-wanted ads in the Ithaca Journal, which now boast that new hires can "share in the increased benefits resulting from recent successful contract negotiations."

Mental Health Program Developed by ACWA

New York—Union business agents and psychiatrists have worked together to help more than 400 members of the Clothing Workers overcome mental health problems which affected their job performance.

The techniques they used were discussed at a Labor-Mental Health Conference, sponsored by the ACWA New York Joint Board and its Sidney Hillman Health Center. The 120 participants included officers and staff members of a number of unions and representatives of community health centers.

The ACWA's mental health program is co-sponsored by the New York Clothing Manufacturers Association and financed in large part by federal grants.

Union business agents told the conference of their experiences in finding and dealing with workers who could benefit from the project.

D. Robert Navarre, a psychiatrist who served as clinical director of the project, said a significant factor in the success of the program was the patient's "sense of belonging" and his knowledge that the union was interested in his welfare.

He said this trust in the union's desire to help him made the patient more willing to accept advice.

Dr. Hyman J. Weiner, project director, said the program "didn't try to cure the causes of the workers' problems, but simply to overcome the symptoms. Our goal was to find those clothing workers with personal mental health problems that interfered with their work, and help them overcome these problems to return to the job or get another job."

He reported that about half the workers treated responded successfully within four sessions, and the maximum time spent by any of the group was six months.

Dr. Weiner said the study also disproved the view that blue collar workers would not respond well to treatment. In a number of cases, he said, they responded more quickly than would be expected of white collar workers with similar problems.

Dr. Norris Brand, director of the Sidney Hillman Health Center and conference chairman, said the project developed as a follow-up to physical rehabilitation program the union had undertaken.

The approach to workers' mental health problems was demonstrated when two members of the project staff acted out a typical first interview session between a patient and a psychiatrist.

Rats, Hunger and the GOP

THE CALLOUS DISREGARD for human misery and suffering by the GOP-led coalition in the House has surfaced again in the rejection by the House Agriculture Committee of a bill calling for $75 million to be spent over two years for emergency food and medical services to prevent human suffering or death.

The measure had sped through the Senate on a voice vote over two months ago as a result of disclosures that in Mississippi and elsewhere children and adults were on the verge of starvation and unable to obtain badly needed medical care. The measure carried the imprint of the conservative senators from Mississippi—a state where conditions were most shocking.

But the House Agriculture Committee, by a 22 to 7 vote, tabled the bill and adopted instead a resolution calling for a study to determine the extent and location of serious hunger, with an interim report requested in six months. The Senate bill had called for a six-month study in addition to the $75 million.

The action by the GOP-led group in the committee—the seven opposing tabling were all Democrats—comes after the incredible action of the House in rejecting a rat control bill under the direction of the same coalition. The outcry was so intense and widespread that the House later reversed its action and voted the funds.

The Republicans apparently learned nothing from the rat control fiasco, although some of the more liberal GOP House members are now trying to revive the tabled hunger bill as an amendment to the poverty legislation.

But the damage has been done. Two months have elapsed since the Senate action and the hunger and health crisis is still present in Mississippi and elsewhere.

The Republican-led coalition has a second chance to face up to the need to act in modern, humane terms to the suffering of fellow Americans. Perhaps a rereading of the rat control controversy will help them remember that Americans are compassionate and will not tolerate hunger and malnutrition.

Using Our Wealth

THE SINGLE overriding fact about the nation's economy is that by the end of 1967 the total value of all goods and services produced will be at the $800 billion level and that this once undreamed of figure is the result of 80 months of almost consecutive economic growth.

According to the Commerce Department's latest report, the gross national product has increased $156 billion since 1964. Allowing for price increases, the real value of the GNP has increased about $100 billion—a tremendous sum reflecting the wealth and economic strength of the nation.

In face of this continuing, solid growth, the sheer hypocrisy of those who would cut back on anti-poverty programs, of those who would deny critically needed aid to the cities and the urban areas takes on a particularly hollow ring.

To a nation with an $800 billion economy the question is no longer "can we afford this" but how and where can we use our resources to continue our growth and bring justice and equity to all Americans.

'Iron-Willed Industrialists':

Union-Haters Hold Key Posts In Birch Society Leadership

TRADE UNIONS are prime opponents for the top policy makers of the John Birch Society, according to a survey just released by the Institute for American Democracy (IAD).

Industrialists with long records of fighting unions dominate the policy-setting Birch Council, the survey shows.

A militant and highly effective union foe is the No. 2 man in the Birch Society—William Grede, chairman of the Birch Society's executive committee, and a past president of the National Association of Manufacturers.

Last July 4, he told a cheering Birch audience in Boston that citizens "should cross the street to cross picket lines."

"The big Birchers' deeds speak even louder than their words," Charles R. Baker, IAD's executive director, asserts in the institute's newsletter, Homefront.

Grede, for example, twice took 6-month-long strikes, would not sign a contract with worker representatives in either plant. He has largely ignored four NLRB union victories and even a court order to bargain. He has managed to keep unions out of eight of his nine foundries. Workers in the ninth (Marshall, Mich.) foundry were represented by the UAW when he acquired it.

Fourteen of the 24 members of the Birch Council are presently operating companies under non-union conditions, the study shows.

"We did not find a single company dominated by a Birch Council member which has a normal collective bargaining relationship with AFL-CIO unions," Baker asserted.

Several big Birchers head companies which have been long-time targets for union organizing efforts. Baker concludes the Birch Council members "have been remarkably successful in keeping their own companies free of the union taint."

SCOFFING AT press caricatures of the Birch Society, Baker asserted both the 24-man JBS Council and 5-man executive committee "are dominated by iron-willed industrialists."

He said that despite all the propaganda the society produced characterizing itself as a "patriotic organization," policy makers direct the bulk of the Birch thrust against those who "interfere with their way of doing business."

"They are annoyed with government, and they constantly seek to discredit the democratic process," he notes. "Since trade unions generally provide effective opposition to the Birch stance on all these matters, the trade union movement is generally viewed as a hostile force," he adds.

The Birch Executive Committee is composed of Grede, a Milwaukee resident; Robert W. Stoddard, of Worcester, Mass., president of Wyman-Gordon; A. G. Heinsohn, Jr., president of Spindale Mills in North Carolina and Cherokee Textile Mills in Tennessee; Col. Laurence E. Bunker (ret.), former personal aide to the late Gen. Douglas MacArthur; and attorney Robert H. Montgomery.

Stoddard's Wyman-Gordon Co. (2,000 employes—machine tools) has repulsed several organizing efforts. Stoddard is also chairman of the board of the Worcester Telegram, which once rebuffed the American Newspaper Guild.

Heinsohn's textile mills likewise have turned back several organizing drives, and the Heinsohn interests contribute to many right-wing causes including the radio-TV "forum" of long-time labor foe, Dean Clarence Manion.

Robert Love (Love Box Co.) and Fred Koch (president of Rock Island Oil & Refining) gained prominence in far right circles with their work in getting Kansas voters to pass a right-to-work law. Workers at Love Box and Rock Island Oil still have no union representation. Recently, NLRB found Love Box guilty of unfair labor practices.

Another noted anti-labor member of the Birch Council is F. Gano Chance, president of the A. B. Chance Co. This company's domination of Centralia, Mo., has become a classic in sociological studies. It is the subject of a National Educational Television half-hour documentary called, "The Right Takes Over."

Other union-opposing employers on the Birch Council are John T. Brown, vice president of Milwaukee's Falk Corp. (2,600 employes, gear and shaft couplings); Tom Anderson, biggest U.S. publisher of agricultural and ranch magazines; Arizona banker Frank Cullen Brophy, who also heads Libbey Fruit Packing Co.; and N. Floyd McGowin, president of the W. T. Smith Lumber Co., in Chapman, Ala.

While helping the Far Right in this fashion, Allen-Bradley does have contractual relations with a union. The United Electrical Workers, expelled from the CIO in 1949 for Communist domination, represents A-B's 5,400 employes.

Rusk Answers Critics:

Lasting Peace, Security Termed Overriding Goal of U.S. in Asia

The following is excerpted from a news conference held by Secretary of State Dean Rusk on Oct. 13, 1967.

I FIND no significant body of American opinion which would have us withdraw from Viet Nam and abandon Southeast Asia to the fate which Asian communism has planned for it. Similarly, I find no serious opinion among us which wishes to transform this struggle into a general war.

We Americans are, therefore, debating variations on a theme—but the theme is a central position resting upon (a) the need to meet our commitments and defend our vital national interests; (b) the pursuit of our limited objectives by limited means, and (c) our earnest desire to bring this conflict to a peaceful conclusion as soon as possible.

Our commitment is clear and our national interest is real. The SEATO treaty, approved with only one dissenting vote by our Senate, declares that "each party recognizes that aggression by means of armed attack in the treaty area . . . would endanger its own peace and safety, and agrees that it will in that event act to meet the common danger." The treaty says "each party" will act.

The fidelity of the United States is not subject to the veto of some other signatory—and five signatories have engaged their forces alongside Korean and South Vietnamese troops. Indeed, the proportion of non-United States forces in South Viet Nam is greater than non-United States forces in Korea.

Our several alliances in the Pacific reflect our profound interest in peace in the Pacific, no less vital to us as a nation than is peace in our own hemisphere or in the NATO area.

I have heard the word "credibility" injected into our domestic debate. Let me say, as solemnly as I can, that those who would place in question the credibility of the pledged word of the United States under our mutual security treaties would subject this nation to mortal danger.

If any who would be our adversary should suppose that our treaties are a bluff, or will be abandoned if the going gets tough, the result could be catastrophe for all mankind.

It is not easy for our people to wage a struggle by limited means for limited objectives. We Americans are an impatient people—a quality which has helped to build a great nation. The present impatience about Viet Nam is thoroughly understandable—and is shared by those who carry official responsibility. But our overriding object is—and must be—the establishment of a reliable peace.

It is easy to rush into total catastrophe. It requires courage and determination to act with both firmness and restraint in the interest of peace. An examination of all the crises in which we have been involved since 1945 will show, I think, the supremacy of the objective of a reliable peace.

WITHIN THE NEXT decade or two, there will be a billion Chinese on the mainland, armed with nuclear weapons, with no certainty about what their attitude toward the rest of Asia will be.

Now the free nations of Asia will make up at least a billion people. They don't want China to overrun them on the basis of a doctrine of the world revolution.

The militancy of China has isolated China, even within the Communist world, but they have not drawn back from it. They have reaffirmed it, as recently as their reception of their great and good friend, Albania.

Now we believe that the free nations of Asia must brace themselves, get themselves set with secure, progressive, stable institutions of their own, with cooperation among the free nations of Asia —stretching from Korea and Japan right around to the subcontinent—if there is to be peace in Asia over the next 10 or 20 years.

We would hope that in China there would emerge a generation of leadership that would think seriously about what is called "peaceful coexistence," that would recognize the pragmatic necessity for human beings to live together in peace, rather than on a basis of continuing warfare.

Now these are vitally important matters to us, who are both a Pacific and an Atlantic power. After all, World War II hit us from the Pacific, and Asia is where two-thirds of the world's people live. So we have a tremendous stake in the ability of the free nations of Asia to live in peace; and to turn the interests of people in mainland China to the pragmatic requirements of their own people, and away from a doctrinaire and ideological adventurism abroad.

IF CHINA PUSHES OUT against those with whom we have alliances, then we have a problem, but so does China. If China pushes out against the Soviet Union, both China and the Soviet Union have a problem.

We are not picking out Peking as some sort of special enemy. Peking has nominated itself by proclaiming a militant doctrine of the world revolution, and doing something about it. This is not a theoretical debate; they are doing something about it.

Now we can live at peace—we have not had a war with the Soviet Union, in 50 years of coexistence, since their revolution. We are not ourselves embarked upon an ideological campaign to destroy anybody who calls themselves Communist. But we are interested in the kind of world structure sketched in Articles I and II of the United Nations Charter, in which all nations, large and small, have a right to live in peace.

And the aggressors nominate themselves—we don't choose them—the aggressors nominate themselves by what they say and do. And when they do, then those who are genuinely interested in peace have a problem on their hands, and sometimes we are tested, and we find out what kind of people we are.

Tighter Enforcement Asked:

Chavez Raps Border Service Laxity on Strikebreaker Ban

A TOP AFL-CIO farm official charged that the U.S. Immigration Service was not enforcing the law on the Mexican border.

"A ready supply of strikebreakers" daily crosses the border into Texas and California, Cesar Chavez, director of the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee, said on the network radio interview, Labor News Conference.

Despite a federal government ban on Mexican nationals working as strikebreakers, Chavez said the Immigration Service "has not done its job."

He recalled one instance when the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee asked for an investigation into suspected violations in the Bakersfield, Calif., area. "We were told, point-blank," that the Service wouldn't investigate because "they would incur the wrath of the growers," he asserted.

"This is the kind of attitude we are confronted with," Chavez said, calling for tighter enforcement of the law that applies to the 44,000 Mexican nationals who cross the border every day to work at farm, service and industrial jobs in the United States.

HE SAID he was "very encouraged by the response" to his recent testimony before a Senate subcommittee looking into the situation. Interest in and awareness of the problem are growing, he said, and that will be the key to solving it.

Chavez renewed labor's call for extension of the National Labor Relations Act to farm workers, pointing out that without coverage of the law, "you can go to a farm and sign up 100 percent of the workers" and still have to strike in order to get recognition of the union.

Reporters questioning Chavez on the AFL-CIO produced public affairs program, aired Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m. EDT on the Mutual Broadcasting System, were Neil Gilbride, Washington correspondent for the Associated Press, and Harry Conn, editor of Press Associates, Inc.

"HOLDER IN DUE COURSE," is one of those fancy legal phrases behind which a good many thousands of Americans have been financially ruined and a good many highly respectable banks have made a lot of money.

It is a phrase that has cropped up prominently in recent newspaper revelations of how poor people—mostly Negroes—have been victimized by unscrupulous builders or storekeepers who sell them their services at extortionate prices, sell the installment notes they sign to banks or other financial institutions and leave the victims holding the bag when the new roof leaks or the furniture collapses.

In a number of cases, the victims have signed second mortgages on their homes without knowing what they were doing and now find themselves threatened with the loss of their homes. In many of these cases, the victim finds that he no longer owes the money to the man or company with which he originally did business, but to a complete stranger—the "holder in due course"—who rejects any of the obligations assumed by the company which did the original business.

What happens repeatedly is this: A fly-by-night company sells a poor, frequently ignorant family on a deal to fix the roof. The price is jacked up as the deal goes along until suddenly the customer finds himself owing several thousands of dollars. He signs a note to pay the debt off in installments with exorbitant, but hidden interest rates. In some cases the "note" turns out to be a second mortgage.

The company then rushes off—frequently within a matter of hours—and discounts the note either with a bank or some other financial institution that specializes in such transactions. The "discount" is generally enormous—as high as 40 percent has been reported in some instances.

The sloppy roof job starts to leak and the customer complains but can get no satisfaction. He says "O.K., I won't pay any more on the job." But the end of the month comes and he gets a bill—not from the company with which he dealt, but from a third party—the "holder in due course," who rejects any responsibility for the repairs or anything else.

Yet, the note can be collected and the second mortgage can be foreclosed. Both things happen repeatedly.

THE WHOLE RUN-AROUND is perfectly legal under today's laws unless clear fraud on the part of the buyer of the note can be proved. The assumption is that the note was discounted or the second mortgage transferred in "good faith." For the poor victim, already burdened down with debt, proving fraud is extremely difficult. And he is doubly in a poor position when he finds that he owes the money to some bank or financial institution which may very well be in cahoots with the original exploiter to begin with.

Members of Congress are getting interested in the "despicable racket," as one of them put it. Among reform proposals are legislation that would outlaw deceptive sales practices; that would give homeowners time to think about the contract and pull out of it before it is too late; that would limit financing charges that are tacked on unexpectedly at the last minute; that would give home owners greater protection on mortgage foreclosures, and that would set up a "consumer protection office" to step in and help the victims of fraud.

One of the most important of the suggestions is elimination of the present legal protection given to "holders in due course."

In a recent New Jersey case a judge decided that the "holder in due course" made a business of buying up notes and mortgages from companies that had records of shady transactions. He took away the "holder in due course" protection.

What is clear is that courts are beginning to look behind what obviously has become a fiction in many cases—the "innocence" of the "holder in due course" and the role that he plays in the fleecing of more than equally innocent people. Congress might well do the same.

LAX LAW ENFORCEMENT by the U.S. Immigration Service permits "a ready supply of strikebreakers" to cross daily from Mexico into Texas and California, Dir. Cesar Chavez of the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee charged on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by Neil Gilbride (left), of the Associated Press and Harry Conn of Press Associates, Inc., on the public affairs program broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m. EDT over Mutual Radio.

In 75th Anniversary Year:

Transit Union Marks Major Wage Gains

New Orleans—"Exceptional" progress in the drive to establish a $4 an hour minimum rate for bus operators was reported by Pres. John M. Elliott to the Amalgamated Transit Union's 39th convention here.

Elliott told the more than 400 delegates that 45 local divisions of the union have established pay rates for bus operators in excess of $3 an hour.

Leading the drive, he noted, is ATU Div. 1179, New York City, at $3.80 an hour for Green Bus Line operators with another 5 cents due next Jan. 1 and a contract guarantee of a matching increase if the New York Transit Authority establishes an hourly rate of $4 or more before the expiration of the division's contract.

Elliott called these rates "tops for urban transit workers anyplace in the world." And, he reported, another target of the union — a $5-an-hour minimum rate for mechanics — has been exceeded by Div. 1181 for lead mechanics on Varsity Bus, Inc. in New York City.

The ATU president's report also cited progress under the Urban Mass Transportation Act of 1964. The Dept. of Housing & Urban Development, he noted, already has approved 163 projects, representing $335 million in grants. More than $100 million in additional grants are being held up, he said, until the communities and transit systems involved comply fully with the act by entering labor agreements protecting their employes.

Pres. Johnson, in a message to the delegates, congratulated the ATU on its 75th anniversary year and on its "constructive role in our national effort to develop the comprehensive mass-transit systems so essential to our rapidly expanding cities."

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler, principal speaker on the opening day of the convention, noted that urban mass transit is a critical element in revitalizing the nation's cities and urged ATU members to "make your opinions and expert knowledge in this area known."

Traffic and transit problems—problems of getting to and from the job—add hours to daily working time in metropolitan areas, Schnitzler pointed out.

AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller gave the delegates a detailed assessment of the issues facing Congress and declared that "this is, frankly, a very bad Congress." He cited the defeat of 41 liberal House members in the 1966 election and observed: "When you lose 41 good friends in one election, you are in trouble."

What is at stake in Congress now, Biemiller declared, is the concept that "the government of the United States shall be used to promote the welfare of the United States."

He took issue with contentions of the budget-cutters in the House that the government "is doing too much."

"We not only don't think the government is doing too much," he said, "we don't think it is doing enough.

The 'Screamers'

The very people in Congress who are "screaming the loudest" for budget cuts of $5 billion to $8 billion, he observed, "block out" about $115 billion of the $140 billion total they say is "untouchable."

"But the $25 billion which they want to touch," he said, "is the money for education, for welfare, for manpower training, for salaries of government officials—that kind of money, the money in which you and I have probably the greatest interest of all."

Biemiller urged the delegates: "For heaven's sake, get in touch with your congressmen and senators" to let them know how "the people back home" feel about these issues.

Earlier, the convention heard national COPE Dir. Al Barkan appeal for a vast educational effort at the local union level so that union members will not "get sidetracked" by "phony issues" before the 1968 election as they were in 1966.

Because of liberal losses in 1966, Barkan said, union rights are now under sharp attack by the National Association of Manufacturers and the Chamber of Commerce. He noted that bills have been introduced in Congress to abolish the National Labor Relations Board and establish a system of "labor courts," to outlaw industry-wide and multi-plant bargaining, to prohibit union political action, to pass a national "right-to-work" law.

"That is the goal," Barkan declared. "Weaken unions, weaken contracts, cut wages, destroy decent working conditions."

He urged the delegates to do "the educational job that must be done between now and next November, using every form of communication there is . . ."

Officers Elected

The convention re-elected Elliott, Executive Vice Pres. Edward W. Oliver and Sec.-Treas. O. J. Mischo and all but one executive board member and one vice president as Board Member John W. Connally of San Antonio, Tex., and Vice Pres. James McGinnity of Detroit announced their retirement.

Vice Pres. C. M. Shaw of Shreveport, La., was elected to the board, and three new vice presidents were named, George Link of New York City, Charles W. Hunter of Dallas, Tex., and Donald Hutchinson of Toledo, O.

Delaware AFL-CIO Sets Up Scholarships

Rehoboth Beach, Del.—An address by Sen. Gaylord Nelson (D-Wis.) and actions setting up a scholarship program and pressing for expansion of junior colleges in the state highlighted sessions of the Delaware AFL-CIO convention here.

The convention's 297 delegates—a record high attendance—adopted resolutions supporting the war on poverty, Pres. Johnson's Viet Nam policy, expanded apprenticeship training, strengthened community services by unions and improved workmen's compensation.

The convention, which meets annually, also elected members of the 27-member federation executive board and a new vice president, John A. Campanelli, to fill the unexpired term of Harold Janvier, who resigned in April.

The state AFL-CIO's three principal officers—president, secretary-treasurer and vice president—are elected every three years. Present terms expire in 1969. The other top officers are Pres. Clement J. Lemon and Sec.-Treas. Charles X. Ryan.

Nelson urged labor to continue and expand its "dedicated efforts" on behalf of the American consumer—particularly in the area of increasing safety, clarifying credit procedures and bringing down "unconscionable, unjustifiably high" drug prices.

A member of a Senate Monopoly subcommittee that is investigating drug prices, Nelson said that hearings to date show that the "American consumer pays a higher price for drugs than any other consumer in the world, even though most of these drugs come from the same U.S. manufacturers."

Another speaker, Pres. John A. Bivens of Delaware Technical & Community College in Georgetown—the state's first junior college, established early this year—praised Delaware labor as a "decisive force" in getting junior colleges established in the state.

Unions Led Drive

Unions pushed for a junior college program for more than 10 years and the legislature authorized it in 1965. Plans call for two more junior colleges, one in New Castle, the other in Kent. Gov. Charles L. Terry Jr. has appointed Lemon to the board of trustees of the college in Georgetown.

Terry, former Rep. Harris B. McDowell (D) and AFL-CIO Community Services Dir. Leo Perlis were among other speakers.

Delegates approved a new college scholarship program through which the federation will provide three annual $500 scholarships to sons and daughters of union members in the state, beginning next year.

Political Goals Stressed in Massachusetts

Boston — Vigorous political action to achieve labor's legislative goals at state and national levels was urged in speeches, reports and resolutions at the 10th convention of the Massachusetts AFL-CIO.

Officers of the state labor council, in their report to the convention, noted that the sharp loss of liberal strength had killed any chance in the 90th Congress of winning repeal of Section 14 (b) of the Taft-Hartley Act—the "right-to-work" proviso—and had blocked, curtailed or stalled many progressive bills.

A strong COPE resolution adopted by the delegates stressed the urgency of the COPE voluntary dollar drive and voter registration campaigns. It called for wide distribution among union members of the voting records of their congressmen and state representatives.

The convention adopted a legislative program for the coming year keyed principally to improvements in workmen's compensation and unemployment insurance laws. Its major planks include:

- Payment of sickness disability benefits to workers made jobless as a result of illness.
- Payment of unemployment benefits to workers made jobless as a result of a labor dispute.
- Elimination of many of the exemptions from the overtime payment requirements of the state labor standards law.
- A shorter waiting period and higher benefits under the workmen's compensation law and a variable maximum for unemployment insurance benefits based on two-thirds of the average industrial wage in the state.

ILO Begins Planning Golden Anniversary

Geneva, Switzerland—Dir. Gen. David A. Morse of the Intl. Labor Organization has named Kalmen Kaplansky as coordinator of ILO's 50th anniversary celebration in 1969. Kaplansky will continue to serve as director of ILO's Canadian office in Ottawa and as special adviser to Morse.

Ships' Doctors On Grace Line Vote for NMU

New York — Physicians aboard Grace Line vessels made medical history when they voted 6-3 in favor of representation by the National Maritime Union in an election conducted by Theodore Kheel, arbiter.

The doctors serve passengers and crewmen on Grace passenger and passenger-cargo ships sailing to foreign ports. They are said to be the first group of privately employed physicians to join a union.

NMU Vice Pres. James J. Martin said the doctors work under "deplorable" conditions and themselves initiated the first move toward union representation.

Contract proposals were drafted by the union in consultation with the doctors and negotiations are "proceeding smoothly," Martin said. The proposals cover wages, working conditions, pension and welfare coverage and professional status.

The NMU is sure, he said, that it will win contract terms that "assure the doctors of standards meeting their needs and befitting their professional status."

Stone Workers Adopt Organizing Program

Louisville, Ky.—The Stone Workers voted to step up the union's organizing pace by providing more funds for local and national drives and by encouraging more members to volunteer their services in local membership campaigns.

Approving the recommendations of Pres. Sam H. Scott and Sec.-Treas. John C. Lawson, delegates to the 12th triennial convention agreed in a rollcall vote to add $1 a month to the minimum dues to finance a more vigorous activities program. The margin in the convention's only rollcall was 5 to 1.

Effective next Jan. 1, the union's 130 locals were authorized to begin putting an additional 40 cents a month in the strike benefit fund, an additional 35 cents in the general fund and to keep another 25 cents for local union expenses.

Lawson reported that, while the union won nearly 55 percent of the National Labor Relations Board elections in which it was on the ballot—29 wins, 24 losses since July 1964—membership has gained only slightly since the last convention.

The officers noted that, while some employers have gone out of business because of increased competition from mechanized and automated plants, others are flourishing. The union granted new charters to 23 local unions, established eight directly-affiliated locals and revoked seven charters—four because of plant closings.

Successful organizing campaigns are now in progress, they said, in almost every union district—initiated by workers in potash, marble, brick, granite, sandstone, limestone and miscellaneous industries.

The union recently won bargaining rights at the Kermac Potash Co. in Hobbs, N. M., a new mining operation with some 275 employes. The US&APW was certified after waiting from April to August for the NLRB to rule on challenges—an experience that Lawson called "long, costly and frustrating."

Convention speakers stressed the need for more effective political education activity. They included AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler, COPE Dir. Alexander Barkan, Administrative Dir. Jacob Clayman of the Industrial Union Dept. and Assistant Labor Sec. Thomas R. Donahue.

The delegates defeated two proposals to lengthen the terms in office of executive board members and top officers. Elections are scheduled for 1968 by referendum.

Mutual Aid Stressed At 19-Nation Meeting

rules and standardizing wages and working conditions.

In a colorful opening ceremony, the flags of all participating nations were posted in the conference meeting hall at the Del Prado Hotel. A backdrop proclaimed the conference theme, "Unity in Action." Proceedings were carried in both Spanish and English.

Delegations from five AFL-CIO unions — Machinists, Railway & Airline Clerks, Transport Workers, Air Line Pilots and Flight Engineers — attended the conference and many of them had key roles in its deliberations.

Speakers at opening sessions included Pres. C. L. Dennis of the Railway & Airline Clerks, Pres. Roy Siemiller of IAM, and Vice Pres. James F. Horst of the Transport Workers, who directs the union's airline division.

Pres. William A. Gill, Jr. of the Flight Engineers and Kay McMurray, executive vice president of the ALPA, headed their unions' respective delegations.

Uniform Wages

Dennis, selected to give the opening address for the English-speaking unions, stressed that international airlines are obligated to pay similar wages and maintain similar working conditions all along their systems.

Employes of these airlines in all countries "should reap the benefit of present enormous profits" just as stockholders get their dividends regardless of where they live, he declared.

Dennis urged the conference to adopt plans through which airlines unions in North, Central and South America can work together to eliminate "widespread discriminations" toward their workers in some countries.

He cited examples of employers refusing workers in one nation the same wages and benefits enjoyed by those in another. He accused large U.S. carriers—such as Braniff and Pan American—of "applying all sorts of subterfuge to prevent their employes in Latin America from organizing."

Siemiller traced the long efforts of labor to organize and achieve effective collective bargaining on U.S. airlines. He said these efforts have been frustrated in recent years by the threat of government intervention and compulsory arbitration.

He said the conference was "particularly timely" because the "tentacles of big corporations," including airlines, are more and more reaching across national boundaries, affecting the welfare of workers in all corners of the world.

Just as the airlines stretch out across these boundaries "in search of greater profits," he added, so must air transport unions combine their forces across the same boundaries "in search of greater human welfare."

Horst asked the conference to focus on job security, among other issues, since the carriers are moving into the era of the "supersonics" and "jumbo jets"—a period that may see them reduce work forces and pool maintenance forces.

Upgrading Asked

He also called upon unions to join in bringing pressures on airlines managements "to upgrade the skills of workers they are now keeping in an unskilled class and prevent the subcontracting of work to non-union companies."

Gen. Sec. Hans Imhof of the ITF opened the conference. Luis Gomez Z, a member of the ITF executive council and general secretary of the Mexican Railway Workers' Union, welcomed the delegates to Mexico.

Pres. Gustavo Diaz Ordaz of Mexico sent his regrets at not being able to accept an invitation to speak. In his place, Eugenio Mendez Docurro, under secretary of Communication & Transportation, addressed the conference.

Gill was elected conference vice president for North America. Other officers chosen were Alfonso Pena, Mexico, president; Elton Peters, Trinidad, vice president for the Central American and Caribbean areas, and Rodolfo Beotegue, Argentina, vice president for Latin America.

CHAMPION BARBER of the U.S.A.—That's the title won by Joseph Calia, St. Louis, Mo., in competition against other state champions in Cincinnati. He now goes to the world contest in Vienna, Austria. Congratulating Calia are Barbers Pres. Joseph N. DePaola (right) and Sec.-Treas. E. M. Sanders.

AIW Convention Urges Massive Aid for Cities

Cincinnati—Delegates to the Allied Industrial Workers convention called for "a Marshall Plan for all American cities . . . aimed at the early elimination of slums" and urged Congress "to adopt measures now, without further delay," to guarantee equal opportunity to every citizen.

AIW Pres. Carl W. Griepentrog set the tone for the largest convention in the union's 32-year history in a keynote address stressing "three great challenges" facing the labor movement: the "concentration of economic power" through corporate merger; "massive employer violation" of federal labor law, and elimination of slums and poverty

On the last point, Griepentrog urged the delegates to "join this cause. Let the record show that this convention and this union dedicated itself to the labor movement's highest calling—the good and welfare of all mankind."

The 460 delegates followed through by adopting a series of resolutions calling for social legislation and directing the international union to trigger a grass-roots letter-writing campaign to members of Congress urging enactment of laws which would:

- Establish the federal government "as the employer of last resort, thereby assuring everyone willing and able to work that a job will be available."
- Bring about a fair housing law as proposed by Pres. Johnson.
- Upgrade the provisions of the House-passed social security bill as urged by the AFL-CIO.
- Raise the federal income tax personal exemption for dependents from $600 to $1,000.

On internal issues, the convention voted cost-of-living salary increases for elected officers, bringing the pay of Griepentrog and Sec.-Treas. Gilbert Jewell to $23,000 and salaries of other executive board members to $16,870. The constitution was amended to establish a cost-of-living escalator clause for future salary adjustments.

Change Rejected

Delegates rejected a resolution calling for separate contract ratification by skilled trades and production workers who are in the same bargaining unit.

The convention approved a resolution drafted by the AIW executive board calling for continuation of the AIW's participation in coordinated bargaining activities and "exchange of bargaining information" with other unions.

Locals were urged to incorporate equal opportunity clauses in all contracts and to combat wage discrimination against women.

After hearing AFL-CIO COPE Dir. Al Barkan, delegates approved a major expansion of the union's own COPE operation, including establishment of a newsletter directed at local COPE leadership.

ICFTU Board Elects Buiter New Secretary

Brussels—The Executive Board of the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions elected Harm Buiter general secretary to succeed Omer Becu who retired because of poor health. Buiter has served as general secretary of the European trade secretariat which embraces the national trade union federation affiliated to the ICFTU in the six countries of the European Economic Community Common Market.

The board adopted a resolution on the Middle East, declaring that "a peaceful solution of the conflict in the Middle East cannot be found without the governments directly concerned" and appealed "to the United Nations, to third governments and to international organizations to support and encourage all peaceful initiatives designed to arriving at bilateral negotiations between the Arab States and the State of Israel."

For the first time since the six day Arab-Israeli war of last June, the ICFTU pinpointed the specific role of the Soviet Union in this protracted crisis of the poverty-ridden Middle East by stressing that: "This economic backwardness and misery of the people has been exploited by Soviet imperialism for its own subversive and aggressive ends, thereby gravely endangering world peace". This emphasis was adopted unanimously—with both Arab and Israeli representatives on the board voting for it.

The Executive Board further designated a permanent Ad Hoc Commission on the Middle East charged with continuing efforts to bring about further agreement on this vital issue.

After vigorous discussion on the problems which have arisen as a result of some ICFTU affiliates engaging in the exchange of delegations with the so-called unions in the Communist countries—in disregard of the oft-reaffirmed ICFTU policy banning such exchanges—the Executive Board decided to set up a special committee to study the problem and to recommend methods and procedures for the implementation of ICFTU policies.

After reviewing the situation in Greece, the Executive Board condemned the usurpation of power by the military clique and decided that the rights and privileges of the ICFTU affiliate (GSEE) in this country will be held in abeyance until the board is satisfied that genuinely democratic and representative trade union forces will be in control of the organization.

Taking note of the fact that the Intl. Graphical Federation (IGF), which is associated with the ICFTU and embraces the graphical and printing workers' trade unions, has admitted at its latest congress an affiliate of the Communist-controlled CGT of France, the Executive Board unanimously decided to suspend all co-operation hitherto extended by the ICFTU to the IGF.

The board agreed in principle to hold the Ninth World Congress of the ICFTU in the United States in 1968, either in Washington or New York.

2 Merit Scholars Win Fellowships in Europe

Two AFL-CIO Merit Scholar graduates of this year are now in Europe studying for higher degrees. They are Paul C. Jefferson of Chicago, a graduate of Harvard University, and William S. Jacobs, Decatur, Ga., who was graduated from Swarthmore.

Jefferson is studying at the University of Paris under a Fulbright Award. He is majoring in French language and literature. Jacobs is enrolled at Cambridge in England, studying economics on a Keasby Foundation fellowship.

Jefferson is the son of Helen C. Jefferson, a Chicago school teacher and member of American Federation of Teachers Local 1. Jacobs is the son of Mr. and Mrs. W. D. Jacobs of Decatur.

Wage Award For Railmen Takes Effect

Some 137,000 members of six rail shopcraft unions have begun to receive the first installment on wage increases recommended last month by a special Presidential board.

The board's award, retroactive to Jan. 1, became effective Oct. 15 after rail management decided not to challenge it in court as it had once indicated it might do.

The unions proposed that the new rates be written into a contract, but management refused. It insisted on the compulsory arbitration feature, even while protesting the amount of the increase.

The effective date was set by Congress in a law passed in July to end a series of strikes by shopcraft workers. In the absence of a contract agreement, the award stays in effect until Jan. 1, 1969.

The five-man board, headed by Sen. Wayne Morse (D-Ore.), recommended an 11 percent general wage increase over two years for all of the shopmen, plus skill increases amounting to 20 cents an hour for three-fourths of them.

Six percent of the general increase is retroactive to Jan. 1, 1967, and another 5 percent is effective July 1, 1968. The skill pay, 20 cents in all, is in five-cent increments effective last April 1, Oct. 1, April 1, 1968, and Oct. 1, 1968.

Vice Pres. Thomas Ramsey of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, shopcrafts' spokesman, said railroad workers "have had to wait a long, long time for a pay increase and I know they are happy to be getting the money."

Board members in addition to Morse were AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, former Sen. Leverett Saltonstall (R-Mass.), Fred Kappel, retired head of American Telephone & Telegraph Co., and Theodore Kheel, New York mediator.

Unions involved in the dispute, in addition to IBEW, are Railway Carmen, Machinists, Boilermakers, Sheet Metal Workers and Firemen & Oilers.

Missile Sites Labor Panel Is Abolished

Labor disputes at missile sites have been reduced to such a degree that Pres. Johnson has terminated the Missile Sites Labor Commission set up in 1961 to handle labor problems at them.

The work of the commission, on which both labor labor and management were represented, has been transferred to the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service.

"The Commission's termination is a result of its success," said the President in his Executive Order for the transfer. "Missile and space site developments and construction have largely been completed. The record of labor peace at these important projects has been excellent in recent years, thanks in large measure to the work of this special commission and the cooperation of American labor and business."

Labor members of the Commission were AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, UAW Pres. Walter P. Reuther and Pres. C. J. Haggerty of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. Their alternates were Lane Kirkland, assistant to Meany; Nicholas A. Zonarich of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. and Pres. Peter T. Schoemann of the Plumbers & Pipefitters.

Key Programs Affected:

Coalition Budget-Slashing Scored as 'Cheap Politicking'

ership and statesmanship—not to engage in cheap politicking. That the people will prove in the next election."

Earlier, Biemiller had labeled the budget-cutting effort "unconscionable," declaring that it was "aimed at gutting the very domestic legislation the nation needs to meet the urban crisis."

Administration forces looked to the Senate to block the tight spending limit. Chairman George H. Mahon (D-Tex.) of the House Appropriations Committee said he would recommend that the bill be allowed to die in the Senate, even though it was attached to a so-called continuing resolution providing interim funds to keep a number of federal agencies from running out of money Oct. 23.

'Let It Die'

"We'll just let the continuing resolution die," Mahon said. "We'll try instead to get the regular appropriations bills finished up and enacted. The Senate never would buy it anyway."

Mahon charged that the budget-slashing directive to the President amounted to "passing the buck" and was "an abdication of our responsibility for control over the purse."

Prior to the House action on the Whitten-Bow proposal, he had sought unsuccessfully to head off deep cutbacks in Administration programs through a milder plan. This was calculated to achieve reductions of $1 billion to $1.5 billion, largely through payroll attrition and cuts in government research and development projects.

Debate over the Mahon plan and amendments to it brought on a five-hour wrangle that finally ended with adoption of the Whitten-Bow spending ceiling.

Whitten's amendment would limit expenditures to last year's $125.7 billion, but the exemptions it permits would bring the total close to the $131.5 billion limit specified in the Bow rider.

Among the exemptions spelled out are the cost of the debt, social security, expenditures related to the Viet Nam war, the postal service, veterans' benefits, the Internal Revenue Service and a pending pay raise for servicemen.

The plan, if allowed to stand, would mean starvation or death for many of the labor-supported Great Society programs that were just getting under way last year under appropriations that amounted to little more than "seed" money. The Model Cities program, for example, got almost nothing in fiscal 1967. But this year the House voted $237 million of the $662 million sought by the Administration and the Senate upped this by $300 million.

The immediate issue behind the fight over funds is the President's request for a tax increase to pay for the costs of the Viet Nam war. House Republicans and conservative Southern Democrats have served notice they will not even consider a tax hike unless Johnson agrees to major reductions in domestic programs.

Ways & Means Committee Chairman Wilbur D. Mills (D.-Ark.) has made it clear, however, that the broader issue is the programs themselves, declaring that "we want to pause in this headlong rush toward ever bigger government."

"Spending cuts this year are not the basic ingredient, welcome as they will be," Mills said in a statement. "What is essential, rather, is change in spending programs. We have to focus sharply on what the government is to do as well as on how much it is to spend."

In other actions in Congress:

- The House Armed Services Committee approved a $2.7 billion pay increase amounting to 22 percent in three stages for members of the armed forces. The measure parallels the pay raise recently voted by the House for government employes in the civil service. In addition, it specifies that henceforth servicemen will automatically receive the same increases given civil servants unless Congress decides otherwise.

- House and Senate conferees broke a three-month deadlock to come up with a bill to allow states to postpone congressional redistricting under court orders until after the 1970 census. The effect would be to delay compliance with the Supreme Court's "one man, one vote" districting mandate except in states holding a special census before 1970. The measure also would prohibit at-large congressional contests, except in New Mexico and Hawaii where they have been traditional.

- The House Labor Committee worked overtime in an effort to reach agreement on legislation continuing the government's anti-poverty program, which has been under heavy fire from the conservative coalition.

Normally committees meet in closed session to thrash out the details of a bill. Committee Chairman Carl D. Perkins (D.-Ky.), however, opened the sessions to the public after Republican absenteeism prevented a quorum. Following meetings were well-attended.

EYE-CATCHING DISPLAY was used to mark the opening of this new headquarters for Union Label & Service Trades of Greater New York and New York State. Located at 119 East 27th St., New York, the building also houses the Union Industries Information Center.

'Sweetheart Union' Bows To NLRB Agreement

legitimate AFL-CIO unions, the council charged.

The settlement, if approved by NLRB members in Washington, will "end BIW's existence as an alleged union" and will withdraw from Interstate Employers, Inc., the "shield of a union agreement which it has used to mislead the building trades industry" and the public, Executive Sec. J. A. Cinquemani of the council said. He added:

"We hope this will discourage the creation of phony labor unions seeking to destroy the wages and standards established and maintained" by bona fide construction unions.

The terms agreed to by the alleged union and the employers mandate BIW to stop representing employes for the purpose of collective bargaining within the state of California; to halt any future attempts to enforce its labor agreements within the state, and to disestablish itself as a representative of any workers.

NLRB members are expected to approve the stipulation as soon as it has been reviewed by the general counsel's office. Thirteen months ago they revoked the right of another self-styled union in Miami, Fla., to represent construction workers in collective bargaining.

In the latter case, the board found merit in charges by the Carpenters District Council and Local 349 of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers that the National Federation of Labor, Inc., made "quickie" deals with employers and signed "sweetheart" contracts to head off building trades unions.

Finding NFL to be a successor organization to the United Southern Employes Association, decertified in 1961, the NLRB last year affirmed a trial examiner's finding that the NFL was an employer-dominated instrumentality that for more than five years "utilized the bargaining process to promote employer aims."

Labor Asks Extension Of Davis-Bacon Law

Congress was urged to close a loophole in the Davis-Bacon Act to make it clear that federal prevailing wage standards apply to construction or repair of buildings the government leases as well as to those it builds for its own use.

The AFL-CIO, in a statement by Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller endorsed a bill to accomplish this introduced by Senators Clifford P. Case (R-N.J.) and Jennings Randolph (D-W.Va.).

Biemiller noted that the loophole resulted from a ruling by the U.S. comptroller-general in 1962 that the Davis-Bacon requirements did not apply to "construction, alteration or repairs" of buildings to be occupied by the government under lease arrangements.

This loophole should be closed "as soon as possible," Biemiller told the Senate Public Buildings subcommittee.

He said the principle embodied in the Davis-Bacon Act "is a simple one"—that the federal government should not subsidize construction in a locality through wage payments "lower than those prevailing on similar work in the locality."

This principle, he said, is "fully as applicable and important" when the work is being done under leases as when it is being done under direct contract with the government.

Biemiller reiterated the federation's 1962 testimony that "indirectly or directly, the use of federal funds should not be permitted to sanction or support substandard wages or working conditions."

Earlier, Pres. C. J. Haggerty of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. testified before the subcommittee that enactment of the bill to close the loophole is particularly important at this time. Haggerty cited a growing tendency of government departments and agencies to lease building space to meet their needs rather than build the structures themselves.

He said a report of the General Services Administration showed that at the end of June 1961, the government was leasing 6,000 buildings for the government's use across the country at a total annual rental of some $71.9 million.

The GSA's latest report, Haggerty noted, showed that as of the end of June 1966, the government was leasing 132.8 million square feet of floor space in 44,097 building locations at a total annual rental cost of $262.3 million. GSA and the Post Office Dept. together accounted for 88.5 percent of the square footage total, he observed.

As a result of the 1962 comptroller-general's ruling, he said, the principle of the Davis-Bacon Act is being "ignored and circumvented" under such lease arrangements. He declared that the government "is being used" to depress wages and working conditions prevailing in many communities for construction work and that unfair contractors are being given a "competitive advantage."

Bortz to Retire From Labor Dept.

Retirement Dec. 31 of Dir. Nelson M. Bortz of the Bureau of Labor Standards was announced by Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz in a statement lauding Bortz for his "contributions to the public welfare" in 32 years of Labor Dept. service.

Under Bortz's direction, progress was made in achieving safer and more healthy conditions on the job for U.S. workers, Wirtz said. He cited a continued drop in the maritime industry accident rate, improvements in state labor laws and a reduction in federal accidents.

60 Percent Jump in Postage Rates Seen Grave Blow to Labor Press

The Senate was urged to roll back a sharp increase in postage rates voted by the House for non-profit second-class mail that would force cutbacks in the size and frequency of many labor publications.

Sec.-Treas. Kenneth Fiester of the Intl. Labor Press Association, composed of publications of AFL-CIO affiliates, testified before the Senate Post Office Committee that the ILPA seeks no exemption from either the general 20 percent increase contemplated in the postal rate legislation or the much higher sliding scale on advertising content.

"What we most strenuously protest against," he said, "is the 60 percent rise in the piece rate, from one-eighth to one-fifth cent."

Fiester noted that the higher piece rate would apply in full to 250 of ILPA's 400 member publications with readership of 6.25 million. It would also apply to 43 other publications with 4.6 million readers that would henceforth pay by the piece rather than the pound, he noted. The latter group would pay 39 percent more in postage than under the higher pound rates proposed.

Labor publications, Fiester reminded the committee, depend for financing largely on membership dues. For the most part they are small in size, he noted, and carry little if any advertising. Because union dues are not easily raised, "even for the most appealing reasons," he said, a major increase in publication or distribution expense would inevitably mean "a curtailment in the already inadequate size and frequency of these publications."

Despite their size, Fiester observed, labor papers fulfill "a vital role in the public interest—the creation of a better-informed union membership, and the meeting notices, financial reports and other data which are not only desirable but are now required by law. . . ."

He pointed out that in 1965 postal revenues from all non-profit publications amounted to only $6.8 million, of which he estimated the share from the labor press was $1.2 million.

"Obviously, this classification can hardly have a visible impact on a postal deficit of $1.2 billion, no matter what is done with the rates."

Fiester urged the committee to consider abolishing the piece rate entirely, an approach which he said might even save money by eliminating an "enormous" amount of bookkeeping.

Failing this, he urged the Senate to raise the minimum rate by 20 percent rather than 60 percent, thus applying the same increase that would apply to other classes of mail and eliminating the severe penalty on small non-profit publications, including the labor press.

Labor Urges 'True' Federal Bargaining

New Steps Proposed By Meany

By Duane Emme

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany called for "true collective bargaining" in the federal civil service and proposed that a tripartite disputes panel be set up to resolve deadlocks.

Meany was the lead-off witness at hearings held by a Cabinet-level task force assigned to recommend improvements in the government's labor relations policy.

He urged that the executive order governing union recognition policy also be amended "to state explicitly" that the government accepts the principle "that unions and management in federal service should have the right to negotiate union security agreements."

The review committee, headed by Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, was established by Pres. Johnson last month to consider ways of improving collective bagaining within the government in the light of five years experience under a 1962 executive order. More than a million federal employes are represented by unions.

The committee's members include the secretary of defense, the postmaster general, the budget director, the chairman of the Civil Service Commission and a key presidential aide, Joseph Califano, Jr.

Meany's recommendations were prepared in consultation with a committee of leaders of government worker unions and unanimously approved by all AFL-CIO affiliates with members in the federal service.

After Meany testified, representatives of the affiliates also testified in detail based upon their active experience with federal labor-management relations. Other witnesses included government officials, educators and spokesmen for professional associations.

Meany told the committee that while the order represented "real progress" for federal employes "we still face a number of serious problems."

He recalled AFL-CIO testimony before a similar panel in 1961 that emphasized the need for arbitration to settle unresolved disputes, and he stressed that government employe unions are now more convinced than ever that this is needed.

"Such procedure is essential in view of the denial to federal workers of the right to strike," Meany declared.

The disputes panel would be

'Moderate' Living Budget Climbs to $9,191 a Year

RESPONDING to an ovation, Pres. Johnson waves after addressing delegates to the world congress of the Intl. Federation of Commercial, Clerical & Technical Employes (FIET) in Washington. Labor Dept. Sets New Family Guide

By Robert B. Cooney

It costs over $9,191 a year for a four-person city worker's family to maintain "a moderate living standard," the Labor Dept. has reported.

The spiraling living standards and aspirations of Americans in the 1960s are revealed in an updated "City Worker's Family Budget" just released by the department's Bureau of Labor Statistics.

The common size family used as a yardstick to measure living needs and patterns is made up of a 38-year old fulltime worker in the prime of his job career, his wife, a boy age 13 and an 8-year old girl.

The moderate budget costs much less for a smaller family, but much more for a larger family, the Labor Dept. study shows. The budget cost also varies by family age and type and by city and region.

The moderate budget for the selected family of four averages $9,376 in metropolitan areas and $8,366 in smaller cities, according to the study. Thus the budget averages $9,191 for all urban areas, based on au autmn 1966 prices. The budget would cost more currently since consumer prices for goods and services have risen about 2.5 percent in the last year.

The Labor Dept. estimates that the budget-type family, with just one fulltime breadwinner, had an average income before taxes of at least $11,000 in 1966. Government figures show that only 25 percent of the nation's 48 million families have an income of $10,000 or more.

While the Labor Dept. warns against making easy comparisons between worker earnings and the moderate budget, valid comparisons can be made if carefully qualified for family size and age and location.

In general, worker earnings fall substantially short of achieving the "moderate living standard."

For example, the Labor Dept. job report for September showed the factory production worker averaging $116 a week, including overtime. A full year's work would bring him earnings totaling $6,032.

Thus a factory worker of the budget-type city family—about 38 years old and with a wife and two children between 6 and 17 years of age—falls $3,159 short of the sum needed for a "moderate living standard."

Arthur M. Ross, Commissioner of Labor Statistics, told a press briefing that about half of all families have more than one breadwinner. In 1959, 43 percent had more than one earner.

So it appears that, in order to achieve the moderate standard of living, many families would need multiple breadwinners, or a single

Rent, Cities Funds Cut ByCoalition

By David L. Perlman

A House dominated by its Republican-led conservative coalition forced a massive cutback in two key Great Society programs —model cities and rent supplements.

It also vetoed funds for a public power project urgently needed in New England and continued on a collision course with the Senate over other budget slashes.

The Senate reluctantly accepted considerably less than half-a-loaf in appropriations for the cities programs. But it flatly turned down the House-passed directive to Pres. Johnson to cut a crippling $7-to-$10 billion from domestic programs.

In another area of controversy, a bipartisan liberal coalition in the Senate managed to pry out of the Southern-led Judiciary Committee its first civil rights bill—and blocked an attempt to transform the legislation into an anti-union bludgeon.

Auto Workers Okay New Ford Contract

By Eugene A. Kelly

Detroit—Striking Auto Workers voted by majorities of 70 to 90 percent at local union meetings across the country to accept a new national agreement with the Ford Motor Co. "and it is now in effect," the UAW announced here.

The strike that started Sept. 6 at 101 Ford locations will not, however, be completely ended until local issues are settled on a plant-by-plant basis. Workers at those plants where local supplementary agreements have been ratified—about 70 as the AFL-CIO News went to press—awaited company recall notices Oct. 29, the union said.

Terms offered by Ford to settle its dispute with 160,000 UAW members were approved by emphatic margins. A union announcement said production workers ratified the new three-year agreement "by an overwhelming majority of approximately 90 percent" and skilled trades workers "by a very substantial majority of approximately 70 percent."

The UAW said the national agreement, which it called "the largest economic package in UAW history," was rejected by only two Ford locals. Ratification was recorded in every Ford local in Michigan, including the 34,000-member Local 600 at the nearby River Rouge plant.

Ford and the union reached agreement in principle Oct. 22 on a contract to stay in effect until Sept. 14, 1970. Major features include:

Federal Role Held Key To Solving City Crisis

The AFL-CIO called for strong federal leadership to deal with the nation's urban crisis, emphasizing that only the federal government can assure results.

The diverse and extensive efforts of organized labor and the best attempts of "enlightened private industry," Federation Pres. George Meany declared, are not enough and the problems besetting the urban areas will "defy solution," without government leadership.

Meany spelled out labor's position in testimony before the National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders, set up by Pres. Johnson after the widespread outbreaks and rioting of the past summer.

The AFL-CIO president said that labor had no recommendations on how to subdue riots but had a broad and specific program to deal with the "conditions that without doubt contribute to civil disorder."

Meany told the commission that "mob violence, arson, looting and murder are indefensible in a free society" and their only result can be "anarchy on the one hand and worse suppression on the other, and "it is important to consider what lies behind the acts."

Citing the preamble to the U.S. Constitution and its dedication to justice and domestic tranquility, he asserted that the most pressing need

Strike Right Defended by Church Panel

New York—A report reaffirming the right of workers to strike and questioning the justice and effectiveness of compulsory arbitration has been issued by a church panel of nationally known economists, educators and religious leaders. The group has been studying labor-management relations for the past two years. (Excerpts on Page 6)

The right to strike, the panel declared, "is the ultimate sanction giving workers reasonable equality with management at the bargaining table and is an inherent aspect of the right to organize and bargain collectively."

DELEGATES from unions around the globe attended a three-day congress of the Intl. Federation of Commercial, Clerical & Technical Employes in Washington. The organization, known as FIET, represents nearly 5 million white collar workers in 112 affiliated organizations in 62 nations. The congress marked the first time an international trade union conference has been held in the United States.

World White Collar Conference Tackles Organizing, Automation

Two issues—organizing white collar workers and protecting them against the impact of automation—topped a heavy agenda of a world congress of the Intl. Federation of Commercial, Clerical & Technical Employes in Washington.

Known as FIET, its initials in French, Spanish and Italian, the organization is the second largest of 16 international trade union secretariats. Some 500 participants in the congress represented nearly 5 million workers in 50 countries.

Delegates gave an enthusiastic welcome to an unscheduled opening day speaker—Pres. Johnson.

The President spoke of Viet Nam and the search for world peace—and of America's efforts to eliminate poverty and create a better life.

FIET's congress was the first ever held in the U.S. by a world labor organization and the organization's general secretary, Erich Kissel, said "it was not by accident that we came here."

By comparison with other nations, white collar workers are so poorly organized in the U.S. that FIET considers it an "underdeveloped nation," Kissel said. Yet, he added, an examination of automation here shows us what is in store for other countries.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany welcomed the congress on behalf of the American labor movement. Retail Clerks Pres. James A. Suffridge is president of FIET and other U.S. affiliates are the Office Employes; Building Service Employes; Retail, Wholesale & Department Store Union and Insurance Workers.

Beirne Among Speakers

Other speakers during the first two days of the congress included Pres. Joseph A. Beirne of the Communications Workers, Walter Washington, newly appointed commissioner-mayor of Washington, D.C., and Ralph Wright, director of the Washington office of the Intl. Labor Organization.

Johnson recalled that he had seen "some of the worldwide activities of FIET" when he visited 20 countries in 1961 while on a mission for Pres. Kennedy, with Suffridge accompanying him.

The U.S. is fighting in Viet Nam to halt the aggression of "armed invaders," Johnson told the delegates, and will not be swayed in its willingness to "stay the course."

"Peace and stability will come to Asia only when the aggressors know that they cannot take another people's land by force," he added.

The President put special stress on the many ways in which America is using its resources in a "constructive and compassionate way" to strengthen freedom and help eliminate poverty and disease.

Meany Theme

Meany told the delegates "I cannot overemphasize the importance of the work in which you are engaged. . . . Not only do you represent an active free trade union secretariat, but you represent a secretariat in a field of vital importance."

Describing free unions as "the hallmark of a free society," he pointed out that dictatorships—whether they be of the right, left or center—also recognize this and thus always "take control of unions" as soon as they seize power.

The effort in the 1940's to join free and totalitarian unions into the World Federation of Trade Unions failed, Meany said, for reasons as basic as "that you can't mix oil and water."

Or to put it another way, he continued, the effort failed because "some of the unions were in a position to make their own decisions" while others "were instruments of the state, and not instruments of the workers they were supposed to represent."

For the same reasons, he pointed out, current efforts by some unions to bring about "rapprochement" between Iron Curtain unions and free unions are doomed to fail. "The AFL-CIO," he said, "refuses to buy rapprochement and refuses to compromise the vital principle of worker freedom."

Suffridge traced the work of FIET in "promoting the interests of the non-manual worker, enhancing the dignity of his labor and improving his working conditions and living standards."

In the last three years, he noted, FIET has opened new regional offices; assisted affiliates in organizing drives; held labor leader training programs throughout the world; and conducted seminars for workers on organizing, collective bargaining, legislation and union administration.

Conceding that organizing of white collar workers in the U.S. still has a long way to go—with only about 15 percent of the non-manual workers in unions—Suffridge saw hopeful signs for the future.

Present increased trade union activity among white collar workers in the nation, he said, "indicates that the non-manual worker is beginning to appreciate the value of union membership and the union movement is beginning to better understand his needs."

Beirne extended greetings to delegates as president of the Postal, Telegraph & Telephone Intl., a secretariat composed of communication unions. He pointed out that both PPTI and FIET are organizing white collar workers—"the most difficult of all organizing."

Reports Given

Among those submitting reports to the Congress were Pres. Howard Coughlin of the Office Employes; Rolf Spethen, chairman of DAG, a large German union of professional employes; Thomas Cynog-Jones, research director of Great Britain's Union of Shop, Distributive & Allied Workers; and Mrs. Annador Bell, director of the German Trade Union Federation (DGB).

Delegates visited a number of computer operations in New York and Washington to see automation in progress. They also attended a "ground breaking" ceremony for the Retail Clerks new headquarters in Washington.

Suffridge Appointed To Viet Inauguration

AFL-CIO Vice President James A. Suffridge was named by Pres. Johnson as one of three U.S. representatives to the inauguration of South Viet Nam's President-elect Nguyen Van Thieu in Saigon, Oct. 31.

Suffridge, president of the Retail Clerks, will accompany Vice Pres. Hubert Humphrey, who heads the American delegation, and William Randolph Hearst Jr., chairman of the Hearst Corp.

Norman Dowd, 77 Dies in Ottawa

Ottawa—Norman S. Dowd, 77, former executive secretary of the Canadian Labour Congress and the former Canadian Congress of Labour, died in a hospital here. Prior to his retirement in 1960, he also was editor of Canadian Labour, CLC's monthly journal.

When the CLC was formed in 1940, Dowd became its executive secretary and editor of its official publication, The Canadian Unionist. In 1956, with the foundation of the CLC, he assumed the similar posts in the new federation.

Hemispheric Unity:

21 Air Unions Sign Pact for Mutual Aid

Mexico City—Airline unions of 21 nations in North, South and Central America signed a mutual assistance pact here pledging to help each other in dealing with the big airlines operating throughout the Western Hemisphere.

The pact—the first of its kind for the unions—was adopted on the final day of an Inter-American Air Transport Workers Conference, sponsored by the Intl. Transport Workers Federation (ITF) and attended by 129 delegates from air transport unions.

Delegations from five AFL-CIO unions—Machinists, Railway & Airline Clerks, Transport Workers, Air Line Pilots and Flight Engineers—attended the conference and took leading roles in its deliberations.

In its "declaration of principles," the pact binds the unions to "effective and full solidarity" based upon airline labor's efforts to achieve "justice on the job and service to our communities."

Incorporating reports and conclusions drawn up by conference committees, the pact provides procedures for exchange of information and mutual help in bargaining, organizing, setting grievance procedures and adopting safety rules.

It calls upon unions to assist each other in securing progressive legislation in their respective countries and in "combating detrimental employer and governmental actions."

Also, it specifies, "in the true spirit of ITF, we pledge ourselves to act in concert . . . when the rights of fellow union members elsewhere are threatened."

In deploring government interference with the right to strike, the pact emphasizes that the freedom of workers to have unions and withdraw their services when necessary is "fundamental to the continued welfare of workers everywhere in the world."

"The alternative is involuntary servitude," it declares.

In the bargaining area, the pact proposes standardization of rules and working conditions "whenever possible," efforts to eliminate "company-dominated" unions and exchanges of data on negotiations channeled through ITF.

It recommends a 36-point set of minimum standards for all airline union contracts covering such points as grievances, union security, seniority, severance, training programs, transfer rights, pensions, health and welfare programs and other benefits.

It urges unions to negotiate vigorously on wages to assure that they are in line with "the relative economic development of the particular economy, profits of the airline and productivity of workers."

Delegates also asked the ITF to establish a permanent Committee for Aerial Safety and Accident Protection to help develop minimum safety standards and also gather, evaluate and distribute information to airline unions.

The conference elected three airline union leaders—one each in North, South and Central America—to oversee the pact's operation in their particular areas. Frank Heisler, IAM's airlines coordinator, was chosen for North America.

Sea Unions Warn of Plot To Halt Ships

New York—A warning that "the so-called Japanese Confederation of Trade Unions" is calling an international conference for the purpose of interfering with U.S. shipments to South Viet Nam has been issued by the presidents of five seamen's and longshoremen's unions.

The warning was sent to Pres. Johnson in the names of Pres. Thomas W. Gleason of the Longshoremen, Pres. Joseph Curran of the National Maritime Union, Pres. Jesse M. Calhoon of the Marine Engineers Beneficial Association, Pres. Lloyd W. Sheldon of the Masters, Mates & Pilots and Pres. William R. Steinberg of the American Radio Association.

"We have been informed that Sohyo, the so-called Japanese Confederation of Trade Unions, has called a conference of certain Asian and Australian unions to set up an international action program for stopping shipments to South Viet Nam," their message said.

"The principal tactic would be to use members of Communist-dominated seamen's and longshoremen's unions to halt shipping en route to the embattled nation."

In the light of these anti-American activities, the message called on the Johnson Administration to revise its "effective control" policies which permit American companies to register their ships under foreign flags and man them with foreign crews with no loyalty to the U.S.

New Ford Contract Ratified, Local Issues Delay Accord

the union to total 58 cents an hour over the contract term; skilled trades increases averaging $1.02 an hour; cost-of-living adjustments ranging from 6 to 16 cents an hour; a $1 raise in basic pension benefits, increasing on Jan. 1, 1969, to $5.50, $5.75 or $6 monthly times years of service; a new guaranteed income credit plan providing 52 weeks of income at 95 percent of take-home pay during layoffs, minus $7.50 a week for reduced travel-meal expenses; major health plan improvements, improved working conditions and other benefits.

UAW officers met with Ford officials to discuss recall plans, and summoned an executive board meeting to consider unsettled contracts at General Motors, Chrysler, American Motors and all farm implement employers except Caterpillar Tractor Co., where new contract terms have been won.

The UAW-Ford national agreement will put these terms into effect:

Wages

- An immediate general wage increase of 20 cents an hour.
- An additional 30 cents an hour for skilled tradesmen.
- Annual increases of 3 percent each year for the second and third years of the contract.

The union put the wage total at 58 cents an hour for production workers with the "roll up" included — the cost of wage-related fringe benefits such as holiday pay, vacation pay and shift premiums. The average for skilled workers is $1.02 an hour over three years.

Cost of Living

Living-cost allowances of 3-8 cents an hour during the second contract year, and an additional allowance in the third year to bring the total to not less than 6 cents and not more than 16.

If cost-of-living increases require more than 16 cents, the additional amount will be due on the day following termination of the three-year agreement.

Unemployment Benefits

The union won major improvements in the supplemental unemployment benefits (SUB) plan including a new guaranteed annual income plan.

The new plan guarantees that each December, hourly-rated Ford workers will get credits, graduated according to seniority, assuring a seven-year worker 52 weeks of income at 95 percent of take-home pay, minus a deduction of $7.50 a week for job-related expenses like transportation and meals.

SUB benefits for all short workweeks, unscheduled or scheduled, have been increased to 80 percent of gross pay.

Pensions

Basic pensions were increased from $4.25 per month per year of service to $5.25 in the first contract year. Wage-related pensions effective Jan. 1, 1969, will further increase pension benefits to $5.50, $5.75 or $6 depending on job classification, according to the UAW.

These new wage-related pension benefits will, the union said, "give long-service Ford workers $5,000-$6,000 a year in income, including social security benefits and improved hospital-surgical-medical benefits, for the rest of their lives."

Basic benefits for the 28,000 Ford workers now on pension will be increased $1 a month for each year of credited service, starting 90 days after the effective date of the agreement. Present retirees may elect to forego the $1 increase in order to get pension protection for the surviving spouse. Future retirees can get 95 percent of the full pension benefit while providing a 55 percent benefit for a survivor.

Pensions for all present and future retirees and their surviving spouses will be increased $3 a month for those over 65 to compensate for the cost of Medicare Part B.

Health Benefits

All Ford workers will be covered by a national uniform system of health benefits with improvements including full payment of doctors' fees, elimination of X-ray and other deductibles and expanded medical benefits.

A new prescription drug plan will give Ford workers and their families a "large measure of protection" against the high cost of prescription drugs.

Working Conditions

The agreement was changed to provide improved working conditions including "greater protection against unfair production standards, excessive overtime, and other problems," according to a UAW summary. Assembly workers in auto, truck and tractor plants will get 12 minutes more relief time to a new minimum of 48 minutes per day. Employes with seniority may transfer to an equal or lower-rated job.

Outside Contracting

Strengthened contract provisions will, the union said, protect Ford production workers, tool and die, jig and fixture, maintenance and construction workers against loss of jobs by the contracting-out of bargaining unit work to be done by contractors in Ford plants. The union added: "The contract guarantees that no UAW member will be laid off as a direct and immediate result of the contracting-out of work to be done in a Ford facility."

Paid Holidays

The new contract increases the number of paid holidays from 9 to 11—one timed to provide long weekends at Christmas and New Year in 1968, 1969 and 1970, and another in 1970 to provide a four-day holiday weekend at another time of the year. Ford said the latter holiday will take effect in 1970 "contingent on permanent waiver by the union of 1 cent of the living-cost allowance if the allowance at the second COL adjustment date exceeds 11 cents per hour."

Other Improvements

Establishment of a joint study committee to make recommendations on problems related to lines of demarcation between crafts.

A Christmas bonus of approximately $30 will be paid next December to every Ford worker with at least one year of seniority, to be paid out of surplus SUB funds.

On wage parity for Canadian workers, the union said the UAW-Ford of Canada contract does not terminate until December 1967 but "the UAW is fully committed to win job security for U.S. workers and equity for Canadian workers and we are determined to press this demand with all of our resources in the negotiations still ahead in 1967."

Workers Okay 3-Year Pact At Caterpillar

Chicago—Ratification of a three-year agreement between the Caterpillar Tractor Co. and the Auto Workers signaled the end of a 25-day strike by 26,000 workers at plants in seven cities—Aurora, Decatur and Peoria, Ill.; Davenport, Ia.; Denver, Col.; York, Pa., and San Leandro, Calif.

Upon ratification by all UAW-Caterpillar local unions, union bargainers sought to win similar agreements from Intl. Harvester Co. and Deere & Co., where contracts were extended after the Caterpillar walkout Oct. 1; and other companies including Allis-Chalmers Mfg. Co., whose contract expires Nov. 1.

The Caterpillar walkout was the first against that firm in 19 years. The company made one contract offer, as in auto negotiations, and declined to improve it even after workers authorized a strike by a margin of more than 90 percent.

The new pact provides immediate wage increases ranging from 17 cents an hour to 50 cents; improved pensions, a new long-term disability plan, a $100 vacation bonus and a "guaranteed income" plan similar to the auto industry plan won by the UAW at Ford.

Caterpillar strikers had been receiving UAW strike benefits ranging from $20 to $30 a week since Oct. 8.

Firms in Slum Areas Get Contract Priority

As part of its program to help ghetto, riot-torn city areas, the Johnson Administration is planning to give government contract preference to employers who hire the jobless in hard-core unemployment centers.

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz has announced changes in federal procurement practices under which areas of high unemployment will be given special consideration.

He said that the new policy will further Pres. Johnson's announcement of a test program "to mobilize the resources of private industry and the federal government to help find jobs and provide training for thousands of America's hard-core unemployed."

In the past most U.S. cities have not qualified for special contract consideration because their high unemployment rates within the slums were offset by relatively low unemployment in other parts of the city. The new eligibility regulations now enable the government to select parts of cities for job help.

Firms which are located within or near concentrated joblessness will be eligible for first preference in the award of certain portions of federal procurement contracts providing they have an approved plan for employing at least 50 percent of their contract work force from among disadvantaged workers living in those sections.

Cities where the new regulations will apply include: Atlanta, Baltimore, Birmingham, Boston, Chicago, Cleveland, Detroit, Houston, Los Angeles, Newark (N.J.), New Orleans, New York, Oakland (Calif.), Philadelphia, Phoenix (Ariz.), Pittsburgh, St. Louis, San Antonio, (Texas), San Francisco and Washington, D.C.

YOUR COMPLAINTS can become the basis for future consumer protective legislation, Betty Furness, the President's assistant for consumer affairs, told a labor-sponsored consumer rally in Los Angeles. From left, Exec.-Sec. Sigmund Arywitz, Los Angeles County Federation of Labor; Miss Furness; Pres. Jackie Walsh, California Consumers Association, and Pres. Albin I. Gruhn, California AFL-CIO.

Betty Furness Warns Of Consumer Apathy

Los Angeles—Betty Furness, Pres. Johnson's special assistant on consumer affairs, has called on housewives to bombard her office with specific complaints on hanky-panky in the market place.

And she promised to carry them quickly to the President to lay the groundwork for legislation to curb the abuses that are eating away at everybody's pocketbook.

She issued her call for an end to "apathy" at a special consumer conference developed by organized labor at the Musicians Union auditorium in Hollywood.

Citing Pres. Johnson's proposals for consumer protective legislation, and the growing demand from consumers for even more laws to protect them, Miss Furness declared:

"The public has discovered that as consumers it has a voice. It is discovering the power of that voice, but not quickly enough for me."

"Write your congressmen about important legislation. He cares about what you want. Tell him—and tell me."

She warned against the assumption that consumers are already protected adequately in the market place by all sorts of laws.

"We have succeeded too well in reassuring ourselves that because something is wrong it will not be allowed, or that because it is right it will be provided."

Miss Furness also scored the role that the Madison Avenue advertising hucksters are playing in the life of gullible consumers.

On the tremendous outpouring of products, accompanied with advertising ballyhoo to create the market and the demand, she said:

"We buy them whether they are effective or useless, hideous or ugly, safe or unsafe.

"We buy solely on the basis of persuasive advertising."

She pointed out that "advertising has its task made easier by the enormous ballooning of credit as an industry" since World War II.

"In these times of high employment," she added, "Americans have almost unlimited faith in their future ability to pay."

Morever, she said, "The modern consumer is buying services for which it is nearly impossible for him to estimate the fair market cost," as in the case of utilities.

She pointed to Pacific Tel & Tel's request for a whopping rate increase that would nearly double the phone bills for householders.

Then, in an obvious slap at Gov. Ronald Reagan for virtually eliminating the state consumer counsel's office and function in California. Miss Furness asked:

"Who speaks for each of you, at the tables where such ultimate decisions will be made, now that California's once-vital and once vocal office of Consumer Counsel has been stilled?"

Miss Furness specifically urged consumer support for the truth-in-lending bill.

"Excessive credit costs are eating away at everybody's pocketbook. The consumer should know exactly what he is paying in interest charges for any item that he buys on time."

She urged consumers to support such protective legislation by joining together in "organizations such as this which directly serve the consumer interest."

Ghetto Prices

Earlier during the day, Miss Furness had toured the Watts ghetto area where Negro leaders complain it is common knowledge that supermarkets and other stores charge more than they do in the middle-income areas of Los Angeles.

She called on consumer groups to take an active role in easing the burden on the poor.

"The poor must not pay more for credit or for merchandise. And those of use who are able must speak in their behalf," she said.

The board-based consumer rally, developed by organized labor, is the first step in what Sigmund Arywitz, executive secretary of the Los Angeles County Federation of Labor, said was the development of a massive consumer protection program.

Wide Representation

Groups represented at the rally included the L.A. County AFL-CIO, the State AFL-CIO, the Community Service Organization, the National Federation of Temple Sisterhoods, the Association of California Consumers, the American Consumers Council, the California Committee for Mental Health, the Catholic Welfare Bureau, the Community Relations Conference of Southern California.

Also, the Los Angeles section of the National Council of Jewish Women, the Los Angeles Urban League, the Mexican-American Political Association, the Southern California field office of the NAACP and Workmen's Circle of California.

Western Union Vote Set by Telegraphers

San Francisco—Delegates to the Commercial Telegraphers convention here proposed an amalgamation of two of the CTU's divisions to present a stronger bargaining front in forthcoming Western Union negotiations.

The CTU's 31st convention voted to hold a merger referendum by next Mar. 1 among CTU members in the two divisions which represent Western Union employes—the Western Union Division and the Southern Division.

An 11-member committee, headed by Pres. E. L. Hageman, will develop contract proposals early next year for Western Union bargaining. The current contract with the huge telegraph firm expires May 31.

The convention re-elected Hageman and other top officers. In the only contest, Sec.-Treas. John T. Dowling won re-election over Jerry Grim, president of Dayton, O., Local 142.

The convention directed the CTU to work with other interested unions to amend present state laws prohibiting women from working overtime.

"It is our opinion that women should be allowed to work overtime but not forced to do so," the resolution committee said. "The laws, as written, are to protect women. These laws should be amended so as to still offer protection but not to prohibit the working of overtime because of sex."

UPI Change

Another convention action was to transfer CTU's United Press International Division to a different organizational structure to make it possible for UPI members to be represented on the union's executive board.

Convention speakers included California AFL-CIO Exec. Sec.-Treas. Thomas L. Pitts, who condemned Gov. Ronald Reagan's authorization of use of convict labor to harvest farm crops.

The "labor shortage" Reagan claimed to justify his action was actually a wage shortage—the failure of the big growers to offer adequate pay to attract farm workers—Pitts charged.

Next Telegraphers convention will be held in New Orleans in 1971.

BRITISH WORKERS have found that wage and price controls limit wages more than prices, General Sec. Frank Cousins of the Transport & General Workers Union of Great Britain told the Amalgamated Transit Union at a New Orleans convention marking the ATU's 75th anniversary. Cousins is shown receiving a recording of his speech from union Pres. John M. Elliott, right.

Transit Union Asks Safeguard of Rights

New Orleans—The Amalgamated Transit Union will continue to fight for protection of labor standards in urban mass transit systems of the future and for the inclusion of transit employes in wage-hour law coverage, delegates to the 39th ATU convention decided in final convention sessions.

The convention, meeting in the union's 75th anniversary year, voted to raise salaries of all officers and staff members by 20 percent; recommended a compromise settlement of a dispute over seniority rights in Boston; and made four changes in basic ATU laws.

General Sec. Frank Cousins of the Transport & General Workers Union of Great Britain cited similarities in the struggle of British and American trade unionists against compulsory arbitration and wage restraints. Wage and price controls in Britain limit wages more than prices, said Cousins, a convention guest.

Assistant Labor Sec. Thomas R. Donahue told delegates that the American labor movement has been "the single loudest citizen's voice" for the poor and underprivileged and has fought for "every bit of progressive legislation we now have."

Earlier the convention heard a message from Pres. Johnson congratulating the union on its 75th anniversary year and on its "constructive role" in the effort to develop comprehensive mass-transit systems. Also it was addressed by AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler, Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller, COPE Dir. Alexander Barkan and others.

After accepting officers' reports it voted new terms for Pres. John M. Elliott, Executive Vice Pres. Edward W. Oliver and Sec.-Treas. O. J. Mischo.

The delegates approved a recommendation by the convention law committee for a compromise settlement of a dispute over the seniority rights of 800 rapid transit employes and 2,500 Boston surface system employes who presently cannot take their service credits from one system to another. The convention voted to give an employe the right to negotiate a transfer to either system and to retain his prior rights.

Another amendment of ATU law provides that any member eligible to vote in a local election may challenge the results of that election within 10 days, instead of within an unspecified period as before.

An omnibus resolution of support for the legislative goals of the AFL-CIO and its Executive Council was adopted by unanimous vote of the delegates.

Creating the Climate:

Council Seeks New Professional Units

Creating the climate that will turn professional and scientific workers to legitimate trade unionism is the major goal of the Council of Scientific, Professional & Cultural Employes.

AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Herman Kenin, who heads the council, said that the 18 international union affiliates of the group will concentrate on providing evidence of what trade unionism can do for professionals.

"We intend to establish a home for professional people where they can identify themselves as professionals in the labor movement," Kenin said, following a meeting of the executive council.

Jack Golodner, executive secretary of the group, added that professionals are turning to unionism.

"Professional societies, associations and other professional organizations are finding that collective bargaining and the strike are effective tools in achieving recognition at the workplace and in their own professions," Golodner declared.

He noted the "increasing size of industry and institutions developing an impersonal trend where trade unionism is the only answer."

Both Kenin and Golodner pointed out that in many cases the standards for a profession are set by employers who are not members of the particular profession. They underscored that teachers, through the efforts of the American Federation of Teachers, are finally getting a voice in education.

Other Unions, Too

Kenin recalled that even the Musicians had such problems, as did unions such as Actors Equity, but today find that unionism and the bargaining contract are the foundation of their well-being.

"I believe this will be true of all professional and scientific groups in this country before too long," he said.

The council issued policy statements emphasizing the need for solidarity among teachers and other professional workers; calling on member unions to support public television stations in their areas, and urging union involvement in cultural projects.

Work stoppages by teachers in September "demonstrated once again the need of solidarity among professionals," the council declared. The issues involved in the stoppages were the issues confronting professionals everywhere—salaries, work conditions, and "the right of a professional to use his independent skill and judgment in the performance of his work," the council said.

"The right to withhold services, whether through a strike or other concerted actions, is essential if we are to win the struggle for professional sovereignty," the council said.

The council said it believes that public television can contribute to the expansion of truly equal educational and cultural opportunities by offering high quality cultural, entertainment and public affairs programs of general interest to all and also by providing a wide diversity of programs to smaller audiences.

Air Dispatcher Delegates Vote Higher Dues

Las Vegas—A dues increase to cover the cost of stepped-up union activities and higher operational expenses was approved by delegates to the 25th convention of the Air Line Dispatchers here.

The dues increase is $1 a month for members in the "active dispatchers" category, bringing their total dues to $11 a month. For "junior active" members the increase was 50 cents a month to $6.

The union, among the smallest in the AFL-CIO, represents highly-skilled operations control specialists on airlines, and much of the convention was devoted to discussions of flight problems with government officials.

A banquet held during the convention heard addresses from Chairman Howard Gamser of the National Mediation Board; Donald Madole, former hearing officer with the Civil Aeronautics Board; D'Arcy Kennedy, president of the Canadian Air Line Dispatchers.

Frank O. Wicks of Eastern Airlines was elected a vice president, winning out in a race against two other candidates. He succeeds Vincent Monforte of Continental, an incumbent vice president who did not seek re-election.

The union's two top officers, Pres. Robert E. Commerce and Sec.-Treas. James Boyd, were not up for re-election. Neither were the union's four other vice presidents.

Among resolutions adopted, delegates called for ALDA to join Flight Safety Foundation, Inc., created a contract-policy-guide committee, extended a $1,000 death benefit to cover retired members, and supported the Air Line Pilots demands for a three-man cabin crew on 737 jet aircraft.

Delegates voted to change from an annual to a biennial convention after 1968, providing the shift is approved at the 1968 convention.

New Hampshire Labor Votes Convention Shift

Manchester, N.H.—The New Hampshire AFL-CIO changed its 10-year-old constitution to provide for the election of officers every two years and to concentrate in even-numbered years on legislation, voter registration and endorsement of political candidates.

Some 350 delegates from 250 local unions met here at the state central body's 10th anniversary convention. They approved a constitutional change to allow more convention time for political education and re-elected Pres. Thomas J. Pitarys, Executive Vice Pres. Joseph Moriarty and Sec.-Treas. Robert Hobart.

The convention voted to continue the voter registration program launched successfully last year; urged a "more dynamic role" for labor people in anti-poverty programs at the community level; and called on the state legislature to rescind its endorsement of the Dirksen Amendment undercutting the Supreme Court's "one man, one vote" decision.

Also it pledged to keep fighting for improvements in unemployment compensation benefits, workmen's compensation for injuries, and improved minimum wage laws.

The delegates voted support for the national tax program proposed by the AFL-CIO; the situs picketing bill; the trade union training program of the Office of Economic Opportunity and the "war on poverty" program.

The state pays lower wages to public school teachers than any other state in the North, and denies them the right to organize and bargain collectively, Pitarys said in calling for improvements. The state also needs special schools to prepare pupils for a world which needs draftsmen, technicians, medical workers and other special groups, he declared.

"For adults we need vocational schools and adult courses," Pitarys said. A labor education program in cooperation with the University of New Hampshire was slowed by a cut of $3 million in the university budget, and a tuition raise of $200 a semester hits hardest at working-class children, he reported.

EXECUTIVE BOARD of Council of Scientific, Professional & Cultural Employes stressed the need for solidarity among union members in the professions at its recent meeting in Washington. Eighteen AFL-CIO unions are affiliated with the council.

'Moderate' Budget Climbs to $9,191

breadwinner would have to moonlight, or a family would have to go into debt.

The Labor Dept.'s four-person family spent about 80 percent of its budget—an average of $7,329—for goods and services needed in family living. These included food, housing, transportation, clothing, personal care, medical care and other items. The remainder of the budget goes for personal income and social security taxes, job expenses, gifts and contributions and basic life insurance.

The budget itself does not provide for savings, though there are savings to a certain degree in the form of equity in the house and in insurance.

While it took $7,329 to purchase the goods and services required for this four-person family's moderate living standard, "a young couple without children would need only $3,591," the Labor Dept. said, adding:

"On the other hand, if the two children in the four-person family were high school age, it would take at least $8,282. Or, if there were two more children in the family with the oldest of the four children still under 16, the cost of goods and services to maintain the same standard would be approximately $9,674."

The new 1966 moderate budget has more than doubled since 1951. Although the 1966 budget study covered 39 metropolitan areas, comparisons can be made for the 18 cities priced in the 1951 study, in the 1959 interim budget and in 1966.

In these 18 cities, the Labor Dept. said, the total cost of a moderate living standard for a four-person family was $4,200 in 1951. This rose 45 percent to $6,100 in 1959.

"The cost of the current moderate standard in the same cities in 1966 averaged $8,700 for renter families and $9,283 for renter and owner families combined," the report said.

There were wide regional differences in the cost of the moderate budget.

While the budget averaged $9,191 for all 39 urban areas, it ranged from a low of $8,028 in Austin, Texas, to $11,190 in Honolulu. On the mainland, exclusive of Alaska, the budget cost the most—$10,195—in the New York-northeastern New Jersey area, closely followed by Boston and Hartford.

The South ran lower than other regions in budget costs primarily because of climate and diet. Less heavy clothing is required, housing and fuel costs are much lower and the diet includes cheaper foods.

Below-average costs existed in all southern urban areas except Washington, D. C.

Homeowner costs for the 5- or 6-room house specified in the moderate budget were highest in Boston, with New York-northeastern New Jersey next.

Total budget costs for all urban areas averaged about $800 higher for homeowner than for renter families, the Labor Dept. said. This figure includes about $450 in payments on mortgage principal, a form of "savings" not included in the budget for renter families.

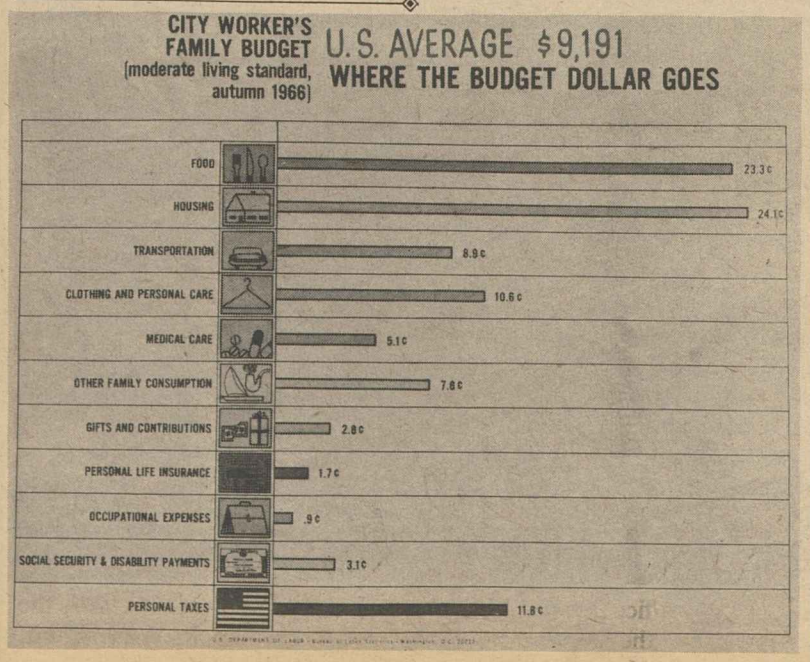
Rents for 5-room houses were highest in Honolulu. On the mainland, rental costs were substantially above average (15 percent or more) in San Francisco-Oakland, in Chicago-northwestern Indiana, in Hartford and in Seattle-Everett. The lowest shelter costs were in the South.

Food costs for a nutritionally comparable diet in mainland urban areas ran from 11 percent above the U.S. average in New York-northeastern New Jersey and Hartford to 8 percent below the average in Durham, N. C. and Nashville, Tenn.

Total costs for the moderate budget were about 10 percent lower in smaller cities than in metropolitan areas.

The Labor Dept. observed that the cost of the family consumption part of the budget in 1966 prices is about 40 percent higher for renter families than in 1959 when the budget for the 1950s was priced. About two-fifths of this rise is due to higher prices while the rest represents a rise in living standards.

A major change, the study noted, is an upgrading of the budget food standard to reflect more varied diets and more meals away from home. The new budget also includes home ownership for three-fourths of budget families and for increased auto ownership.



Glass Union Seeks Standardized Pay

New York — The Glass Bottle Blowers will make equalization of pay rates for similar jobs a major bargaining objective for all its locals representing 70,000 members, the union executive board decided here.

The aim of pay rate standardization will be applied not only in the glass container industry but in fiber glass, plastics and other operations in which the GBBA has members. Tying standardization of scales to the highest levels negotiated in a specific industry has long been a goal of GBBA Pres. Lee W. Minton, the union said.

A three-year contract with the glass container industry expires early in 1968. It was reached in 1965 after long negotiations and an 11-day strike in Eastern plants.

Living Standards Shift For City Family in '66

A higher food standard at home, more eating out, home ownership, increased auto ownership, better medical care and a trend towards casual clothing.

This is the way the city family is living in the 1960s on a moderate budget of $9,191 a year, according to the Labor Dept.'s updated "City Worker's Family Budget."

The new study offers a profile of the level and manner of living of a four-person family, based on autumn 1966 prices. The family consists of a 38-year-old fulltime breadwinner, a wife and two children, a girl aged 8 and a boy, 13.

The Labor Dept. study pointed out that the cost of the moderate budget changes with a family of different size and age and so includes the cost of the budget for other types of families.

The Labor Dept. also announced it will issue later studies on the spring 1967 costs for the moderate budget and also for a lower and a higher standard for the four-person family and for the retired couple.

The lower standard budget will reflect substantial downward adjustments in the content and manner of living of the moderate standard to a degree that it will not harm the family's physical health or self-respect, the study said.

The lower standard budget is expected to be useful for defining poverty lines and setting goals for public assistance and income maintenance programs.

The moderate budget, however, was said by the Labor Dept. to be neither "subsistence" nor "luxury."

The Labor Dept. said the four-person family on the moderate budget of $9,191 a year spent its budget dollar this way: food, 23.3 cents; housing, 24.1 cents; transportation, 8.9 cents; clothing and personal care, 10.6 cents; medical care, 5.1 cents; other items like smoking and recreation, 7.8 cents; gifts and contributions, 2.8 cents; personal life insurance, 1.7 cents; job expenses, 0.9 cents; social security and disability payments, 3.1 cents and personal income taxes, 11.8 cents.

Here is how the Labor Dept. detailed the higher living standards in the moderate budget:

● FOOD. This major item was upgraded by use of a higher standard than used in past budgets. Frozen foods and juices are increasingly preferred. The family group eats out about once a month compared to five times a year in 1959.

● HOUSING. Where earlier budgets covered just renter families, the 1966 study assumed three-fourths of the budget-type families owned their homes.

● AUTO OWNERSHIP. In 1959, rapid transit cities like New York City, Philadelphia and Boston had a low 48 percent of car owner families. These cities and Chicago jumped to 80 percent in 1966. For other areas, auto ownership increased from 76 percent in 1959 to 95 to 100 percent in 1966. The new study linked these trends to greater home ownership and the spread of suburbs where public transport is unavailable.

● HEALTH CARE. With the substantial growth of health insurance coverage under wage and salary contracts since the mid-1950s, the new budget includes surgical as well as hospitalization plans. It counts the family's share of the premium. The new budget provides for fewer visits to the doctor and for more in-hospital visits by the doctor due to the surgical coverage. The new budget also provides for substantially higher standards for dental care, particularly for periodic examinations, teeth straightening, gum treatment and denture work.

● CLOTHING. The 1966 budget reflects a strong trend toward more informal living. The quantity of women's casual shoes tripled while the quantity of dress shoes declined. The husband's clothing budget listed fewer topcoats, heavy wool suits and dress shirts but more jackets, slacks, lightweight suits and casual shoes.

The panel was named by the National Council of Churches through its Committee on Church and Economic Life to study the conflict of interest between the right to strike and the public welfare. It was headed by Dr. Buell Gallagher, president of the College of the City of New York and its members included educators, clergymen and mediators.

The council is a federation of 34 Protestant, Russian and Greek Orthodox churches.

The report, which does not necessarily represent official council policy, is being sent to Pres. Johnson, key cabinet officers, all members of Congress and all governors, mayors of the 50 largest cities, the AFL-CIO, heads of all international unions and a selected list of industrial leaders and churchmen.

"It is hoped," the council said, "that the thinking of the committee will help clarify the issue for policy-makers and the public at large."

In supporting the right to strike, the committee warned that "unions and management can no longer negotiate as though they were the only parties whose interests are at stake."

Discussing compulsory arbitration, the committee noted that both labor and management reject it. The report emphasizes that while some strikes seem to jeopardize the general welfare, especially those against federal, state and municipal bodies, they probably cannot be entirely eliminated.

"Public employes are entitled to the same basic rights as those working for private industry," the committee declared.

The study reports that public opinion is showing increasing resentment against strikes especially those in the fields of public transportation and newspapers. It points out that the public is apt to blame unions alone for work stoppages "whereas management should share the responsibility for them."

The report also cautions that when the government intervenes, it should avoid the temptation to label every dispute an "emergency" and thereby to take action against the strikers.

The committee cited the effectiveness of voluntary arbitration and advises labor and management to seek "new, imaginative patterns of action which protect the legitimate interests of both." In cases where the general welfare actually would be damaged, the committee called up labor "to give serious consideration to voluntarily renouncing the right to strike and on management to match such renunciation by equable assurances and protections."

Head Start Study Proves Fluoridation Helps Teeth

New proof that fluoridation of water reduces tooth decay and subsequent dental costs has been uncovered by a Head Start anti-poverty program in California, the U.S. Public Health Service reported.

It cited an article in Newsletter, the publication of the California Dental Service, which showed the costs of dental care for Head Start children in fluoridated communities was almost two-thirds below the cost for children under the program in non-fluoridated communities.

Specifically, the Newsletter noted, in fluoridated San Francisco and Vallejo the average cost per child patient was $26.35 and $27.77 respectively, compared to costs of $70.01 in Berkeley and $85.85 in San Joaquin, both non-fluoridated.

Dr. Viron L. Diefenbach, director of PHS' division of dental health, said the results reaffirm previous division studies which have revealed that fluoridation can reduce cavities by 65 percent among children.

"The benefits also become life-long assets," he added.

The Rising Danger

WHILE PRES. JOHNSON'S National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders is earnestly at work seeking ways to prevent another summer of rioting in 1968, the coalition-controlled Congress is creating conditions that could result in new explosions in the ghettos.

A broad spectrum of leaders in American life are appearing before the commission with thoughtful proposals to ease or eradicate the conditions that fired and fueled the riots. Many of them, perhaps most outspokenly the AFL-CIO, are calling for strong federal leadership if the crisis is to be confronted and abated.

The Administration has proposed a great number of programs dealing with the basic problems of the cities. Many of them fall short of the actual need, but they are valid proposals that once put into operation could begin to break the back of the problems.

But in Congress, controlled by the "coalition of retreat," in Vice President's Humphrey's words, the entire thrust is to emasculate existing programs, kill off new ones and starve out those that cannot be treated any other way.

LONG-TIME OBSERVERS and reporters of the comings and goings of Congress are visibly shocked by the mood of irresponsibility that has settled over the dominant GOP-Dixiecrat coalition.

The needs of the country have been brushed aside to win political points in the preliminary skirmishing for the 1968 elections.

To compound the situation, liberals normally mobilized to fight the conservative coalition are confused as some zero in on the Viet Nam war and lose sight of the assault by the right at home.

Despite the best efforts of the task force on civil disorders and the proddings of labor and other liberal groups who see the problem in full perspective there is a possibility of new disorders next year on the eve of a national election that could provide the vehicle for rightwing control of the government.

It is this danger—signalled by business and industry groups by a massive assault on basic labor rights—that emerges at this moment to confront progressive forces. To ignore it or underestimate it is to invite an aboutface on every major domestic front as well as in the fight for world peace and freedom.

THE IMMEDIATE problem remains: how to bring the coalition to its senses, to change the prevailing mood in Congress so that a realistic attack on urban crisis can be mounted.

The problem remains also of uniting the labor and liberal and civil rights forces for the 1968 elections to thwart the conservative-reactionary bid to ride to power on a tide of disorder and hate and in the process to dismantle all of the machinery and structures of a progressive society.

Dignity and Equity:

Church Study Finds Strikes Essential to Bargaining, Justice

The following is excerpted from "The Right to Strike and the General Welfare," a study document prepared by a special committee appointed by the Committee on the Church and Economic Life, Division of Christian Life and Mission, National Council of Churches. The study is not an official statement of attitudes or policies of the National Council of Churches.

UNLESS AND UNTIL effective substitute measures for achieving justice and freedom are provided, the right to strike must be recognized as essential. Without the right to strike (or its effective equivalent), the worker is not equal in bargaining power, and collective bargaining becomes a sham where all the power is on the employer's side of the table.

Those who would curtail or eliminate the right to strike must first supply an adequate and effective substitute, an alternative which makes the parties essentially equal in bargaining power and which preserves and protects the freedom of the bargaining process.

The individual who is a slave has little or no influence over the conditions of his employment. He is deprived of the freedom to leave a job and seek other employment no matter how intolerable the conditions. One of the first rights a free society guarantees to its citizens is that of quitting a job and seeking other employment.

For certain individuals working within the large organizations of an industrialized society this simple freedom to quit is sufficient. Highly trained persons such as engineers, technicians, managers, tool-and-die makers may be endowed by their skills with effective bargaining power over against their employers.

For most workers, however, the simple freedom to quit does not ordinarily provide effective bargaining power vis-à-vis the employer. The economic power in the hands of management is formidable: the power to pay wages and the power to cease paying wages by laying off or firing.

Only if workers have economic power of somewhat the same order of magnitude—namely the power collectively to withhold their labor from their employer and thus to bring his operation to a standstill—can management be compelled to listen seriously to its employes at the bargaining table.

Looked at in a somewhat different light, the right to strike is simply the right of any person entering into a contract to decline to sell until he has an agreeable contract with the buyer as to the terms under which he will sell. In a contract negotiation, the workers are acting collectively to seek a satisfactory agreement with management defining the terms under which they will sell their time and labor. Until a mutually satisfactory contract has been agreed upon the workers are under no obligation to contribute their labor, and have the right to uphold it.

It should further be noted that the right to strike has historically been one of the first casualties wherever totalitarian political regimes have come to power.

In sum, the right of collective bargaining, with its ultimate weapon of the strike, has proved to be a significant means of achieving social justice for workers. By placing in the hands of workers sufficient power to counterbalance the power of management, collective bargaining has made possible three basic achievements:

- A measure of equity for workers in the economic benefits of production;
- Enhancement of the freedom and dignity of workers through protection against arbitrary procedures and exploitation on the part of management;
- The expansion of democracy into the economic order through giving workers a voice in some of the policies and decisions of the company, particularly those which most directly affect their lives.

Strikes can be the medium through which significant social advances are introduced into society. For example, a forty-day strike in the steel industry in 1949 resulted in an agreement which included a noncontributory pension plan for workers. Since that time such pension plans have been widely adopted throughout the economy and have proved to be of great value for the nation. They have provided increased security and dignity to countless older citizens, and have strengthened the entire economy by contributing to stable purchasing power.

A common public reaction is to lay the blame for every strike at the doorstep of the union, since it is the union that actually takes the decisive action calling a strike into being. But it should be kept in mind that for every union decision to strike there has been a prior management decision to say "No" to union demands. All too frequently the management decision is not reviewed as critically by the public as is the union decision to strike in assessing the blame for any particular work stoppage.

Meany Tells Advisory Panel:

Good Jobs and Decent Housing Only Cure For Crisis in Cities

The following is excerpted from testimony by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany before the National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders.

MOB VIOLENCE, arson, looting and murder are indefensible in a free society. They are not civil rights demonstrations. They are criminal acts, whose only result will be anarchy on the one hand and worse suppression on the other.

But these desperate acts must be viewed in the context of the conditions that without doubt contribute to civil disorder.

And therefore, we in the AFL-CIO believe that this commission should properly consider not only the acts, but what lies behind them.

Hope for thousands upon thousands in the cities of America today means one thing—a decent job. There is a pressing need for the swift creation of one million new jobs for persons now unemployed or seriously under-employed—good jobs at useful work on needed government or other non-profit projects.

Immediately behind jobs comes housing. It is second, rather than first, only because a regular, earned income is so basic to the pride and dignity of the family breadwinner. But housing—bad housing, unbelievably bad housing, overcrowded by humans and overrun by rats, sweltering in the summer and frigid in winter; dilapidated tenements huddled together, with garbage-strewn alleys, broken steps, peeling walls and stench-ridden halls —was and is a source of urban violence.

It is not just the poor, the deprived, the unemployed who are condemned to live in housing like this. The residents are often families which could afford something better, but who cannot rent or buy in areas outside the ghetto because of racial barriers. So there is a broad, multiple need for action on housing. There must be an injection of new life into public housing, for low-income families. There must be an expansion of the rent-supplement program.

Above all there must be open housing. The right of any American to buy or rent any available home he wants and can afford, on any block in any community, is essential to the genuine achievement of equal rights and equal opportunity in this nation. This too has an application to the matter of urban disorders.

In every aspect of the present urban crisis, it is our firm conviction that the primary responsibility for devising and carrying out remedies rests upon the federal government.

THE URBAN CRISIS recognizes no state lines. The great and growing metropolitan areas, which will soon encompass 70 percent of the nation's people, have no respect for the boundaries of history. Bergen and Hudson counties, in New Jersey, are just as much if not more a part of the New York city complex than Staten Island. Gary and East Chicago, Indiana, are surely as closely linked with Chicago, as say, Evanston, Ill. And these are only two examples out of many.

But beyond this purely physical fact is an even more persuasive one. If justice and domestic tranquility are to be achieved, in the spirit of the preamble of our federal constitution, they must be achieved in full and equal measure in every state and only the federal government can assure that result.

The federal government must be the employer of last resort and the landlord of last resort. This is the only foundation upon which an effective urban program can be built.

This applies to the labor movement's own efforts, which have been far more diverse and extensive than is generally known.

Let's start with housing, since it is of such great importance. A breakdown of housing projects undertaken by labor unions lists 23 projects for the elderly, or the elderly and handicapped, built under Sections 202 or 231 of the federal housing act, that were sponsored by AFL-CIO organizations.

Our unions have also sponsored more than a score of rent supplement projects, including the very first one in the nation, in Pasco, Wash. At least 7,000 units have been built through union sponsorship under other sections of the act.

THE LABOR MOVEMENT has naturally taken a keen interest in job training, especially the training of the disadvantaged poor, with special emphasis on young members of minority groups. AFL-CIO organizations are direct contractors for Manpower Development & Training Act programs in scores of cities. At least eight international unions are sponsoring national programs related to job opportunities in their own industry or trade. The 11-state AFL-CIO Appalachian Council is undertaking on-the-job training for 3,000 of the disadvantaged unemployed, and is coupling this with basic education where necessary.

The AFL-CIO Civil Rights Dept. and the Building & Construction Trades Dept., in cooperation with local building trades councils, the Dept. of Labor and private groups such as the Urban League, has established "out-reach" programs focused on recruiting apprentices from minority groups.

Although hundreds of apprentices have been enrolled, the total result is still disappointing—in large part because so many young people from the urban ghettos simply do not have the educational background necessary to meet the demands of apprenticeship training today.

The range of trade union participation in the Office of Economic Opportunity—the central agency for the war on poverty—is simply too great to be summarized here. In this area as in housing, I was astonished at how much we are doing.

But I mention this not to seek credit for the labor movement, but to stress once more a point that cannot be stressed too often—the need for federal leadership of the whole campaign to overcome urban problems. Despite everything we in the labor movement can do, or that enlightened private industry can do, the problems will otherwise defy solution.

Festering Problems:

Public Apathy Slows Progress Towards Solving Urban Crisis

AN END to public apathy is essential to meeting and solving America's urban crisis, organized labor's top economist declared in a network radio interview.

"The public in general has been apathetic" about many basic problems that have "developed and festered" over many years, said Nathaniel Goldfinger, director of the AFL-CIO's Dept. of Research. As a result, efforts to overcome them "got started very late" and have been plagued by inexperience and lack of funds, he said. Goldfinger appeared on Labor News Conference, aired Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m. EDT on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

The crisis grew out of the "radical social and economic changes" of rapid urban growth, automation and technological development over the last 25 years, he said, and has been intensified by "the tragic history of Negro slavery, segregation and discrimination."

Goldfinger said that creation of jobs for the unemployed and seriously under-employed should form the core of the attack on the urban crisis.

He called for a "a real step-up in the development of community facilities" ranging from water supplies and highways to parks and playgrounds, and a "massive housing program of new construction and rehabilitation" keyed to "low-cost public housing for low-income families." That kind of program, he said, would build new job opportunities and narrow the gap of needed public services.

NEITHER STATES, cities nor private enterprise "can solve the problem alone," he said.

"It needs federal action and federal funds, with plenty of local initiative" from state and local governments and from private groups, he declared.

Reporters questioning Goldfinger on the AFL-CIO produced public affairs program were Kenneth Crawford, contributing editor and columnist for Newsweek magazine, and Sam Sharkey labor specialist for the Newhouse Newspapers.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

WHAT WITH HIPPIES running all over the place and pot, hashish, marijuana and dope becoming household words if not quite yet household staples, you'd think that Congress would be getting worried about the future of the nation.

Instead, it is getting more and more wrapped up in finding ways to kill many Great Society programs in the name of patriotism and economy and striking out in blind anger at workers in the war on poverty by refusing to include them in a general pay boost for federal workers.

So far, Congress has shown little realization of the importance of such matters as education, housing, job training and job expansion. If it did it would have rushed to clear these measures through the legislative process. Instead it is hemming and hawing to the point where vital appropriations are being delayed, old programs held up and new ones sabotaged.

Overall the House wants to cut at least $5 billion out of non-defense spending, which means mostly public services and similar domestic programs. Specifically, the economy heat is on most fiercely in those areas that are vital to the future of the country. The elementary and secondary school bill has been adopted by the House but is still in committee in the Senate. It is still only in the authorization stage so that appropriations must still be made. How much they will be cut is not yet known, but given the temper of the House especially, cut they will.

The House is still battling over the Administration's anti-poverty bill and there have been threats by conservatives, both Democratic and Republican, that the whole program will be killed unless they get their way.

House vindictiveness against Sargent Shriver and his whole operation was shown when it voted to deny wage boosts to poverty workers, an act that brought the bitter retort of Shriver that "the poor have always gotten the dirty end of the stick . . . now even those working hardest to help the poor have gotten the same treatment."

Even so non-controversial a program as job training designed to help the unemployed find work and to increase their skills in a society that makes ever increasing demands for skilled workers has been caught in the economy shuffle.

WRANGLING between the House and Senate has held up Labor Dept. appropriations and those of the Dept. of Health, Education and Welfare. As a result, these departments and their programs will be virtually marking time, perhaps until late November, before they know what they can count on.

Yet all these measures are vital to the future of the country. They involve, notably, that section of the population that is steadily sinking deeper and deeper into a morass of despair and desperation.

The unemployed, the poor, are a deadly drain, moral and economic, on the country itself. Not only has their plight cost the country billions in riots, welfare payments, unemployment compensation and similar social costs, but the constructive work they could be doing is being lost day after day.

The GI Bill of Rights and its educational provisions were of immense cost to the nation. Yet, the return has been incalculable not only in the personal achievements and enrichment of the individuals concerned, but in the huge profit they have brought the country in the form of trained workers adding immeasurably to the national wealth.

The same can be true of the programs that now are hanging fire in Congress, threatened with emasculation, if not death. They, too, represent a vital factor in the growth of the nation.

It is tragic that a nation which takes pride in investing billions in efforts to reach the moon, to build mighty dams, to launch a TVA, to develop its great oil resources, should be so hesitant and niggardly in investing in its human resources.

It is not a budget that Congress is wrangling over. It is the national future.

APATHY about problems that have "developed and festered" for years hampers the drive to solve America's urban crisis, AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nathaniel Goldfinger (center) said on Labor News Conference. Questioning him were Sam Sharkey (left), Newhouse Newspapers, and Kenneth Crawford, Newsweek magazine. The AFL-CIO produced interview is aired weekly by Mutual radio.

How to Buy:

Is 'Bif' Really Better Than 'Gah' And Air Tastier Than Bread?

By Sidney Margolius

SEVERAL YEARS AGO the Wall Street Journal reported a test made by DuPont of why women buy one brand instead of another. The marketing experts showed a group of women slides of landscapes interspersed with occasional nonsense syllables such as "Bif" or "Gah." Then the women were told to take a free pair of stockings from boxes labeled with these made-up names. Twice as many women chose from the box marked with the nonsense syllable they had seen most often.

What the test showed was that many people can be manipulated into choosing one product instead of another simply by repetition of a name or symbol. This also is being proved every day by the fact that the most heavily advertised brands of cleaning products, household medicines such as aspirin, and toiletries such as mouthwash, sell best even when they are virtually identical with lower priced brands.

In an era of self-service shopping, women who do not use what information is available to them for selecting best buys even can be led to buy a particular brand just by a picture on a package or even its color.

For example, merely putting the picture of a spoon on the Betty Crocker cakemix package helped make that brand the leading seller, Louis Cheskin, one of the most successful "motivational researchers," reveals in his recently-published Secrets of Marketing Success.

In his book Cheskin says that the choices people make are not motivated by logic "but we seek rational reasons for making them." According to him, we think we are buying useful quality but actually we are attracted by the styling. Sometimes we are aware of this but we cover up; "we try to make ourselves appear rational."

Cheskin doesn't mention this, but a lot of mother's buying now is dominated by children who in turn are dominated by television. This kind of forced buying, sometimes accompanied by screaming in the supermarket aisles, is especially noticeable nowadays among such products as cereals; bubble bath preparations; soft drinks, and the new milk shake products sold with musical shakers.

There is even less reason for women to be manipulated by the color and design of a package than by their children. All they need do is take the time to read the lists of ingredients and net weights to see what one brand actually provides compared to another.

THE EVIDENCE IS that many women do not take the time to see what they are buying. One of the signs is the ballooning popularity of "balloon" bread. This is bread which contains more air per pound. Baking companies achieve this by using one pound of ingredients in a 1½-pound pan.

Yet, despite the fact that in some markets balloon bread costs as much as five cents more per pound than the standard loaf, it is now the leading seller in stores that stock it, the U.S. Agriculture Department's Farm Index reports.

This is a shocker, because there have been a number of warnings about balloon bread by consumer authorities and in this column. Moreover, all that housewives have to do is look at the weight marked on the wrapper and compare the price per pound with other breads.

We know people are worried about fresh air but it won't do any good to try to buy it in the form of bread. To our knowledge, only two states—Oregon and Arizona—require that balloon bread be labeled as such.

Send Your Next Union Bulletin In A Perfumed, Pink Envelope

By Jane Goodsell

TODAY'S MAIL included two envelopes which so piqued my curiosity that I opened them right then and there. (My usual method of dealing with the mail is to toss half of it into the wastepaper basket and to leave the remainder on the mantel in the hope that someone else might summon the energy to struggle through the bills, bulletins and meeting notices.) But these two I opened. Right away.

The first envelope was imprinted with the letterhead of our church, and I'll confess that this in itself wouldn't have guaranteed its immediate opening. (The same mail included two other church communiques which I haven't yet got around to reading.) But this envelope snagged my attention because rubber-stamped on it in big black letters was the directive: IMPORTANT! PLEASE OPEN IMMEDIATELY!

The other envelope, having no return address, kept its origins a secret. But since it was addressographed and imprinted with a bulk mailing permit, I'd normally have figured it wasn't worth opening.

What changed its fate was one word. Printed in large brown letters on the envelope was the word: PROSTITUTION!

Now, I don't think I'm any more interested in prostitution than the average person, but I think the average person would open an envelope with that word printed on it. And doubtless the publishers of Fact magazine think so, too, because the envelope contained a special introductory offer to the one magazine which, as they put it, has not prostituted itself to Madison Avenue.

The interesting thing about those two envelopes is the reasoning behind them: the clear-eyed acceptance of the fact that most mail is tossed away, unopened. Unless the envelope so provokes the recipient's curiosity that he can't not open it, the contents—however fascinating—won't be read.

A number of shock techniques have been used: COUPONS ENCLOSED! FIND CHECK INSIDE! YOU MAY ALREADY HAVE WON $20,000! Effective as these gimmicks once were, they no longer rate ah-ha's but ho-hums. We have learned to our sorrow that the check for $2.95 is negotiable only when applied on a $150 course of dancing lessons, and we know too that our chances of winning $20,000 are roughly 2,907,768 to 1.

SO WHAT'S NEEDED are some new ideas. Because I have a passion for public service, I have dreamed up a few suggestions for envelope come-on's which almost nobody could resist:

An invitation-sized envelope, hand stamped and handwritten, preferably in a round feminine script. While it isn't possible to enclose a voluminous amount of promotional material in a small envelope, people never toss them away unopened.

An envelope mailed from a foreign country or sent airmail special delivery. Expensive, yes. But those little packets containing free samples of handcream and those four-color brochures would at least receive a viewing.

A handwritten envelope marked PERSONAL. Guaranteed to ensure that everyone in the family will make a point of finding out what's it. The handwritten part is essential. An addressographed envelope marked PERSONAL has no appeal whatever. Everyone knows without opening it that it contains a deodorant advertisement.

Deliberate Loss:

Wealthy Buy Farms For Tax Advantage

IF YOU'RE WEALTHY and want to get out of paying taxes, go out and buy a farm.

Tax records made public by the Internal Revenue Service show the amazing extent to which rich, off-farm investors are using "farms" to avoid paying federal income taxes.

The National Farmers Union has analyzed these records, which cover 1965 income, and has concluded that "these so-called farms must be incredibly inefficient."

Nearly all the individuals with the biggest incomes ($500,000 a year and up) show losses on their farm activities. This is strong evidence that they are deliberately using "farms" to get into lower tax brackets.

Angus McDonald, national research director of Farmers Union, said this denies the government its rightful share of taxes on income and helps drive prices down so that family farm operators are forced out of business.

This is the record from individual income tax returns, broken down by income groups, on "farm" operations:

Millionaires—of the 119 engaged in farming, only 16 reported a profit on their income tax returns.

$500,000 to $1,000,000—of the 202 in farming, 32 showed a net profit and 170 showed a loss.

$100,000 to $500,00—of 3,914 involved in farming, 1,040 showed a profit and 2,874 reported a loss.

$50,000 to $100,000—of 12,398 involved in farming, 4,974 showed a profit and 7,424 reported a loss.

Put another way, more than half the individuals earning $50,000 a year or more who had farming operations showed a loss on their income tax returns.

CITY SLICKERS involved in this so-called "farming" activity are getting plenty of advice and encouragement from business-oriented publications and financial services. A big spread in a recent issue of Business Week is an example.

"Thinking of buying a farm for weekending now and retirement later?" the magazine asks its readers. "Handle it right and you can have a good long-term investment, tax benefits—and even some current income."

It advises its business-oriented readers to borrow money from either an insurance company or the Federal Land Bank but cautions them that they should try to get a "sale on contract" from the seller (usually a farmer giving up).

"A small down payment and mortgage installments let the seller spread the tax on his profit," the magazine says. "As a buyer you can pay less outright—yet get all benefits of appreciation and full depreciation."

It sums up the advice and counsel with a few words about the federal tax boys.

"If you can demonstrate to the Internal Revenue Service that your farm is a business, not just a hobby, you get all the tax advantages . . . but you must show that profit is your motive," it says.

"Repairs and maintenance are deductible as business expenses. You can depreciate improvements such as tractors and buildings. And livestock used for breeding can also be written off."

Finally, it notes, some farm machinery and capital improvements qualify for the 7 percent investment credit, and in addition those losses on farming can offset other taxable income.

But the working man still pays with withholding taxes.

House Rollcall Vote to Slash Budget

The House voted 238-164 on Oct. 18 to force Pres. Johnson to reduce non-war spending by an estimated $8 billion, forcing heavy slashes in school aid, public health and anti-poverty programs.

The AFL-CIO termed the action "absolute irresponsibility." Wrong votes (W) for the cut were cast by 171 Republicans and 67 Democrats. Right votes (R) against it were cast by 155 Democrats and 9 Republicans. Other symbols: PR—paired right; PW—paired wrong; A—absent and not paired. Numerals show districts; AL—at large.

Billions Involved:

Public's Stake Key Issue In Oil Shale Controversy

The largest energy resource in the world lies under the surface of the rugged Upper Colorado Basin covering portions of Colorado, Utah and Wyoming. The treasure is oil shale.

"The emerging question," an article in the October issue of the American Federationist emphasizes, "is whether this energy storehouse will be developed and controlled to benefit the nation or enrich a handful of corporations."

The article, written by George Taylor of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research, is titled, "The Public's Stake in Oil Shale." It analyzes the extent to which this "stake" has been determined and the mounting threat of a "shale monopoly."

In addition, Taylor focuses on the history of oil shale development in the U.S. and other countries, methods and problems in processing it and the AFL-CIO's oil shale policy.

Responds to Heat

Oil shale — a limestone rock formed over millions of years by the consolidation of clay, mud or silt—contains a waxlike substance called kerogen. Heated to a temperature of 800 degrees or more, it melts and gives off liquid oil.

The Upper Colorado oil shale area located in northwestern Colorado and extending into western Utah and eastern Wyoming comprises an area of 5.1 million acres. It is known as the Green River Formation.

Geologists say it holds the richest shale deposits in the world. A parcel of land of no more than 5,000 acres in these deposits could yield 1.25 billion barrels of oil—one-third of the total U.S. consumption in 1966 and worth $3.75 billion at 1966 prices.

Estimates are that the "energy potential" of the formation is greater than the nation's combined reserves of coal, liquid petroleum and natural gas. If economic methods of processing are achieved it may be worth $2.5 trillion.

Although 80 percent of the oil shale potential is owned by the U.S. and is found beneath public land administered by the Dept. of Interior, Taylor describes how there has been a "massive filing of claims" on the formation.

After World War I, major oil companies got clear title to more than 300,000 acres in the formation during an "intense but short-lived" oil shale boom. Some 750,000 other acres were patented under claims still in question.

The boom subsided and there was only sporadic interest in oil shale over the next four decades. However, oil companies descended on the formation "like an avalanche" in 1966. They filed claims that tied up 1.4 million acres before Interior Sec. Stuart F. Udall issued a "stop order" in January, 1967.

Although these claims were located for dawsonite—a source of aluminum, Taylor points out, "it appears more than likely that some claims were filed in hope of getting control of the oil shale deposits, and not to develop the dawsonite."

Back in 1963, the AFL-CIO called for a "federal yardstick" program to protect the public interest in oil shale development and avoid monopoly control. It urged Udall to appoint a broad-based committee to develop an oil shale policy.

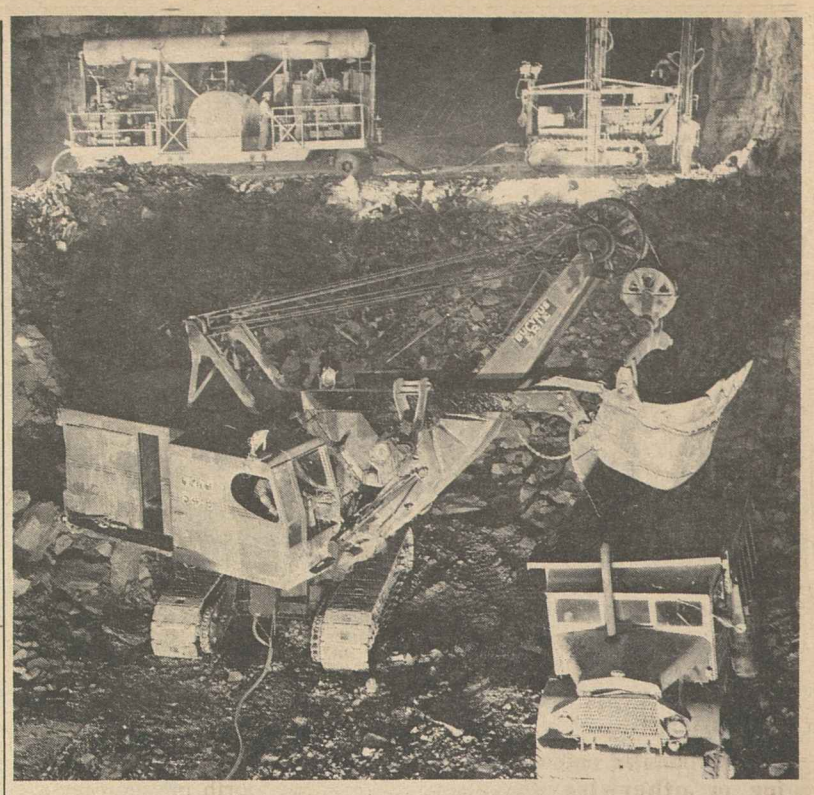
Udall later appointed such a board. In a 1965 report its members split. Some proposed strong public-interest protections for oil shale. Others were for turning over development to private industry. A commission set up by Congress also is studying the oil shale issue and will submit its recommendations.

Earlier this year Udall advanced a program aimed at full-scale commercial leasing on the oil shale lands of the Green River. He followed it with some proposed regulations to govern leasing. Last month, he announced that the results of a department study on oil shale policy will be completed in January 1968.

Meanwhile, at Senate Interior committee hearings in February, the AFL-CIO said it strongly opposed commercial leasing of oil shale lands "before the major problems of public interest protection, technology and conservation are solved."

The federation, conservation, consumer and farm groups have stressed that other problems must be solved before oil shale is mined: There must be safeguards against excessive releases of radiation, decisions to protect other minerals in the deposits and protection for wildlife and resources.

As Taylor concludes, "This nation must be alerted to an understanding of the issues at stake and the future control of one of the richest resources belonging to the American people."



SKILLS OF men and machines are wedded to mine shale and tap the rich reservoir of oil. Still to be resolved is whether the nation or a few big corporations will profit from the vast resources uncovered on federally-owned lands.

Scouting Magazine Hails Labor's Contributions

Scouting in America looks to union members for help and finds "a strength of response that is quietly given but difficult to equal," William Moody, Boy Scouts liaison with AFL-CIO Community Services, observes in the October issue of Scouting magazine.

Moody—who as a youth was an Eagle Scout himself—cites a number of examples "of the effort unions and union members are willing to put into Scouting." Among them:

- Sharon, Pa., members of building trades unions donated their time during the 1966-67 winter to erect an administration building at Scout Camp Hank Forker.
- Twelve union locals in Colorado provided the labor to build the entire 400-acre San Isabel Scout Ranch near Pueblo. The project included 11 campsites, powerlines, a storage building, a health lodge and 2 miles of road.

Now the unions are pledged to build additional camp facilities as soon as funds are available. Their only qualification for volunteer work is that no supplier make a profit on materials. The value of the labor to date has been estimated at more than $100,000.

- The Honolulu building trades council contributed labor valued at $180,000 to develop a Scout camp.

Moody also lists examples of union locals contributing cash gifts to various Scout councils throughout the nation. In Chicago, more than 100 unions donated $183,000 to a program that expanded Scouting for poor boys and those physically handicapped.

He describes union sponsorship of camp scholarship programs, Cub Scout packs, Boy Scout troops and Explorer posts.

Last year it was estimated that AFL-CIO affiliates sponsored about 250 units across the nation in the three categories. Moody further reports that a survey has found that 25 percent of the more than 1.4 million adult leaders in Scouting are union members.

While "exact figures are hard to come by" workers belonging to unions contributed an estimated $12 million to Scouting in 1966 through union promoted support of united funds alone, he notes.

This amounts to approximately one-third of all the money Scouting received from such federated campaigns.

But unionists' financial contributions—"as important as they are"—cannot be equated with the even more important contribution by workers "of time and service" to Scouting, he adds.

And "labor's gift of labor" for Scout projects has a greater worth than any dollar value, he concludes, "for when a man gives his labor he gives of himself—and that is the foundation on which Scouting is built."

Fair Employment Unit Opens Job Gates

The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission reports that some 1,463 full-time job opportunities for minorities have resulted from 14 projects in 13 states funded with $700,000 in EEOC grants.

The projects help seek out full-time openings with major employers in localities or states. Negroes, Latin-Americans and American Indians have been placed in jobs.

Group Practice Needs Prepayment Plan Links

Group medical practice has grown almost threefold since 1959 but there is a great need for linking group plans with prepayment financing, a Harvard medical authority reported to a National Conference on Private Health in Washington.

Jerome Pollack, associate dean for medical care planning, said that surveys show that medical groups increased from 1,547 in 1959 to 4,287 in 1966, and that the number of full-time doctors in private group practice doubled over the period, from 12,620 to 25,499.

The proportion of all physicians engaged in private group practice increased from 8 to 15.6 percent over the same seven years, Pollack said.

He foresaw a "very great potential for the continuing growth" of group practice plans, observing that they are being "widely accepted" by the public and "broadly embraced" by doctors as well, particularly those just entering practice.

But Pollack added only a small minority are affiliated with prepayment plans.

Combination Stressed

He stressed that the combination of group practice plans with prepayment is "increasingly necessary" if these plans are to bring improved benefits at controlled costs.

Pollack was one of a number of medical experts who submitted papers to the conference called by the Health, Education & Welfare Dept. and attended by some 60 representatives of medical and hospital professions, insurance companies, labor, management and state governments.

Participants included AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Bert Seidman, who served as a conference adviser; Richard Shoemaker of the Social Security Dept.; Leonard Lesser of the Industrial Union Dept., and a number of representatives of individual unions.

Conference panels discussed contributions that can be made by private health insurance plans toward bringing down the rising cost of medicine and expanding available medical facilities.

HEW Sec. John W. Gardner underscored both objectives by pointing out that private insurance plans must "explore the possibility of more comprehensive protection that will cover alternatives as a supplement to in-patient hospital care."

"There is need to encourage greater use of less-costly treatment available through such means as physician offices, group practice clinics, hospital out-patient departments, and nursing homes and home health services," he pointed out.

Residual Fees Hike Pay of Screen Actors

Hollywood, Calif.—The Screen Actors Guild reported that three "little" words in the union's contract with motion picture and television producers now produce nearly half the average actors's yearly earnings.

The words are "use and re-use" and they add up to $51 million a year in residual fees for TV commercial announcements and $9 million from old television shows, plus $1.5 million for TV films reshown abroad—a total of $51.5 million out of the $100 to $115 million a year that SAG members earn under Guild contracts.

The system of residual fees started in the radio industry with payment to actors of 100 percent of their minimum salaries for rebroadcasts of a program. It spread to TV on a small scale, and expanded in 1953 after the first strike in SAG history up to that time.

Management voiced loud objections to the idea that it should continue paying actors after their employment was over but the practice made sense to the performer who kept seeing his image on the screen, long after his salary had stopped.

Last year, earnings from residual fees for TV commercials alone were almost as large as the total earnings performers received in the film industry before TV.

The union pointed out, however, that many of its 17,000 paid-up members do not share equally in TV windfalls. Only 1,541 SAG members earned $15,000 or more last year. Below that figure were 750 earning $10,000 to $15,000; 1,640 paid $5,000 to $10,000; 6,232 who received $1,000 to $5,000, and many others who earned less than $1,000.

The top bracket was shared by 117 actors whose incomes were above $100,000.

Senate Rejects House Budget Slashing

Civil Rights Bill Wins Close Committee Vote

By an 8-7 vote, six northern Democrats and two Republicans forced Judiciary Committee approval of the Administration's proposal to make it a federal crime to interfere by force or intimidation with persons working for civil rights. A somewhat weaker bill passed the House earlier this year.

By the same single-vote margin, the committee rejected amendments by Sen. Sam J. Ervin, Jr. (D-N.C.) which would have:

- Prohibited unions from fining or otherwise disciplining members who cross their union's picket line to work as strikebreakers. This would have nullified a recent Supreme Court decision which held that "the power to fine or expel strikebreakers is essential if the union is to be an effective bargaining agent."
- Imposed sweeping restrictions on "violence" in labor disputes, so worded as to amount to federal sanction for sharply restricting picketing.

Voting with Ervin for the anti-labor amendments were the southern Democrats, including Committee Chairman James O. Eastland (D-Miss.), and three Republicans, including Senate GOP Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen.

To break a tie, Republican Hugh Scott (Pa.) came flying back from England to vote with the Administration.

As sent to the Senate floor—where it will be open to amendments—it protects persons engaged in voting, public education, federal services, job-hunting or jury duty, using interstate transportation and public accommodations, and meeting in peaceful assembly in pursuit of federal rights.

Two-Front Battle

House conservatives mounted a two-front budget-cutting battle. They attacked a series of money bills carrying funds for government departments and programs. And they continued to demand that the President personally cut back the programs launched in the heavily-Democratic 89th Congress.

The directive to the President had been added by the House to a routine resolution permitting government agencies which have not yet received their appropriations to continue to pay their employes and meet expenses through mid-November.

The Senate rejected this directive to the President by a 48-39 vote. It turned down, 46-43, a proposal to force him to cut $1 billion. And finally it voted down, 45-39, a "sense of Congress" declaration proposed by Dirksen that spending should be cut, whether by the President or by Congress. The next step is up to a House-Senate conference.

On the appropriations for model cities and rent supplements, House and Senate conferees were faced with sharply-differing bills.

The House had voted to appropriate only $237 million of the $661 million requested by Pres. Johnson to rehabilitate entire slum neighborhoods.

The Senate had increased the House bill to $537 million.

Conferees compromised on $312 million, considerably closer to the House version.

On rent supplements, federal subsidies to make up the difference between one-fourth of the income of poor families and rental costs in modest apartments built by non-profit agencies, the House voted to let the program die, rejecting all new appropriations.

The Senate voted the full $40 million requested by the President. The conference compromise was $10 million.

Even this was attacked by the conservative coalition. They sought to repudiate the conference agreement, but fell 14 votes short. The compromise was accepted on a 198-184 roll call.

Another House-Senate battle was in the making over the financing of the Dickey Lincoln power project in Maine, intended to make low-cost power available in an area where private utility rates are among the highest in the nation. Private utility lobbyists have fought the project bitterly.

The Administration had asked $1.6 million to complete the planning stages of the project. The House last July voted against any funds; the Senate later approved the full amount sought by the Administration. House and Senate conferees agreed on $837,000.

The House, under the prodding of Rep. Robert N. Giaimo (D-Conn.) voted down the conference agreement, 232-162. House-Senate conferees will make a new try at reaching an agreement. The project is strongly supported by New England labor.

Despite concessions made to conservative critics by the House Education & Labor Committee, a major battle appears certain when a committee-approved anti-poverty bill reaches the House floor.

The bill would continue the anti-poverty program another two years and would leave direction of the program with the Office of Economic Opportunity. The committee majority voted down conservative attempts to "spin-off" the programs to old-line agencies and drastically cut back the spending ceiling.

However, the committee went along with demands that public officials be given control over the key community action portion of the program—the attempt to bring innovation and leadership into war on poverty.

Community action programs would be established by states, counties or cities and public officials would be given one-third membership on local community action boards. The poor and community groups would each have one-third representation.

The House bill also contains a labor-opposed provision requiring local programs to put up at least 10 percent of the cost of the program in cash, with another 10 percent in services. The Senate-passed anti-poverty bill continues 90 percent federal financing, with the 10 percent local contribution payable in services.

These concessions did not satisfy the conservative critics, however, and the Republican leadership is planning a major floor fight over the legislation.

Board Postpones IUD Convention

The executive board of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. has voted to postpone the IUD convention scheduled for Nov. 15-16, 1967.

The postponement was recommended by the executive body because UAW Pres. Walter P. Reuther, also IUD president, will be preoccupied with contract negotiations at the time the convention was scheduled to be held.

New dates for the convention will be announced by the department's executive board when they are set.

PROGRESS at home and abroad is being endangered by a "coalition of retreat" in Congress, Vice Pres. Hubert Humphrey told delegates to a COPE conference in the nation's capital. Looking on is AFL-CIO COPE Dir. Al Barkan.

Humphrey Tells COPE Coalition Threatens U.S.

A revived "coalition of retreat" is endangering America's progress at home and abroad, Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey told a COPE conference on the 1968 elections.

The job next year, he told the conference delegates in Washington, is to defeat the conservative coalition which has as its "hard core" the Republican Party.

The GOP-Dixiecrat coalition had been outnumbered in 1964, the vice president said, only to regain its power in 1966. "Many of us had not realized until now how serious the implications" of the 1966 election results would be.

Humphrey charged that the coalition is opposed to every progressive piece of domestic legislation and is now using its power to withhold or cut appropriations to starve and subvert Great Society programs.

"I ask you to stand up for the programs, for the policies, for the President that have moved this nation forward as it has never moved before," Humphrey declared, adding: "Pres. Lyndon Johnson is the best friend the American labor movement has."

The vice president reviewed the problem of the Administration's tax bill, pointing out that if taxes had not been cut twice in the past three years the government would have an additional $24 billion in revenue.

He argued that if the tax surcharge is not adopted inflation and higher prices will exact a higher toll of the American family's income.

Humphrey stressed also the coalition's pressure for drastic cuts in federal spending in critical domestic programs of education, health, opportunity, the war on poverty.

He described the attacks on the Kennedy Round trade negotiations and the assault on foreign aid programs as evidence of a new form of isolationism, along with the new arguments for withdrawal from Viet Nam. The objective of the U.S. in Viet Nam, he emphasized, is to prevent World War III, "to stop aggression before it becomes a pattern of international conduct and to allow the nations of Asia to develop freely.

Order Issued On Job Rights For Women

Pres. Johnson has issued an executive order setting forth enforcement procedures to protect women against discrimination in federal employment and in private firms operating under federal contracts.

The order extends to alleged sex discrimination the same review and appeal machinery that is already in force against discrimination because of race, creed, color or national origin under a previously issued executive order.

The newest order authorizes the Civil Service Commission, beginning Nov. 13, 1967, to hear complaints of federal employes who believe they have been discriminated against in hiring or promotion because of their sex. CSC is empowered to halt such discrimination.

Beginning Oct. 13, 1968, the Labor Dept. will be authorized to probe similar complaints from employes of federal contractors or subcontractors. The department will be able to cancel contracts where it finds such discrimination.

CSC Chairman John W. Macy Jr., at a White House briefing on the new executive order, confirmed that about one-third of complaints received about unfair practices in federal employment comes from women.

Most of these, he pointed out, deal with alleged discrimination in promotions rather than in initial employment.

Labor Leaders Join Unit for LBJ on War

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and three federation vice presidents have joined former Presidents Truman and Eisenhower and a broad cross-section of American leaders in a new committee strongly endorsing the Administration's policies in Viet Nam.

Joining Meany in the non-partisan Citizens Committee for Peace with Freedom in Viet Nam were AFL-CIO Vice Presidents Joseph A. Beirne, John H. Lyons and Louis Stulberg. They are the presidents of the Communications Workers, Iron Workers and Ladies' Garment Workers, respectively.

Heading the new committee is former Democratic Sen. Paul H. Douglas and Gen. Omar N. Bradley, World War II leader in Europe and a former chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, as co-chairmen.

A long list of scientists, educators, authors, former cabinet members and military leaders make up the membership.

The group declared that it is the spokesman for "the great silent center" in the U.S. representing "the understanding, independent and responsible men and women who have consistently opposed rewarding international aggressors from Adolph Hitler to Mao Tse-tung."

The committee's policy statement gave unqualified support to the Administration's policies and conduct of the war in Viet Nam. "America cannot afford to let naked aggression or the suppression of freedom go unchallenged," the statement said. "We are opposed to surrender, however camouflaged," the committee said, adding that it was opposed also to "unnecessarily risking a general war in Asia or a nuclear war in the world."

The makeup of the committee, the statement stressed, is national and non-partisan, composed of Democrats, Republicans and independents and of liberals, moderates and conservatives drawn from all sections and all sectors of the country.

The committee specifically affirmed and supported the "right of opponents of our national policy to offer alternatives consistent with our national interest and security. However, we are concerned that the voices of dissent have, thus far, received attention far out of proportion to their actual numbers."

The committee's basic objective is to "make sure that the majority voice of America is heard—loud and clear — so that Peking and Hanoi will not mistake the strident voices of some dissenters for American discouragement and a weakening of will."

AFL-CIO Urges Congress To Probe Auto Insurance

A direct congressional investigation of the auto insurance industry would be the speediest and "most fruitful way" to obtain information on which to base reform legislation, the AFL-CIO declared.

In a letter to House Judiciary Committee Chairman Emanuel Celler expressing gratification over a subcommittee staff report urging further investigation of auto insurance, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller urged committee action.

Biemiller pointed out that the AFL-CIO has been concerned with rising auto insurance rates and various discriminatory practices of the industry, citing a copy of a resolution adopted by the Executive Council in February stressing the need for action.

The Judiciary Committee staff report termed the performance of the automobile insurance industry "unsatisfactory." State regulation, the report declared is "inadequate" in many states.

Labor Dept. Survey Shows:

State Jobless Benefit Laws Trail Proposed Standards

State unemployment compensation laws are not providing adequate protection for the jobless. There has been little improvement and even some deterioration in the laws over the past two years.

The conclusions emerge from an article in the September issue of the Labor Dept.'s Unemployment Insurance Review, written by Daniel P. Riordan of the Bureau of Employment Security.

Riordan believes his analysis of state unemployment benefit legislation since 1965 should be of "great interest in answering the question" of whether federal legislation is needed to improve the federal-state jobless compensation program.

In 1965, the Administration advanced legislation to set federal standards for unemployment benefits and extend their coverage. In 1966, the House and Senate passed weakened but differing versions of the bill. Congress adjourned without any legislation.

This year, Sen. Eugene J. McCarthy (D-Minn.) and 12 other senators are sponsoring a strong federal standards bill. It incorporates major improvements long sought by the AFL-CIO.

The McCarthy bill would:

● Extend jobless coverage under the state laws to millions of workers not presently covered—those working for small employers, state and local governments, large farms and non-profit establishments, among others.

● Require the benefit ceiling initially to equal at least 50 percent of the statewide weekly wage, raising to two-thirds of average pay, for a minimum of 26 weeks; provide extended benefits for long-term unemployed; raise the payroll wage base on which employers are taxed; limit causes for disqualification of workers and ease requalification rights.

As Riordan notes, opponents of the legislation claim that states can be relied upon to keep pace with benefit needs. In 1966, some members of Congress argued "wait and see." The need for improvements, however, was generally conceded.

So what has been happening?

Ten states have extended coverage of unemployment benefits since 1965 but eight others have actually added new restrictions on them. Workers added to coverage in all states "may be estimated at less than 150,000," Riordan points out.

By comparison, McCarthy's bill would add 10 million and even the House and Senate passed bills of 1966, as drastically amended as they were, would have added 3.5 and 2.3 million workers, respectively.

In 1965, only three states had benefits covering farm workers, four covered non-profit firms and 10 covered employes of state and local governments. Not a single additional state has since extended coverage in any one of those categories.

Twenty-four states increased their maximum weekly jobless benefit since 1965, but only four brought it up to the proposed federal standard of being equal to at least 50 percent of the statewide weekly wage. In all, only 20 states meet the standard.

Although six states extended their benefit-duration provisions over the past two years, none of the six came up to the proposed federal requirement.

The number of states which do not meet a proposed federal minimum "yardstick" for workers to qualify for benefits has actually increased by two to 24 since 1965, Riordan reports.

There was progress, only slight, toward conforming with federal legislation's provision to protect workers' rights to requalify for benefits after a period of work followed by a further layoff. The 20 states not up to this requirement in 1965 has been reduced to 17.

Extended Benefits

A significant section of the proposed federal bill would require states to provide up to 26 weeks of extended jobless benefits where workers had a previous steady job history. Federal funds would help pay these benefits.

While several states expanded provisions for extended benefits since 1965, Riordan finds that "none of the nine state programs in existence in this area even approaches" the standard set in the federal legislation.

Riordan points to a deterioration in moving toward a provision of the federal legislation to prevent cancellation or reductions in benefits under state laws. Where eight states failed to meet the provision in 1965, the figure is now nine.

Also, he finds that there are still 39 states—as there were in 1965—that do not meet a proposed federal standard covering benefits for workers who are taking some form of approved job training.

Four states increased their wage base on which employers are taxed for jobless benefits since 1959, according to Riordan, "but very few states . . . have approached the levels proposed in any of the federal bills."

In noting that Congress will want to "scrutinize" the states record in the unemployment compensation field since 1965, Riordan notes that all state legislatures met in the two-year period—and 49 of them met just this year.

Federal Role Held Key To Solving City Crisis

to achieve these goals is "the swift creation of one million jobs," followed quickly by a massive attack on the "unbelievably bad housing" that is a source of "urban violence."

"Above all," Meany said, "there must be open housing." The right of any person to buy or rent any available home he wants and can afford, on any block in any community, "is essential to the genuine achievement of equal rights and equal opportunity in this nation."

But the basic point of the overall program—the 10-point program adopted last month by the AFL-CIO Executive Council on the urban crisis—is "our firm conviction that the primary responsibility for devising and carrying out remedies rests upon the federal government," he declared.

The urban crisis recognizes no state lines, but beyond this purely physical fact is the requirement that justice and domestic tranquility "must be achieved in full and equal measure in every state; and only the federal government can assure that result." He added:

"The federal government must be the employer of last resort and the landlord of last resort. This is the only foundation upon which an effective urban program can be built."

Turning to one approach that endangers the attempts to deal with urban problems, Meany singled out the House action on the public welfare provisions of the social security bill, terming it a setback by a generation or more of the goals of aiding the poor and needy.

"I do not know of anything better calculated to foment the kind of bitterness that leads to riots than harsh sanctions against impoverished prisoners of the urban ghettos," he told the commission, voicing the hope that the damage in the House bill can be undone in the Senate.

Noting the efforts to enlist private enterprise in the campaign on the urban crisis, Meany said the drive needed all the help it can get but added: "I want to emphasize again that no private efforts, no matter how useful in themselves, can obviate the need for federal leadership, federal direction and federal funds."

Reviewing labor's own "diverse and extensive" efforts, Meany cited union involvement in sponsoring housing programs for the elderly, under the rent supplement programs and other laws; its involvement in job training for the disadvantaged poor; the development of programs to recruit apprentices for the building trades; the wide range of union participation in the war on poverty in cooperation with the OEO.

But, he added, the point "cannot be stressed too often" that despite labor and industry efforts the need is for federal leadership of the "whole campaign to overcome urban problems."

Meany took note of the "either, or" approach to the urban crisis tied to the fighting in Viet Nam and assailed the fallacy of that position, noting the nation's $800 billion economy and the equal obligation to defend freedom and perfect American society.

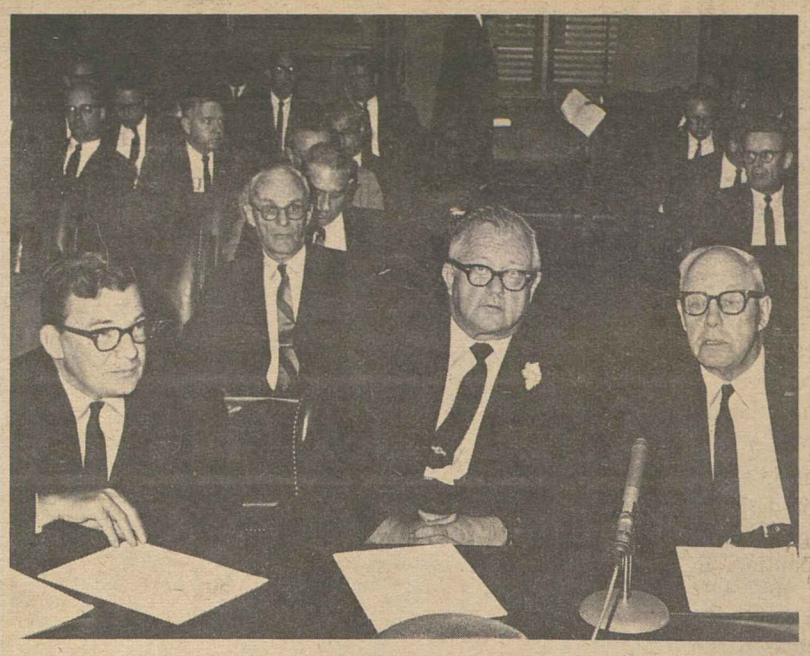
The AFL-CIO president presented to the committee a reprint from the AFL-CIO American Federationist including the federation's 10-point action program and an analysis of the urban crisis. He presented also a list of examples of labor participation in housing programs as well as copies of earlier federation statements and testimony on a wide range of problems involved in the urban areas.

Mississippi Vote Victory for URW

Aberdeen, Miss.—Employes of the Walker Mfg. Co. found all doors closed against them when they tried to rent a meeting-place in town, but they got the union message anyway. They voted for the Rubber Workers, 170-168, in a National Labor Relations Board election.

URW and AFL-CIO staff members said the campaign was a difficult one, with management following an all-out antiunion line. The Aberdeen plant, a subsidiary of the Kern County, Calif., Land Co., manufactures auto tailpipes, mufflers and springs.

A previous election was lost by a close margin 18 months ago. The union is the first in Aberdeen, AFL-CIO Assistant Regional Dir. Robert Starnes reported.



"CHANGES are needed to bring about true collective bargaining" in the federal government, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told a high-level committee in Washington. It is reviewing labor-management relations in the federal service. With Meany are Lane Kirkland (left), his executive assistant, and AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller.

Labor Urges Changes In Federal Bargaining

composed of two members each from labor and management with an impartial chairman, all appointed by the President. It could be asked to step into a dispute when negotiations and mediation had failed. It would assist the parties to reach a voluntary settlement and make a final decision if these efforts failed.

The AFL-CIO's call for arbitration in government bargaining procedures, Meany asserted, "should not be construed as indicating any lessening of our opposition to compulsory arbitration in the private sector" where labor has the right to strike.

In urging that unions be given the right to negotiate union security agreements, Meany pointed out that under the order a union may obtain "exclusive recognition" in any agency, which means it must represent all workers in the unit.

Same as Industry

He said labor supports this requirement just as it supports the principle in private industry. However, he added, it also follows—as it does in private industry—that a union should then have the right to negotiate a union security clause.

"Those who get benefits from union representation should help pay the costs of union representation," Meany pointed out.

In other areas, Meany recommended:

● "Informal recognition" granted under the order—whereby a union may only present its view and cannot be consulted—should be dropped because it is "meaningless" and "has no place in labor-management relations."

● "Formal recognition"—where a union has more than 10 percent membership in a unit but less than a majority—should be replaced with a "national consultation" status. It would give the union comprehensive "consultation" rights with an agency providing no other union holds "exclusive recognition" in the area.

● The scope of collective bargaining under the order be widened to include all negotiable subjects "as long as they are not inconsistent" with any laws.

● When agreements are negotiated at the local level, the government provide assurance that local government officials have the necessary authority to sign the agreement.

● The order should be amended to guarantee the right of unions to bargain for protective conditions where workers are being displaced by automation.

● Grievances should be subject to negotiations, not an agency procedure contained in a "personnel manual." Grievance arbitration should be final and binding.

● A Federal Service Labor-Management Relations Board, made up of five members appointed by the President, be established to administer the order. It would define bargaining units, interpret the order and decide on unfair labor practice charges.

Also, Meany urged that the order specifically guarantee all rights of employes of the District of Columbia, that the term "employe organization" be replaced by the term "labor organization," and that the Labor Dept. provide services and data to facilitate collective bargaining.

CSC Chairman John W. Macy, Jr., who presided over the open hearing, and other members of the panel praised the "detail" and "constructive tone" of Meany's statement.

Macy said the testimony "will greatly assist the committee in its deliberations." Assistant Labor Sec. Thomas R. Donahue, attending the hearing for Wirtz, said he was particularly impressed by the unions' "unanimity of opinion" behind the recommendations.

Washington AFL-CIO Fills Education Post

Seattle—Louis O. Stewart of Olympia has been appointed education director for the Washington State AFL-CIO. A graduate of the University of Washington, Stewart has held various administrative posts with the state government since 1960. Prior to that he was a carpenter and later taught industrial relations at St. Martin's College, Olympia. He is a member of the Carpenters.

House Passes Meat Bill, Rejects Wider Inspection

Meany Calls For Local Coalitions

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany called on the federation's central labor councils to cooperate with or help establish local coalitions designed to attack "urgent urban problems" which "cannot wait until the next election."

In a letter to councils in the nation's 105 largest cities, Meany noted that local action was given high priority by the national Urban Coalition, in which representatives of the AFL-CIO and several of its affiliated unions are taking an active part.

"It is my belief that organized labor, working together with other key segments of community life, can play an important part in finding solutions for the urgent problems now facing our urban population," he said.

"Effective local coalitions are essential. They can help move local communities to take action on their problems, and they can put pressure on Congress where the essential action for solving the urban crisis must be taken."

While the exact form of local coalitions will depend upon local circumstances, "in addition to our usual allies—church groups, civil rights and social welfare organizations and the like—we must develop a working relationship with forward-looking business and industrial leaders," Meany stressed. He included with his letter a series of guidelines prepared by the Urban Coalition.

Meany announced the appointment of a staff committee, headed by AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller, to coordinate the federation's work with the Urban Coalition and to assist the local labor councils with any problems they meet in the coalition effort.

"I urge you and the officers of your council to do everything possible to make the local coalition in your community an effective instrument for serving the needs of the people," he added.

At the national level, the Urban Coalition was formed during the height of the summer riots and brought 1,000 prominent Americans to Washington in late August for an "emergency convocation."

The group includes leaders in labor, business, religion, civil rights and local government.

It called for a "crash" program by the federal government to develop plans to put "at least 1 million of the presently unemployed into productive work at the earliest possible moment."

Plumbers Win 6-Year Battle On Daniel Vote

The Plumbers & Pipefitters won a six-year legal battle when the National Labor Relations Board ordered a second election at jobsites of Daniel Construction Co., Inc., biggest non-union building firm in a six-state area of the South.

The election among Daniel Co. plumbers, pipefitters and welders, the board ruled, will be held when the NLRB director for the Winston-Salem, N. C., region decides a fair election can be scheduled. The company, with headquarters at Greenville, S. C., has construction projects in Alabama, Florida, Georgia, North and South Carolina and Tennessee.

A three-member panel of the NLRB, rejecting Daniel's petition for changing the formula used to decide which workers may vote, approved, with one change, the for-

Senate Panel Votes Social Security Hike

The Senate Finance Committee voted to raise the House-passed social security bill to the 15 percent across-the-board increase sought by the Administration, with an additional boost for persons receiving the lowest payments.

It then moved on to the controversial public welfare provisions of the House bill, which AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has termed "harsh and punitive."

Meany expressed labor's "dismay" at reports that the Senate committee is considering a plan to subsidize private employers who hire "untrainable" mothers of young children who receive benefits under the Aid to Families with Dependent Children program.

"We vigorously oppose this concept," he wrote Committee Chairman Russell B. Long (D-La.). "To us the sensible and humane approach is not to force mothers into make-work jobs but to permit them to stay at home and care for their children."

The subsidy plan, Meany noted, would force mothers who are not able to take job training "into some type of employment, no matter how meaningless," or face "loss of their meager assistance payments."

One result, he stressed, "could be to displace regular employes and depress wages."

Meany declared that "instead of punishing the poor, America should try to help them out of poverty. This can be done by developing meaningful, voluntary training programs related to the real employment needs of the community, as well as through remedial education and adequate auxiliary services."

He warned that punitive measures will only increase "the discontent, frustration and deprivation of the poor in urban slums."

Long told newsmen that his committee has approved:

- A benefit increase of 15 percent for the nearly 23 million persons on the social security rolls, as compared with 12.5 percent in the House bill.
- An increase in the present minimum benefit of $44 for an individual and $66 for an elderly couple to $70 for an individual and $105 for a couple. The House bill

Consumer Fight Shifts to Senate

By David L. Perlman

The House voted to put states rights above consumer rights and refused to extend federal meat inspection to billions of pounds of meat and meat products now exempt.

It approved, 403-1, a bill to encourage—but not compel—states to set up effective inspection programs for meat slaughtered and sold within the state.

It rejected, on a non-record 140-98 vote, the extension of federal meat inspection which had been sought by labor, consumer groups and the Administration.

Twenty-two states have no meat inspection law and many of the existing state laws are lax and poorly enforced. Recent Dept. of Agriculture surveys of plants exempt from federal inspection have described in stomach-turning language filthy plants and putrid meat.

The consumer protection fight now shifts to the Senate, where Sen. Walter F. Mondale (D-Minn.) has introduced a bill to extend federal inspection to the exempt plants.

The bill sent to the House floor by the conservative-dominated Agriculture Committee was a step forward—but a much smaller step than the labor-consumer coalition had urged.

It modernized the 60-year-old Meat Inspection Act and set up a federal grant program to pay up to 50 percent of the cost for any state which establishes an inspection program meeting federal standards.

Leading the fight for a stronger bill were Representatives Neal Smith (D-Iowa) and Thomas S. Foley (D-Wash.). Their substitute included everything in the committee bill—but also extended federal inspection to plants doing at least $250,000 a year in business, even if it were all in the same state. This would have raised the portion of

Real Wages Show Drop From 1966

Gross earnings of U.S. workers reached a new all-time high in September but the buying power of their pay checks fell below year-ago levels, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported. Consumer price increases and reductions in the average workweek more than offset any benefits from higher hourly pay, the BLS report showed.

BLS said the average weekly earnings of production and non-supervisory workers in September reached $103.41, a 2.5 percent rise over the year, largely because average hourly pay at $2.70 was up 10 cents from September 1966. But the average workweek was down a half-hour from the year-ago level of 38.8 hours, the report showed, and gross pay adjusted for the cost of living averaged $88.31, down 10 cents over the year.

After taxes, weekly earnings of workers with no dependents, averaged $84.57 in September 1967—a rise of $1.71 in a year. But the purchasing power of that pay, in terms of 1957-59 dollars, was only $72.22, a drop of 40 cents. For workers with three dependents, pay after taxes this September averaged $92.11 a week, a gain of $1.81 over the year. But this represented only $78.66 in 1957-59 dollars, down 48 cents from September 1966.

A BLS companion report showed that prices increased in September at both retail and wholesale levels.

The Consumer Price Index went up two tenths of 1 percent despite lower food prices, the report said. At 117.1, the index was 2.6 percent higher than a year ago. This means that goods and services costing $10 in the 1957-59 base period now cost $11.71.

The Wholesale Price Index increased one tenth of 1 percent, the report showed, although farm products "continued to drop."

BLS said a further boost in apparel prices was a major cause of the rise in average consumer prices. Women's and girls' apparel carried

Unions Hold Promise For Young Workers

Los Angeles—A special day-long conference on organizing was told here that while an appeal to the young is vital to the movement, labor owes no short cuts to young workers.

Lane Kirkland, executive assistant to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, told more than 600 delegates—about half of whom were under 30—that the young "must still, as we all did, take their place in line."

Taking issue with those who feel labor should radicalize itself to meet demands of some youth, Kirkland said the "young man at work who runs for shop steward or grievance committeeman is still doing more to change and better the shape of the world he lives in than anyone from the new right or the new left."

If that stand disturbs the intellectual community, he said "that does not mean that they are right and we are wrong."

The conference, jointly sponsored by the Los Angeles County Federation of Labor and the AFL-CIO's Los Angeles-Orange Counties Organizing Committee, was told to look to the past for the proof.

Surely, Kirkland said, if any professors examined the 1888 AFL membership roster and finances, they would have echoed the feelings of many of today's intellectual community—that the labor movement

Union Hall Changed Into Study Center

Columbus, O.—The union hall has become a study hall for members of Laborers Local 423 here.

With a helping hand from the federal, state and local governments and advice from a national advisory committee, the union converted its second floor recreation center into a learning center which includes classrooms, individual study areas and a library.

Basic Education

Evening classes will enable Local 423 members to brush up on basic education fundamentals — reading, writing and arithmetic geared to on-the-job needs for expanded skills. Two classes of 25 members each will meet two nights a week for 12-week sessions. A total of 300 union members is expected to complete the program.

A grant from the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare got the project under way. The city's adult education division has assigned two trained teachers to each class. Modern programmed instruction will allow each student to progress as rapidly as he can.

In addition, four union members will be trained in each class as teachers' aides and will be used in follow-up portions of the program.

The national advisory committee for the program includes Laborers Vice Pres. Robert E. Powell, leading educators and an employer representative.

Plans are under way to set up a similar center elsewhere in the local's nine-county area to offer the same opportunity to members who can not attend the Columbus classes.

Office Union Wins Vote At Fordham University

New York—Fordham University's office staff voted for the Office & Professional Employes, Local 153, to represent them in collective bargaining. The vote, supervised by the American Arbitration Association, was 193 for OPEIU, 6 for no union. Six others voted for postponement of the election and 29 votes were challenged and not counted.

OPEIU Pres. Howard Coughlin, who called the new unit the first of its kind in any large college or university, announced an organizing drive is under way at Columbia University and will be followed by campaigns at New York University, Long Island University, St. John's University and St. Peter's College, Jersey City, N.J.

The Fordham election followed a 10-week campaign at the main campus in the Bronx and three branches in Manhattan — at the law, education and social science schools.

An early start on negotiations for a new contract, with terms retroactive to Sept. 1, was scheduled. The union said Fordham authorities made recognition of Local 153 as bargaining agent conditional on the results of the election.

The new bargaining unit comprises all office, clerical and professional workers. It includes telephone operators, secretaries and library workers but excludes the personnel director's confidential secretary, employes working under grants-in-aid from foundations, and persons employed less than 20 hours a week.

Coughlin said the election was one of the most "significant victories for white collar unionism" in recent years.

"Because of traditional attitudes," he said, "white collar workers have shied away from unions—especially workers in educational institutions. The verdict of the Fordham workers clearly indicates that this attitude" has changed.

Coughlin said his union stressed its familiarity with the problems of office workers and its expertise in negotiating "thousands of contracts."

Sec.-Treas. Ben J. Cohan of Local 153 reported that the New York City Central Labor Council has named a special committee to aid the OPEIU organizing drive in college offices. Members are Pres. Peter J. Brennan of the Building & Construction Trades Council, Pres. Jay Rubin of the Hotel & Motel Trades Council, and Cohan.

With Federal Aid:

Unions Help Build New Housing Units

Unions from Connecticut to California, from Florida to Michigan, are using a broad range of federal housing programs to build apartments for low and middle income families and for the elderly.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany submitted a sampling of these union-sponsored projects in testifying before Pres. Johnson's National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders.

His purpose, Meany told the commission, was "not to seek credit for the labor movement" but to point up "the need for federal leadership of the whole campaign to overcome urban problems."

The partial listing of recent, union-sponsored housing developments includes apartments built under four federally-aided programs.

The largest category covers apartments built under a federal interest subsidy, which makes mortgage money available at a below-market 3 percent cost for new or rehabilitated apartments for displaced families, low and moderate income families and the elderly or handicapped. The project must be sponsored by non-profit or limited dividend organizations or cooperatives, with rents and charges subject to government regulation.

The sampling cited by Meany includes 5,574 apartments in 31 projects in 13 states. Some are sponsored by international unions, some by city, county or state central bodies and trade councils.

Bronx luncheonette workers, New Mexico carpenters, Tennessee communications workers and the Greater New Haven Labor Council are just a few of the sponsors.

Rent supplement housing for low income families, a relatively new program struggling for adequate financing by Congress, has been built by unions in 10 states, with 1,673 apartments in the list of 15 projects submitted.

Direct federal loans, at 3 percent interest over 50 years, are available for nonprofit and limited dividend housing to serve lower-middle income senior citizens — generally those with under $4,000 a year income for single persons and $4,800 for couples.

The sample of union-sponsored projects in this category shows 3,468 apartments built or under construction.

Another program providing 100 percent mortgage insurance but not a federal interest subsidy has enabled unions to build housing for the elderly with a less restrictive income range. The AFL-CIO sampling included 1,535 such apartment units.

In addition, Meany noted, several unions have pioneered in large-scale cooperative housing developments, some under state programs. Tens of thousands of union co-op apartments have been built or are under construction in New York and other cities.

Auto Workers Step Up Chrysler Negotiations

Detroit—Auto Workers bargaining teams stepped up efforts to get new contract terms from Chrysler Corp. They set a Nov. 8 strike deadline, and also served notice on General Motors Corp. that UAW members will be authorized to strike any GM plant that schedules overtime work to build up a surplus of new cars.

The pace of negotiations at Chrysler was accelerated as the UAW formally signed a new contract covering 160,000 Ford Motor Co. workers and tried to expedite settlement of local disputes which might hold up a national settlement.

The union and GM management returned to the "main" bargaining table Oct. 31 for the first time in a month and a half. The UAW said it had asked for the meeting as a result of reports that GM was preparing for a "fight to the death" with its union workers.

After the meeting, UAW Vice Pres. Leonard Woodcock told Detroit newsmen he had asked GM management whether the reports were true and, when they were denied, notified the company that the UAW will authorize any local with unsettled contract issues to strike if members are asked to work overtime to help GM accumulate a big stockpile of cars as a "hedge" against future work stoppages.

Management has the right to order overtime, Woodcock said, but not to work union members overtime to prolong any current or future strikes. The UAW executive board voted, at a special meeting here Oct. 30, to authorize strikes by local unions for periods matching the amount of overtime ordered.

There is no legal bar to authorized strikes because GM's 400,000 UAW members, and 100,000 at Chrysler have been working without a contract since Sept. 6, when the old three-year pact expired.

No 'Death Fight'

GM told reporters that "any malarkey about fighting the union to the death is just that—malarkey."

Meanwhile Ford management notified nearly 20,000 of its union employes to return to work to get ready for starting up the assembly lines, idled by the seven-week strike and unsettled local issues at some 12 of its 101 locations.

At Chrysler, some progress was reported on wage issues, and further talks are scheduled on pension benefits, insurance and unemployment benefits.

Ford and the UAW reached agreement in principle Oct. 22 on a contract providing wage increases totaling 58 cents an hour over the contract term; skilled trades hikes averaging $1.02 an hour; a $1 raise in basic pension benefits, a new guaranteed income plan providing 52 weeks of income at nearly 95 percent of takehome pay during layoffs, and other major improvements.

IUOE Posts Victory At Carpet Factory

Carlisle, Pa.—Employes of C. H. Masland & Sons carpet factory voted 42-26 in a National Labor Relations Board election for Operating Engineers Local 835 as bargaining agent for stationary engineers and maintenance employes. The Textile Workers Union of America recently won an election, 419-304, for production workers.

Worker Buying Power Shows Drop from 1966

2 percent higher price tags. With sales running "well ahead" of a year ago and some increase in production and marketing costs, these prices have risen an average of 4.5 percent over the year—and the increase for men's and boys' apparel has been only slightly less, according to the report.

Retail gasoline prices averaged 1 percent higher in September despite the beginning of seasonal reductions in wholesale gas prices, BLS noted. Prices of used cars and tires were raised further, but new car prices dropped somewhat.

Food prices averaged less, according to BLS, because of a seasonal drop for nearly all fresh vegetables as abundant supplies finally reached the market. Apple and grape prices also fell but citrus fruits were generally higher. Meat prices were unchanged.

Other conclusions in the report:

- Charges for medical services continued upward, with increases listed in doctors' and dentists' fees and hospital service charges.
- Home repairs and maintenance cost more, and residential property taxes and insurance were raised. Widespread increases also took place in residential rents and in hotel-motel room rates.
- Electric rate increases went into effect in September in several cities. Golf and bowling fees were raised, auto insurance and parking-lot rates went up, and charges for film developing and printing also increased, BLS reported.

New Pamphlet Outlines Labor's Urban Program

"The Urban Crisis," a new AFL-CIO pamphlet in magazine format, presents labor's analysis of the problems of the cities —and the programs the federation has urged to overcome the crisis.

The cover and two of the three articles are reproduced from the American Federationist. The third article contains the 10-point program for the cities adopted by the AFL-CIO Executive Council.

Free copies of "The Urban Crisis" are available from the AFL-CIO Pamphlet Division, 815 16th Street, N.W., Washington, D.C. 20006.

Major Pay Gain Marks Clerks' Caribair Pact

The Railway & Airline Clerks have negotiated a new contract providing wage boosts of at least 36 percent and other new benefits over the next two years for the union's 450 members on Caribbean Atlantic Airlines, Inc.

The airline, known as Caribair, operates throughout Puerto Rico, the Dominican Republic and the Virgin Islands.

The pact, retroactive to Jan. 11, calls for hourly raises ranging from 69 cents to $1.02 paid in four steps from that date until June 1969 when the contract expires.

Included among fringe benefits are increased life and medical insurance coverage with the company paying premiums formerly paid by employes, and holiday improvements.

Under the latter, employes will receive double-time-and-a-half for work performed on holidays, or they may take time-and-a-half wages and receive an extra day of vacation. A worker's birthday will be considered a new holiday. The company will now assume 75 percent of the cost of employes' uniforms.

Hall Sounds Alarm:

'Grim' Proof Cited Of Maritime Decline

The U.S. merchant marine is "rushing headlong toward liquidation," the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept. warned, citing recent government reports as "grim new evidence" of the nation's maritime decline.

"Every reliable indicator published by the government points to continued deterioration of our civilian-owned, civilian-manned merchant fleet," MTD Pres. Paul Hall declared. "This is cause for serious alarm."

Hall referred specifically to the following data made public by federal agencies:

- A Census Bureau report showing that the American merchant marine's share of the nation's waterborne foreign trade dropped last year to an all-time low of 7.3 percent.
- A Maritime Administration report showing that the "runaway" fleet—the ships owned by U.S. companies but registered in other countries—now is larger than the fleet registered under the U.S. flag.
- Another Maritime Administration report showing that tiny Liberia now has an active fleet that is 40 percent larger than the entire American fleet — including this country's active commercial fleet and those vessels that are in mothballs.

'Grave Situation'

"As serious as these figures are," Hall said, "they still do not tell the whole story of the gravity of the situation."

The Census Bureau report on the decline in American carriage of the nation's export-import cargo, he said, "shows that the amount of waterborne trade in 1966 was 25 million tons larger than in the previous year—but the amount carried on U.S. vessels actually decreased by nearly 2 million tons. In other words, we are falling behind, not only in percentages, but in terms of actual cargo."

Hall expressed particular concern over the growth of the "runaway" fleet, pointing out that when American companies build their ships abroad, register them under foreign flags, and employ foreign nationals to crew the vessels, "the U.S. loses jobs, purchasing power and tax revenue, and the balance of payments is thrown further out of line."

The MTD president noted that the "runaway fleet as of the first of this year aggregated 16 million deadweight tons, while the U.S.-flag fleet totalled only 14.9 million deadweight tons." He forecast that the mid-year report, due shortly from the Maritime Administration, would show "a worsening of this situation."

Hall explained it this way:

"At the start of the year, the American-owned 'runaway' fleet had another 2.4 million tons of new vessels on order or under construction, while the U.S.-flag fleet had only 603,000 tons of new shipping being built or awaiting construction —so as things stand right now, the 'runaway' fleet will soon be one-third larger than our own merchant marine."

The MTD president added:

"This continued decline of our merchant fleet is directly attributable to the fact that we have no national program to revitalize all phases of our maritime affairs.

"It is time that America woke up to the gravity of this situation. Unless we begin now to reverse this trend, we may find ourselves bankrupt, insofar as a merchant fleet is concerned, and we will be at the mercy of the ships of other nations to supply our growing needs on the oceans of the world."

High Court Urged to Void L-G Suits Where Unions Hold New Elections

The Supreme Court was urged to rule that a regularly scheduled election of union officers, once it is held, voids a government suit to overturn a prior election in the same union.

The court can do this, the AFL-CIO points out in a "friend of the court" brief, by sustaining appeals court decisions in two case involving Labor Dept. challenges of elections under Title IV of the Landrum-Griffin Act.

Title IV is the section that sets standards to assure democratic procedures by local, national and international unions in electing their officers.

In one case, the secretary of labor sued to set aside an August 1965 election by Glass Bottle Blowers Local 153 on grounds its qualifications for office were more restrictive than Landrum-Griffin's "reasonable qualifications" standard.

The U.S. District Court in Pittsburgh, Pa., found that the local's qualifications did violate the L-G standard but denied the relief sought by the government, because the Labor Dept. had failed to prove that the violation "may have affected the outcome of the election," as also required by L-G.

While the suit was still in litigation, the local held a second election in October 1965 which was not challenged by the government. The Third Circuit Court of Appeals then held that this election rendered the suit meaningless.

Laborers' Case

In the second case, the secretary of labor challenged a June 1963 election by Laborers Local 125, as well as the local's subsequent runoff election in July of that year, resulting from a tie vote for business representative.

The government charged that a per capita payment as a requirement to vote was applied discriminately. In July 1964, the U.S. District Court in Cleveland denied the suit's application to the election of officers other than business representative. Later, it ordered another election. After that election was held in 1966, covering all offices, the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals voided the Labor Dept. suit.

The AFL-CIO notes that actually three appeals courts have ruled a valid election by a union makes meaningless a suit against an earlier election involving the same union. The other ruling came from the Second Circuit Court in a case involving two Operating Engineers locals.

The brief stresses that the entire labor movement has a stake in the cases involving the two locals because "the court's decision will do much toward laying down the ground rules governing any attack upon a union's electoral processes," and define governmental authority under the law.

'Minimum Intervention'

The AFL-CIO traces the legislative history behind Landrum-Griffin to show the "recognition that government intervention in internal union affairs should be kept to the minimum."

The brief emphasizes that Congress showed its intent to give the government only "narrow" authority in challenging elections by rejecting legislative proposals that would have allowed government-run elections in unions.

In short, it adds, "Congress recognized that a limitation on the coercive powers of the government was an integral component of its overall conception of the public interest in union democracy."

If the Supreme Court should decide that the suit is not void in the Glass Bottle Blowers case, the AFL-CIO argues, it should uphold the District Court's ruling that the government failed to prove that the violation affected the election's outcome.

Similarly, the brief suggests that if the high court decides the suit in the Laborers case was not void, it should affirm the District Court's finding that the government illegally broadened the case beyond the issue of the election of business representative.

White Collar World Congress Asks Safeguards on Automation

The world's white collar unions must accelerate organizing drives and demand new measures to protect their members from the harsh impact of automation.

That theme dominated sessions of a Washington, D.C. world congress of the Intl. Federation of Commercial, Clerical & Technical Employes, the second largest of the 16 international trade union secretariats.

The organization — known as FIET, from its initials in French, Spanish and Italian—has 120 affiliates in 64 countries representing more than 5.5 million workers. Its congress was the first ever held in the U.S. by a world labor organization.

Some 500 participants in the congress adopted resolutions to guide FIET, took steps to strengthen the organization and elected officers to lead it until the next congress in 1970.

Delegates received reports on the activities, problems and trends of the white-collar trade union movement in Europe, Asia, Africa, Latin America and North America.

Five U.S. unions are affiliated with FIET—the Retail Clerks, Office Employes, Building Service Employes, Retail, Wholesale & Department Store Union and Insurance Workers.

RCIA Pres. James A. Suffridge, elected president of FIET at its 1964 congress in Tel Aviv, and Erich Kissel, general secretary, were unanimously re-elected.

George Doughty, general secretary of Great Britain's Draftsmen & Allied Technicians, was elected first vice president, filling a post made vacant by the death of Adolph Sidrow of France. Doughty had been FIET's second vice president.

Eric Magnusson of Sweden's Commercial Union was elected second vice president and Richard Maier-Neff of Switzerland was unanimously re-elected treasurer.

Protection Sought

A major resolution urged FIET's affiliates to give top priority to negotiating contracts protecting members from the "adverse effects" of automation. It also called for drives to win protection through legislation.

Further, the resolution instructed affiliates to strive for "full employment" policies in their respective countries and seek "improved social standards" for their members.

Other key resolutions called for stronger regional cooperation among affiliates to match the trend toward "common market" movements among nations and the increased development of vocational training programs.

Reports on automation were submitted by delegates from Sweden, Germany, Austria, France, Argentina, India and the United States.

Generally, those from European delegates indicated that automation is just beginning in their countries. While it hasn't had a strong impact yet, they noted that U.S. experience indicates what is in store for them.

Pres. Howard Coughlin of the Office Employes reported that automation has "revolutionized" offices in the U.S. He told how U.S. unions are developing programs to cushion its impact on workers. In this, he observed, the government is helping, but not sufficiently.

Another speaker for the U.S., Prof. Ben Seligman of the University of Massachusetts, after citing figures on automation's effect in this country, concluded: "The fit of the white-collar . . . will become increasingly tight as machines continue to replace our non-manual workers."

One report showed that FIET has increased its membership by 45 percent in three years, from 3.8 to 5 million. But another focused on the potential: Forty-five percent of Europe's "white collars" are organized and in the U.S. only 15 percent are in unions.

Public Service International Elects Weil

Paris, France—A member of the State, County & Municipal Employes has been elected as the first American to serve in a top administrative post with Public Services Intl.

Alfred Weil, director of the white collar division of AFSCME Dist. Council 37 in New York City, was chosen assistant general secretary of PSI at its 18th Congress in Paris. The congress chose W. F. Barazetti of Great Britain as general secretary to succeed Paul Tofahrn, who retired.

State-County Pres. Jerry Wurf, who headed his union's delegation to the congress, said the AFSCME "is pleased and proud" at Weil's selection by the 2.5 million-member trade secretariat. He added:

"Al Weil has labored long and hard to improve working conditions of American public employes, particularly in New York City. Now he will lend his able efforts to our brothers in all parts of the world."

Subverting the Poverty War

NO NATION is so affluent that it can afford the waste of millions of its people rusting in the scrap heap of poverty.

Congress recognized this three years ago when it set up the Office of Economic Opportunity to carry out programs aimed at breaking the cycle of hard-core poverty.

Now these programs are endangered. They are under attack from the conservative coalition in the House not because they haven't worked, but because they cost money.

When the anti-poverty bill reaches the House floor someone is sure to "charge" that it costs more to provide basic education and meaningful job training to a semi-literate, unskilled youngster than it would to send him to Harvard for a year.

So it does. But what does one have to do with the other? The youngster helped on his way to a decent-paying job will more than repay—over his working career—society's salvage operation. The alternative, obviously, isn't to send him to take notes in a Harvard classroom. It is to leave him on the streets, or existing on handouts of food in a rural slum.

The anti-poverty program has given pre-school children a Head Start. Actually it is a desperately-needed "catch-up" so that the children of the slums can enter school on more even terms with more fortunate youngsters.

Through the poverty program, the trade union movement and other groups in the community have become directly involved in the most practical ways in providing training and job opportunities.

Through the poverty program, for the first time the opportunity of self-organization has replaced handouts and paternalism in city ghettos.

Labor has repeatedly stressed that more, much more, needs to be done. To eradicate poverty, we must have jobs at decent pay for all able to work and adequate public assistance for those who cannot.

Programs involving budget figures of millions of dollars sound impressive. But no one has to tell the neighborhood workers trying to build a better community how thinly the money stretches out over the hundreds of cities and thousands of projects.

These neighborhood workers were in the front lines this hot, bitter summer—trying to channel despair and resentment into constructive programs. Sometimes they stepped on slow-moving feet at City Halls, but it is noteworthy that nearly every mayor, Democrat or Republican, has appealed for more, not less, anti-poverty programs.

The Senate, to its credit, voted for an expanded anti-poverty program and came within a scant few votes of adding a new emergency job program that would have done a great deal more.

The House Education & Labor Committee, more liberal than the House as a whole, gave in on a few points in an effort to attract the votes needed to pass the bill. This, apparently, has not satisfied the conservative coalition which is out to drastically cut back the overall anti-poverty budget as well as dismember the OEO.

The intricacies of amendments, substitute bills and recommittal motions are beyond the grasp of the people living in the city ghettos and the rural slums. They know merely that the helping hand of their government is in danger of being sharply limited or withdrawn.

If the House turns its back on the poor it will make a sham of the national commitment to wipe out poverty. The result can only be a new despair and cynicism that will breed extremism and destruction.

'Climbing Jacob's Ladder':

New Book Recounts Struggle Of Southern Negroes for Ballot

A MILLION MORE VOTES in the past five years have brought Negro southerners more fully into the country's political life, but their hopefulness cannot be "indefinitely disappointed by the routines of American democracy."

This is one of the main points of a new book reporting Negroes' struggle for the ballot in the South and its role in reshaping the civil rights movement, the South, and the political balance within the nation as a whole.

The book is Climbing Jacob's Ladder by Pat Watters and Reese Cleghorn, published by Harcourt, Brace & World, Inc. Watters is information director of the Southern Regional Council, and Cleghorn is associate editor of the Atlanta Journal.

The book is grounded in previously unpublished documents, many of them rich, informal reports from the field, of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, the NAACP, the Congress of Racial Equality, the Urban League, and local Negro organizations throughout the South.

For three years, before the "black power" doctrine and other developments split the civil rights movement, these organizations joined efforts under the Voter Education Project of the Southern Regional Council. The authors reveal how the project was inaugurated by rights organizations and foundations with the encouragement of the then attorney general, Robert F. Kennedy, as a politically hopeful alternative to more unruly methods of claiming equality under the law.

They criticize the Justice Dept. for failure to make adequate effort to fulfill a promise to protect workers in the voter registration effort.

They conclude that a dying "southern vote" in Congress restrained the federal government from taking more incisive action.

One of the main contentions of the book is evidence that the harshness of white resistance in tougher areas of the South radicalized much of the civil rights movement, spawned the "black power" doctrine, and turned reform toward basic national illnesses such as poverty, the nation's fixation on violence, and deep-running racist attitudes.

The authors make these points, among others:

● The growth of the Negro vote in major non-southern cities between 1940 and 1960 counter-balanced the political power of the old "Solid South" and turned the federal government toward enforcement, at last, of constitutional guarantees that had been ignored.

● The 1964 election, in which Negro votes prevented Barry Goldwater from carrying four and possibly five southern states, broke the old "Solid South" and the influence of the Black Belt areas of the South over the rest of the nation.

● Negroes will have to supplement traditional political methods with new approaches to make their full weight felt, partly because of a shortage of middle-class leadership.

● Because of "ticket balancing" in the future, the growing two-party system will prove to be Negroes' greatest ally in coming into a full sharing of political power. "Barring some fluke of circumstance," the authors say, "the South's first elected Negro state attorney general or lieutenant governor since Reconstruction will be the creature of the two-party system."

THROUGHOUT the civil rights struggle in the South, public perception has been limited, the authors suggest, partly because it has usually been focused upon dramatic conflicts rather than the essence of the struggle. What has been a mighty moral struggle unique in the nation's history usually has been seen as "just one more ball game," the authors say, and unless understanding of the issues at hand deepens the nation will move increasingly toward bitterness, chaos, and denial of its own ideals.

The book recounts how many of the most militant young civil rights workers moved from belief in the best idealism of America to believing the worst about America. This erosion of faith, now seen in its national impact, mainly arose from the South's and the nation's denials of the most basic element of democracy, the right to vote, the authors contend.

This development came step-by-step with totalitarian-style repressions in Black Belt counties of the South, murder and brutality in the Mississippi Freedom Summer of 1964, and the ordeal of Selma, Ala.

The authors conclude that these rights workers' experiences with the worst poverty of the nation's poorest region bred a belief that not only was white society cruelly callous about the suffering of people, but that American institutions were incapable of curing the illness.

The book suggests that a big question in 1967 is whether the political process can accommodate demands by Negroes for removal of their disadvantage before despair and destructiveness replace a still-prevalent hopefulness among Negro Southerners.

Step Toward Wages by 'Fiat':

Morse Hits Labor Court Bill As Aimed at Free Bargaining

The following is excerpted from an address by Sen. Wayne Morse (D-Ore.) on the Senate floor Oct. 19, 1967, on a proposed U.S. court of labor-management relations in a bill introduced by Sen. George Smathers (D-Fla.).

THINGS ARE SELDOM as simple as they appear at first glance. Of course, if a court or an arbitrator decides the matter in dispute, that dispute is gone and there will be no strike or lockout. But there will also be no collective bargaining because one side or the other will know that he can do better appealing to the independent third party than he can by means of bargaining. So he will sit tight and not bargain.

When the government tells you what to do, that is government regulation. And when the government can tell you what wages to pay your workers it is only one short step for the government to tell businesses what profits they can make.

Economic freedom, as we know it under our private enterprise system, goes out the window. Sure, it is much nicer and simpler not to have strikes, but how many of us want arbitrators, the courts, or the President of the United States to tell the country what wages the workers shall get, what profits the businessmen of the country shall make, and, of course, as we are so well aware right now, what the level of taxation of our citizens shall be?

Any solution to what can and must be described as basically a minor inconvenience should not destroy one of the things that has made this country's economic system so productive and so profitable—free collective bargaining.

LISTENING to some of my colleagues, we would think that a great strike peril was confronting us 24 hours a day because, from time to time, free men and women who are employes and free men and women who are employers exercise that precious freedom of the right to strike and lockout.

Well, let me say to those who are inconvenienced by strikes and lockouts, do not forget that the price of freedom comes high. But, it is worth it. It is worth all the inconveniences one has to suffer in the case of a strike or lockout, when that strike or lockout does not involve an imperilment of the health, safety, and welfare of the American people.

What does the Smathers bill propose to do? It proposes to take any labor case before an arbitration tribunal into a court for a compulsory decision, if it is alleged or a complaint is filed which claims the public interest is substantially involved.

The public interest is involved in every labor dispute. That does not justify having the government come in and dictate the terms of the economic life for the people involved in a good faith labor dispute.

We have fashioned specific machinery for specific disputes, in specific situations. By so doing, we have left collective bargaining as intact as it can be left after a national work stoppage. We have left the responsibility for wages and working conditions where it belongs—in the hands of union and management.

Once remove that responsibility from private hands—once put it in a permanent public agency—and we will have moved a long way toward the substitution of government fiat for private decisionmaking throughout our whole economic system.

Management has more to lose from this procedure than anyone else. Wages are one of its major costs, if not the major cost. Once this part of its business enterprise is turned over to a government agency for determination, management's operation of the enterprise is severely reduced.

IN LABOR RELATIONS, nothing is more important than that the options be kept open. Congress should keep its options open, too. I know the groans and moans that go up in this body when a major dispute appears to be headed for legislation. The cry is heard that we should rid ourselves of labor issues, because they bring political repercussions no matter what a member of Congress does.

No one should be deluded that labor relations can be removed from politics. I would serve notice upon every member of Congress that you turn over to a public body the job of writing wage contracts, and you will plunge Congress into a political pit that will make you wish for the good old days when you only had to worry about one dispute at a time.

You will bring into politics the whole spectrum of wages and working conditions. The members of the court will have to be appointed and confirmed; the guidelines any such body applies will be subject to amendment. You will have Congress lobbied so hard from all sides that wage levels will become a major and direct political problem for every candidate . . .

I AM DISCUSSING what I think are major tenets of our economic and political philosophy that ought to be considered by members of the Senate before they vote on the Smathers bill, if it ever comes to a vote. In my judgment a vote for the Smathers bill will be as great a mistake as the Senate made in 1963, when it voted for the first compulsory arbitration law in history.

I hope such a vote will never be cast again, because it is most important that we see to it that workers and employers in America remain completely free to participate in collective bargaining between themselves for the determination of their wages, hours, and conditions of employment, and that no restriction ever be placed upon that freedom except in those rare and novel cases where a course of economic action on the part of workers and employers in a dispute imperils the health, safety, and security of the republic.

Senate Effort Pledged:

Lax State Meat Inspection Hit, House Bill Called Inadequate

THE AMERICAN PEOPLE have the right to government assurance that the meat they eat is clean and wholesome, a union spokesman declared in a network radio interview.

"The states have not really done the job in meat inspection," said Arnold Mayer, legislative representative of the Meat Cutters, in a Labor News Conference interview.

Federal inspection covers 84 percent of meat and meat products — those sold across state lines — and "has done a good job," Mayer noted.

But billions of pounds of meat sold within the states where they are processed are either uninspected or inadequately inspected under substandard state programs.

Mayer was interviewed before the House turned down compulsory federal inspection of most meat products now exempt, although adopting a bill to encourage states to meet federal inspection standards. He said later that a strong effort will be made in the Senate to strengthen the House-passed bill.

UNDER FEDERAL inspection, Mayer said on Labor News Conference, "most meat products are excellent."

He said the labor movement wants to "extend that standard of excellence to a much, much wider range of meat products." The American people "want to be assured that the meat they eat is clean, is wholesome, is nourishing, and they have a right to expect that."

Mayer said that wider coverage of federal law would be helpful to the whole meat packing industry, because "everyone would be treated the same — everyone would start with the same competitive factor."

Reporters questioning Mayer on the public service program, broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 a.m. EST on the Mutual Radio Network, were Nick Kotz of the Des Moines Register and the Minneapolis Tribune and Eric Wentworth of the Washington Post.

'Beat LBJ' Strategy Suicidal:

Division of Liberals Poses Crisis for '68

The following is excerpted from an article by Gus Tyler, assistant president of the ILGWU, in the Oct. 23, 1967, issue of The New Leader titled "The Liberal Crisis."

AS THE NATION moves toward the 1968 elections, American liberalism faces the most serious crisis of this century. The peril to the liberals arises from dark and destructive forces at work in the country, and from deep divisions within the progressive-minded community. Unless liberalism can close political ranks to check the onrush of reaction, America can be swept into a dismal abyss of prolonged reaction.

The drama of the 1968 elections will be played against a double backdrop: violence and Viet Nam. Both will profoundly affect the outcome in the voting.

Pres. Johnson would overcome both these obstacles—violence and Viet Nam—with a united liberal front. But this unity is lacking at the moment. Within the progressive community in 1967 there is a group whose basic strategy is negative: "Beat Johnson." Its logic runs in three steps:

1. Any Republican, including Richard Nixon or Ronald Reagan, is more likely to settle Viet Nam than Johnson, in the same way that Eisenhower settled Korea after Truman.

2. Even if this does not happen, in 1972 the Democrats could oust the Republicans.

3. At that time, the Democratic party will be in the hands of its liberal wing.

For a brief moment, this faction in the liberal community toyed with a third-party movement: the Spock-King ticket. The Negro nihilists knocked that notion out of their heads at the National Conference for New Politics in Chicago. So the "Beat Johnson" faction now turns to the Democratic party (a) to name convention delegates to nominate someone or anyone other than LBJ; (b) to undermine Johnson in the election of 1968; (c) and then in 1972 to use this movement to name a true liberal to take the White House.

The strategy is simple and suicidal.

THE FIRST VICTIMS of this "beat Johnson" movement will be the representatives and senators in the "peace wing" of Congress. A battle over convention delegates will deeply divide the Democratic party ranks. Congressmen and senators will not escape the conflict unscathed. The "Beat Johnson" movement inevitably, if not intentionally, becomes a beat-the-liberals-for-Congress movement: both liberal doves and liberal hawks.

A conservative Congress—much more conservative than the present—will not only affect legislation but may very well turn topsy turvy all calculations on the presidency in 1968. In this regard, 1968 could be unlike any other election in American history.

If neither Democrat nor Republican gets a majority of the votes in 1968, then the contest goes to the House of Representatives—at which point the political complexion of the House becomes decisive because it is the body that will now pick the President out of the top runners.

The liberal community has not, until recently, been even dimly aware of the dangerous potential. The great preoccupation has been with Viet Nam—both pro and con—almost exclusively. The far greater danger arising from the political crisis within the country has gone almost unnoticed.

If one must look for historical analogies for 1968, it is less in the America of the 1940s and 1950s than in the Germany of the 1930s. Then the great danger was Hitler. But to a sector of the Left—the Communists—the real enemy was social democracy. The coalition that might have halted Hitler was torn with fratricide. The Communists termed the Social Democrats "socialfascists"; they turned the "main fire" against those closest to them; they welcomed Hitler to power with the proclamation: Nach Hitler, Kommen Wir.

No doubt this analogy—like most historical parallels—is faulty. But in terms of long-range historic impact, what happened in Germany in the '30s may be closer to the danger we face in 1968 than what happened in America in either 1948 or 1952.

FEDERAL MEAT INSPECTION should be extended to billions of pounds of meat now subject only to lax state programs, Legislative Rep. Arnold Mayer (center) of the Meat Cutters urged on Labor News Conference. Reporters Eric Wentworth (left) of the Washington Post and Nick Kotz of the Des Moines Register and the Minneapolis Tribune questioned Mayer on the public service program broadcast Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

Top Officers Re-Elected by Train Union

Chicago—Adoption of resolutions setting forth a series of economic and legislative goals and the re-election of all incumbent officers highlighted sessions of the 20th annual convention of the American Train Dispatchers Association here.

The convention's 140 delegates also approved a number of amendments designed to clarify and modernize the ATDA constitution.

Returned to office were Pres. R. C. Coutts, Sec.-Treas. Arthur Covington and Vice Presidents R. H. Hack, Warminster, Pa.; B. C. Hilbert, Troutdale, Ore.; C. R. Pfenning, Cedar Rapids, Ia., and V. F. Williams, Atlanta, Ga.

Newly elected as a trustee was D. V. Chandler, Sacramento, Calif. Trustees reelected to four-year terms are F. E. Fenstermaker, Girard, Ohio, and R. J. Irvin, Jr., Warrior, Ala.

Major resolutions denounced compulsory arbitration on the railroads, backed legislation in Congress to increase railroad retirement and social security benefits and urged more government funds for high-speed ground transportation programs.

Delegates cheered a demand by Coutts for a complete federal probe to determine "who really owns the railroads." Rail union leaders have previously charged that ownership is hidden because carriers are allowed to list major stockholders under "fronts."

Under Sec. of Labor James J. Reynolds was the main speaker at a convention banquet marking the 50th anniversary of the founding of ADTA.

Other special banquet guests included Chairman Howard Habermeyer of the Railroad Retirement Board, Presidents R. E. Wachowiak of the Yardmasters and C. J. Chamberlain, Signalmen, and Francis A. O'Neill, National Mediation Board member.

PROPOSALS to help developing nations educate their young people for an industrial society were drafted in Geneva by a conference of experts convened by the Intl. Labor Organization. AFL-CIO Education Dir. Walter G. Davis, left, discusses a proposal with the conference chairman, J. L. Galbraith, who heads Great Britain's youth employment program.

Plumbers Win Fight For New Daniel Vote

mula it set in the original Daniel case in 1961.

The Plumbers hailed the decision, noting that in it the NLRB ordered Daniel management to provide the union with the names and addresses of all eligible employes—the first time the board has applied its so-called Excelsior rule to second-election cases.

Workers who will be eligible to vote in the second election were identified as those employed in the payroll period just prior to the order for an election, workers employed for a total of 30 days or more within a 12-month period before the election, and those who have had some employment with the firm in the 12 months prior to the election order and have worked a total of 45 days or more over the 24 months prior to the order.

The NLRB made one change in its original order to prevent workers who have no likelihood of future employment with Daniel from voting. It classed these as workers who have quit voluntarily, or have been terminated for cause before completion of the last job they worked on.

The voting formula set six years ago in the Daniel case has been used by the board ever since. Daniel management challenged it in a series of petitions that took nearly two full years to dispose of. The election could be further delayed by additional appeals open to employers under the law.

The Plumbers began an effort to organize Daniel workers at 68 scattered jobsites nearly seven years ago. Daniel fought the move, opposed the union in the first election held Nov. 16, 1961, and defeated the Plumbers by using tactics the union called unfair and unlawful.

2-Year Delay

It took nearly two years for an NLRB trial examiner to hold hearings and write a report. He ruled in July 1963 that the corporation threatened and coerced its workers and recommended a second election. The board upheld the examiner in 1964 and management then appealed to the courts.

In 1965 the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Richmond, Va., ordered into effect the board's order compelling Daniel to stop its unfair practices and declined to review the order in the election case. The next management move was to ask for Supreme Court review, which was denied Oct. 11, 1965.

Before another election could be ordered, Daniel filed a motion to reopen the record in the election case, and the time since then has been taken up with hearings, bills of particulars, arguments and petitions.

Kansas AFL-CIO Maps Vigorous '68 Campaign

Topeka, Kan.—Four hundred delegates to the Kansas AFL-CIO Convention adopted a broad legislative program and plans for a vigorous campaign in the 1968 elections.

The convention, at the Municipal Auditorium, gave former Gov. Alf M. Landon a standing ovation as he warned that compulsory arbitration, either by the national administration or by Congress, is encroaching on collective bargaining. He proposed the establishment of a national board of arbitration with sweeping powers, but on a voluntary basis. Landon is on record also as strongly opposed to "right-to-work" laws:

Three resolutions adopted by the convention were directed at insurance laws, including a demand to bar non-duplication clauses in hospital and medical insurance; a plea for action to prohibit cancellation of automobile liability insurance without just cause, and a call for a law requiring insurance companies to pay claims in 30 days.

In other resolutions, the delegates called for a law prohibiting importation of strike-breakers, demanded that a state aviation commission be established and financed by a tax on aviation fuel, rather than from general revenue, and proposed that workers involved in strikes or lockouts be allowed unemployment benefits after the stoppage is six regular work-weeks old.

The convention unanimously adopted a resolution commending Kansas Gov. Robert Docking (D.) and supporting his policies. It commended the state federation's two full-time officers, Vice Pres. Jim Yount, and Executive Sec.-Treas. Floyd E. Black, on their accomplishments in the 1966 elections, and the 1967 legislature.

Constitutional amendments approved conformed with new AFL-CIO rules governing state and city central bodies, and increased the pay of the three top officers of the state body. There were no elections this year.

The delegates gave a rousing welcome to organizers for the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee, who appeared in support of the committee's boycott of Giumarra grapes and grape products, of Bakersfield, Calif.

TV Program Set on Labor and the Bible

A dramatic reading of the spiritual roots of labor, as found in the Bible, titled "The Labor of Thy Hands," will be shown on stations of the NBC-TV network, Sunday, Nov. 26. The narration will be by Joseph Mindell.

The program is sponsored by the George Meany Foundation as part of the Eternal Light series presented by the Jewish Theological Seminary. Local listings should be checked under that name for the time of broadcast.

Labor Cited for Servicemen Gifts

St. Louis—The St. Louis AFL-CIO and its Ladies Auxiliaries have received awards from "Operation Buddy," a non-profit organization formed in Missouri to send gift packages to servicemen in Viet Nam.

The organization presented both with "Patriot in Action" plaques for their efforts in securing financial contributions and gifts for the project. The awards were the first to be presented by "Operation Buddy."

Training Aid Urged:

ILO Parley Weighs Youth Job Problems

Geneva—The developing countries of the world need help in educating and training their young people for useful lives in an industrial society, a conference called by the Intl. Labor Organization agreed here.

The conferees, who included AFL-CIO Dir. of Education Walter G. Davis, prepared a draft paper with 91 recommendations for the ILO Governing Body, which has scheduled a 1968 meeting of national experts on youth problems.

Almost all the developing countries, along with some developed nations, face the growing problem of youth unemployment, the conference was told.

ILO staff members reported that as of 1965 young persons aged 19 and under constituted 57.5 percent of the total population in Honduras, 57.2 percent in Sudan, 56 percent in the Philippines, and more than 50 percent in Ghana, Mexico, Malaya, Peru, Pakistan and the United Arab Republic. A high rate of school dropouts is common to many nations, and some report many children with no formal schooling at all.

Half the children in developing countries had no schooling after age 11 or 12, it was found. Omitting "the large numbers of those who never go to school," the ILO reported to the conference that the school enrollment ratio for children aged 11 to 15 is generally not more than a fourth, and in some nations as low as 10 percent or less.

Dr. Abbas Amar, deputy director general of the ILO, emphasized the extreme gravity of the problem and noted that some nations with limited resources have been investing large sums in education without getting the best return on their investment.

In many lands, he said, youth training opportunities are few. Most young people start looking for work at an early age with little or no education or training in an economy holding out few prospects for employment.

The conferees agreed that the central problem is the lack of opportunity for useful work, with demoralizing effects on the unemployed. They called the situation "huge and intractable."

Industrialization was recognized as an "essential objective" to be pursued as rapidly as possible. Meanwhile, help is needed from all possible sources in improving schooling for all, providing vocational training and job opportunities even in the rurally-related economies that exist in many lands, it was reported.

It was agreed that "the fate of a nation depends on the education and training of its youth." Several consultants warned, however, against the "illusion that education and training will be an answer per se" in countries with unfavorable economic prospects.

Davis reported the concern in the United States over the plight of workers who move from rural areas to an industrial city and stand on street corners waiting for an occasional job within their experience.

J. H. Galbraith, chairman of Great Britain's Central Youth Employment Executive in the Ministry of Labor, was conference chairman.

African Youths Get Training In N.Y. Hotels

New York—Three workers from one of Africa's new nations are training in hotel work here under a program jointly sponsored by their government, the African-American Labor Center, the Hotel & Restaurant Employes and the New York Hotel Association.

The three—Anna Henry, Fatima Nasser and Samuel Songoro—came here last year from Tanzania, a country in East Africa formed in 1964 by the unification of Tanganyika and Zanzibar.

They were selected as the staff nucleus of a new hotel to be built in Dar-es-Salaam, Tanzania's capital. The hotel will be owned by the National Union of Tanzanian workers. It will have the first wholly African staff of any hotel in the country.

Miss Henry and Miss Nasser are training in housekeeping at the Loews Hotels and the Park Sheraton, respectively. Songoro is training to be an executive chef at the Loews Hotels.

The AALC developed the training program in consultation with the New York hotel unions and hotel industry. AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany heads the AALC, which was formed in 1965 to aid African free trade unions through vocational training, workers' education and social projects.

NATIONAL COMMISSION on Urban Problems hears J. C. Turner, president of the Greater Washington Central Labor Council, urge federal job and housing programs to make up for "years of discrimination and neglect." The commission, headed by former Sen. Paul H. Douglas, held its meeting in a dilapidated Washington, D. C., junior high school and then visited slum homes and the people living in them. AFL-CIO Vice Pres. John H. Lyons is a member of the commission.

Fight Shifts to Senate:

House Approves Meat Bill, Bars Wider U.S. Inspection

the nation's meat subject to federal inspection from 84 to 97 percent.

Although some city and suburban Republicans spoke out for the Smith-Foley bill, the House Republican Policy Committee crushed the hopes for its enactment shortly before the vote by taking a party-line position against it.

The 140-98 count was a teller vote, in which a head count is taken but there is no record of how each congressman voted. Of the 404 congressmen who were recorded on the non-controversial final passage vote, 166 were absent for the teller count.

The President's consumer adviser, Betty Furness, issued a statement on the eve of the vote reiterating the Administration's support for the strengthening amendments and calling on Congress to "give the American housewife the added protection she demands and deserves."

Thousands of people are stricken each year with intestinal diseases traceable to unwholesome meat, Miss Furness declared. "It is clear that the health of our citizens can no longer depend on where meat is processed and sold," she said.

But the House, dominated by its conservative coalition wasn't listening.

The continued antipathy of the House majority to the Administration program prompted speculation of an early adjournment. But the "quit before Thanksgiving" talk faded somewhat after Pres. Johnson called in House and Senate leaders to urge action on a greater portion of the Administration's program.

Johnson later told newsmen he was "greatly distressed" at the congressional slash in the model cities funds from a requested $622 million to $312 million. But it was at least a "beginning," he said.

The President also said he has not abandoned hope for a tax increase, despite the hostility of the House Ways & Means Committee.

The budget crisis eased somewhat as Congress completed action on most of the regular appropriations bills while House-Senate conferees remained deadlocked over a resolution providing temporary spending authority for agencies that have not yet received their appropriations. The Senate has refused to go along with a House insistence that the resolution instruct the President to hack billions of dollars from his budget.

The deadlock, however, posed grave problems for the anti-poverty program which will have to shut down projects serving 500,000 poor people and feed reduced rations to 38,600 youngsters in Job Corps camps unless its spending authority is restored. The agency's employes also face a possible moneyless payday.

The authorization bill for the poverty program—the first step before appropriations are voted—faces a bitter attack on the House floor from the conservative coalition.

A Senate Labor subcommittee decided to hold hearings on the union-backed site picketing bill early in 1968, abandoning earlier hopes of completing the hearings before adjournment.

A companion bill has been approved by the House Education & Labor Committee, but House leaders said they will wait until the Senate acts before bringing the bill to the floor.

A relatively non-controversial bill designed to prohibit age discrimination in employment won unanimous approval of the Senate Labor Committee. A similar measure had earlier been approved by the House committee.

It would prohibit discrimination in employment, union membership, pay, and help-wanted advertisements against persons between the ages of 40 and 65, except where age can be justified as a "bona fide occupational qualification."

The bills sidetrack the issue of compulsory early retirement, such as for airline stewardesses, by directing the Labor Dept. to make a six-month study of the problem.

Poverty Fight Pressed By West Virginia Labor

Charleston, W. Va.—Delegates to the West Virginia State AFL-CIO convention reiterated labor's strong support of anti-poverty programs and called for new measures to provide jobs and equal access to housing in the nation's cities.

The convention, marking the 10th anniversary of the state federation, drew more than 500 delegates and nationally prominent speakers, including Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz.

Miles C. Stanley, who has headed the state body since its founding, was re-elected president and Glen Armstrong was re-elected secretary-treasurer.

Wirtz told the delegates that the AFL-CIO is "the only really organized liberal force in America today." He termed the labor movement "trustees of social change" and said, "I hope I am never around when American labor is satisfied."

Delegates suspended the convention's rules to go on record with an enthusiastic endorsement of the state federation's general counsel, James M. Sprouse, who will be a candidate for the Democratic gubernatorial nomination in next spring's primary.

"Jobs and housing remain the most critical needs of the Negro people," a convention resolution declared.

"People with jobs do not riot. No one firebombs a shop that might offer employment and a chance to advance. No one sets a match to a decent home that he has a chance to live in."

Sen. Jennings Randolph (D-W.Va.) and Rep. Harley O. Staggers (D), dean of the state's congressional delegation, were among the featured speakers. Randolph called for total mobilization of the nation's resources to meet the "pressing needs" of the people.

AFL-CIO Vice Presidents Paul Hall, president of the Seafarers, and David Sullivan, president of the Building Service Employes, addressed the convention as did AFL-CIO COPE Dir. Al Barkan.

Hall was presented a certificate lauding his assistance to "Project Recruit," a labor program that has aided more than 300 jobless West Virginia youths with training as seafarers.

Convention resolutions included calls for vigorous political action by labor, stepped-up organizing, and consumer protection legislation.

Unions Held Best Hope For Aspirations of Youth

is obsolete and unable to cope with modern problems.

"Yet the fact remains," he said, "that while men, jobs and even unions may die, the labor movement lives on."

He stressed that this does not mean labor should stand back and do nothing about the "massive forces at work in today's society."

"The need for new approaches has been evident for some time," he said, and pointed out that unions are already moving in the right direction across the nation with new member programs, closer relations with local school districts and expansion of activities in recruitment and job placement programs.

"It is essential to the survival and growth of the labor movement to keep pace," he declared, "and I have confidence we will."

In the morning session, delegates were urged to make appeals to younger groups by author-historian-teacher Will Scoggins, who said some of the youngsters could be leaders of society, but instead "they are dropping out or, in their frustrations, getting ready to pull the plug and let the damned thing sink."

Scoggins called on the labor movement "to tell them the story of labor and its fight for human dignity, a story not bound by dollars and cents or by job security."

The business community, he said, spends about $160 million a year telling its side. "You don't need me to tell you what new skills the right wing is now employing in union-busting and they have the support of the Reagans and the Murphys. You must tell the story of labor; you must identify it for the youth with the human dignity that it has achieved at the workplace."

Kirkland agreed that the younger members of the workforce "have low response to the slogans of the older generations" and pointed out that a full 40 percent of today's population "missed the Depression, World War II and the Korean War . . . and don't remember a time without minimum wage laws and high levels of national economy."

Within the next few years, he said, "all that happened before the 1950's will be history instead of experience to most Americans."

While the tremendous growth of younger workers in relation to the overall population "bothers organizers of the old school," he said, "most prefer working with them because the labor movement needs their vitality and idealism."

Key Contests for Mayor, Governor Go to Voters in Off-Year Elections

Mayoralty contests, three gubernatorial races and voting for legislatures in four states will be decided in forthcoming off-year elections, most of them on Nov. 7.

Among the 27 major cities that will elect mayors, national attention was focused on Gary, Ind., Cleveland, Boston, Philadelphia and San Francisco.

In Gary and Cleveland, Negroes are the Democratic candidates for mayor. They are Gary City Councilman Richard Hatcher and Ohio State Rep. Carl B. Stokes. Their GOP opponents are Joseph B. Radigan and Seth C. Taft.

In Boston, where Mayor John F. Collins is not seeking re-election, the race is between Sec. of State Kevin H. White and Mrs. Louise Day Hicks, an opponent of measures to promote school integration.

Mrs. Hicks led the primary voting, but White has the backing of most of the defeated candidates in that election and the support of Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and Gov. John A. Volpe (R). The election is non-partisan but both White and Mrs. Hicks are Democrats.

Incumbent Mayor James H. Tate (D) of Philadelphia is locked in a tight battle with District Atty. Arlen Specter, now a Republican but formerly a Democrat.

Eighteen candidates are vieing to succeed San Francisco's Mayor John F. Shelley, a former Democratic congressman who did not seek re-election because of poor health.

The three leading candidates in the non-partisan election are Jack Morrison, a member of the city's board of supervisors; Harold S. Dobbs, a former member of that board; and Joseph L. Alioto, a former board of education member. Morrison and Alioto are Democrats and Dobbs is a Republican.

Two states elect governors in Nov. 7 elections — Kentucky and Mississippi—and a third, Louisiana, holds a Democratic gubernatorial primary, Nov. 4.

In Kentucky, where incumbent Gov. Edward T. Breathitt (D) is not eligible for re-election, the race is between Henry Ward (D), a former state highway commissioner, and Louie B. Nunn (R), a Glasgow attorney.

In Mississippi, where Gov. Paul B. Johnson also is barred from seeking re-election, Rep. John Bell Williams (D) is pitted against Rubel Phillips (R), a Jackson attorney.

Louisiana's Gov. John J. McKeithen (D) faces five opponents in the primary. If no candidate gets a majority, the top two will be pitted in a run-off Dec. 16. With no Republican opposition, the general election next Feb. 6 will be a formality.

Full legislatures in Virginia, Mississippi and New Jersey are up for election Nov. 7, and in Kentucky all members of the House and half the Senate will be elected.

In all four states, both the House and Senate are currently controlled by the Democrats.

A special election in California's 11th congressional district Nov. 14 is drawing national interest because one of ten candidates for the seat made vacant by the death of Rep. J. Arthur Younger (R) is Mrs. Shirley Temple Black.

The former child movie star, her campaign being managed by the Whitaker & Baxter public relations firm, is running as a Republican in a district that is heavily GOP. Younger got 59.4 percent of the vote there in 1966.

Under California's election law, if no candidate gets 50 percent or more of the vote, a run-off will be held Dec. 12 between the top Republican and top Democratic candidates.

In the voting in 23 states between now and the end of the year, citizens also will ballot on a wide range of issues.

San Francisco voters will express themselves on Viet Nam war policy; New York's voters will approve or reject a new state constitution; Pennsylvania will elect delegates to a constitutional convention; and bond issues are on the ballot in Maine, Nov. 7, and Alabama, Dec. 5.

High Court to Hear Picket Rights Case

The Supreme Court has agreed to hear a case involving the right of a union to picket in a privately-owned shopping center without running afoul of trespass laws.

It will consider an appeal by the Meat Cutters from a Pennsylvania court decision granting an injunction against picketing within the property of the shopping center.

The union contends that federal law bars the state courts from enjoining peaceful picketing and that the injunction abridges the constitutional right of free speech.

Similar cases have been decided both ways in other state courts but the issue has never been adjudicated by the U.S. Supreme Court.

Senate Confirms D. C. City Council

The Senate unanimously confirmed the appointments of the nine members of the new District of Columbia Council, legislative body for the nation's capital.

The members, chosen by Pres. Johnson, include J. C. Turner, president of the Greater Washington Central Labor Council.

Endorse Meany Proposals:

Federal Employe Unions Cite Improved Bargaining Need

By Duane Emme

Five years experience under a 1962 executive order proves the need for changes in federal labor management relations if federal workers are to have meaningful collective bargaining, leaders of AFL-CIO unions representing government employes told a Cabinet-level task force.

The changes, they agreed, must include the establishment of a tripartite panel to resolve negotiation impasses in the absence of the right to strike.

New machinery is needed for settling grievances; the scope of bargaining must be widened; unions must be allowed to negotiate union security; local government officials must have authority to sign agreements; a board is needed to oversee the order.

The union officials, representing a million federal employes, stressed these and other points in testimony before the task force, assigned by Pres. Johnson to recommend improvements in federal labor relations policy.

They presented their views based on day-to-day experience their organizations have had in dealing with federal agencies and officials since the order went into effect in January 1962.

They expanded upon testimony given earlier by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany who advanced labor's proposals "to improve bargaining in the federal service." The recommendations were unanimously supported by all of the AFL-CIO unions testifying.

Pres. B. A. Gritta of the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept. set forth bargaining problems encountered under the order by Metal Trade Councils which hold 36 signed agreements, mainly in Navy and Army installations.

He called the 1962 order an important "forward step" for federal workers but said that operations under it have exposed "unfair limitations" on unions as well as "cumbersome" procedures.

He stressed the need for "broadening" the scope of bargaining, "an effective and easily understood" grievance procedure, the disputes-settling panel and authorizing local officials to conclude agreements.

John A. McCart, operations director for the AFL-CIO Government Employes Council, testified that many federal employers have taken advantage of loopholes in the order to "stifle" bargaining.

After discussing the need for the "substantial modifications" proposed by labor, he added, "If the changes are adopted, we believe the national government will gain new stature as an enlightened employer."

Pres. E. C. Hallbeck of the Postal Clerks testified that "one of the great weaknesses" of the order is its failure to provide machinery "for the solution of negotiation deadlocks" and "the impartial adjudication of unfair labor practice charges."

Describing the executive order as "the first forward step taken in almost 50 years "in the area of federal labor-management relations, Hallbeck added that there is nevertheless "a great need for improvement."

Discontent Cited

Pres. John F. Griner of the American Federation of Government Employes warned of increasing rumblings of discontent among government workers about shortcomings in collective bargaining under the order.

He charged that many agencies are taking advantage of the order to issue regulations "that narrow the areas that can be bargained." If government unions are to "truly represent" employes, "we must be able to bargain in every sense of the word," he added.

In supporting the proposed board to administer the order, Griner pointed out that as things now stand "there are 58 different departments and agencies with 58 different interpretations of the order."

Vice Pres. James H. Rademacher of the Letter Carriers and W. H. Ryan, national coordinator of the Machinists government employes department, also hit at abuses of the order by agencies and officials.

Rademacher charged that postmasters in many parts of the nation were violating the order. Asserting that a number of representatives of postal management "refuse to accept the fact that unions are here to stay" and do not understand the need for "mutual respect," he added:

"There are still those who believe that the sovereignty of the government means they can do what they want with those who work for them and that they are bargaining away federal power when they negotiate with their employes."

Ryan said that in cases where officials agree to outside arbitration, they often "simply refuse to comply with the ruling."

This "heads management wins, tails workers lose" attitude "debases the whole collective bargaining procedure and erodes the entire base on which the order was built," Ryan declared.

Witnesses before the task force also included representatives of the State, County & Municipal Employes, Seafarers, American Federation of Teachers, Chemical Workers, Laborers, Printing Pressmen and Building Service Employes.

Safety Congress Elects Gildea of Brewery Union

Chicago—The 55th National Safety Congress has elected Arthur P. Gildea, secretary-treasurer of the Brewery Workers, the National Safety Council's vice president for labor.

As a council vice president Gildea will serve as liaison representative between the board of directors and the Labor Conference of the NSC, a volunteer group concerned with labor safety problems and labor involvement in general safety programs.

Gildea, who succeeds Operating Engineers Pres. Hunter P. Wharton, was appointed to the labor conference in 1957. In the Brewery Workers he is in charge of accident prevention and safety.

The Labor Conference elected Paul H. Connelly of the Carpenters to succeed John R. Kumpel of the Rubber Workers as chairman. Rex Lauck, assistant editor of the Mine Workers Journal, was chosen as vice chairman.

The NSC elected Wharton a member at large of its board of directors. He is also a trustee. Jack McLaughlin of Steelworkers Local 1014, Gary, Ind., was elected a director succeeding Vice Pres. Enoch Rust of the Glass & Ceramic Workers.

Earlier, the labor conference presented 13 awards to union organizations and individuals for outstanding efforts in the field of accident prevention. The award of honor went to Steelworkers Local 6500, Sudbury, Ont.; Machinists Lodge 851, Joliet, Ill.; Operating Engineers Local 150, Chicago, and the headquarters of the Operating Engineers in Washington.

The award of merit went to Oil Workers Local 4-447, Destrehan, La.; Steelworkers Local 4108, Aurora, Minn.; IBEW Local 1859, Cicero, Ill.

The award of commendation went to Uniformed Fire Officers Association, Local 854, New York; Oil Workers Local 8-12058, Niagara Falls, N. Y.; Illinois Dept. of Labor Division of Safety Inspection & Education.

Three citations were awarded to individuals from the above organizations and a special testimonial of appreciation was given to Jacob Gold, safety engineer of the U.S. Dept. of Labor.

Senate Panel Approves 15% Social Security Hike

would have set the minimum at only $50 for a single person, $75 for a couple.

The higher amounts approved by the Senate committee were those originally sought by Pres. Johnson. The committee, however, voted down by a 9-8 margin the Administration's proposal to extend medicare coverage to the 1.5 million disabled workers under 65.

While the House was obliged to consider the social security bill drafted by its Ways & Means Committee under a no-amendment rule, the Senate committee bill will be wide open to amendments when it reaches the floor.

The Senate committee also voted to permit men to start drawing old age retirement benefits at age 60, at reduced rates, as women may now do. The present minimum age for men is 62.

It also raised the special benefits for persons 72 or older who cannot qualify for regular social security payments. The new payment would be $50 a month as compared with $35 under present law and $40 under the House bill.

The committee was working, as the AFL-CIO News went to press, on details of financing the higher benefits, including a higher taxable wage base. The President has asked for a gradual step-up in the present $6,600 ceiling to reach $10,800 in 1974. The House bill provides only a single increase—to $7,600. The higher the wage base, the higher would be the ceiling on social security benefits.

Under Sec. of Health, Education & Welfare Wilbur J. Cohen told newsmen that the 15 percent across-the-board benefit raise plus the higher minimums would result in an average increase of about 20 percent in social security payments.

Most of the Senate committee's votes on raising benefits in the House bill were by margins ranging from 9-7 to 11-6. In a rare unanimous decision, however, the committee provided full widow's benefits for disabled widows, regardless of age. The full benefit is 82.5 percent of what the husband would have been entitled to draw. The House bill called for benefits at 50 percent, starting at age 50.

NMU Official Gives Reward To Scholarship

Chicago—A share in the reward money for the arrest of Richard Speck, convicted as the slayer of eight Chicago nurses last year, has been awarded to a National Maritime Union official—but he's not going to keep the money.

Notified that he had been awarded one-fourth of the $10,000 reward, William Neil, agent in charge of NMU's Chicago branch, said the $2,500 will be contributed to a nurses' scholarship fund at South Chicago Community Hospital.

"NMU does not accept financial reward for public service," Neill said. "The help we were able to give the police in solving this terrible crime was part of our job."

When evidence indicated the killer might have been seeking a job on a ship, police contacted Neill. He obtained photos of all recent Chicago applicants for jobs from NMU's headquarters in New York. One of those was identified by the surviving nurse as Speck.

Jobless Rate Hits 4.3%, Two-Year High

Jump Laid To Rise in Workforce

A continuing rise in the number of people seeking work and failing to find it pushed the nation's jobless rate to 4.3 percent in October, the highest level in two years, the Labor Dept. has reported.

The key seasonally adjusted jobless rate was up from 4.1 perpercent in September and 3.8 percent in August. The rate was 3.8 percent in October 1966.

Teenagers and adult men accounted for the increase of nearly 200,000 in unemployment over the month, the Labor Dept. said. Total unemployment stood at nearly 3 million, about 500,000 higher than a year earlier.

The employment side of the picture remained strong, with jobholders totaling 74.6 million, seasonally adjusted. This was about the same as in September and was up 1.4 million from October a year earlier.

The upsurge in unemployment in recent months was related by the Labor Dept. to the unexpectedly large labor force increase. The adult women flooding into the labor force in the early fall were still having difficulty finding jobs, a situation which increased medium-term unemployment—those jobless 5 to 14 weeks.

Labor Force Up

The civilian labor force totaled 78.0 million in October, up by 1.9 million or some 500,000 higher than the 1.4 million job rise since October 1966.

"This large year-to-year increase in unemployment—which includes 275,000 women, 175,000 16- to 19-year-olds and 50,000 adult men—developed almost entirely in the last few months along with unusually large labor force increases," the Labor Dept. noted.

The report pointed out that unemployment was up about one-fourth over the year for both teenagers and women—to 15.1 percent and 4.8 percent, respectively.

Occupationally, the Labor Dept. said, jobless rates have moved up for jobs requiring less skill and in work in which women are concentrated.

The rate for operatives (semi-skilled) rose from 4.1 to 5.3 percent over the year. The rate for non-farm laborers increased from 6.8 to 9.2 percent.

15% Social Security Hike Cleared for Senate Action

'CONSUMERS CHAMPION' was the title given former Sen. Paul Douglas (D-Ill.) by Assistant Sec. of Labor Esther Peterson (right) in introducing him to Consumer Assembly '67, meeting in Washington. Measure Expands On House Benefits

By David L. Perlman

A social security bill vastly improved over the House-passed measure was cleared by the Senate Finance Committee and will be debated by the Senate during the week of Nov. 13.

It contained the 15 percent across-the-board benefit increase sought by Pres. Johnson and strongly supported by the AFL-CIO. The House had voted only 12.5 percent.

It raised the minimum benefit from $44 to $70. The House had set it at $50.

And it provides a higher taxable wage base and a gradual rise in the tax rate to finance higher benefits—but not to pile up an unneeded surplus as a backdoor substitute for a general tax increase.

The financing provisions proved the last obstacle to committee clearance of the bill. Initially the Senate committee had voted a steep first-year boost in the social security payroll tax—a Republican-sponsored move which would have brought in $2 billion more than needed to pay benefits.

AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller protested sharply in a telegram to committee members declaring:

"The AFL-CIO is firmly opposed to over-financing the improvements in the social security bill . . . We support adequate increases in rates and the wage base to soundly finance improved benefits. But we reject the use of social security financing to meet the nation's short-term fiscal problems.

"Over-financing social security is no substitute for a surtax. It will bring no extra general revenue income. It puts the burden of sacrifice solely on those required to make social security contributions.

"It is unfair, fiscally irresponsible

Senate Bill Bars Hiring Age Limits

The Senate voted to outlaw job discrimination against older workers.

It passed by unanimous voice vote a labor-backed bill covering workers and job applicants between the ages of 40 and 65. A similar bill has been approved by the House Education & Labor Committee.

The legislation contains a congressional finding that the setting of arbitrary age limits by employers, regardless of the job requirements, "has become a common practice." Congress found that older workers displaced from their jobs are "severely disadvantaged" in finding other employment and "their numbers are great and growing."

To correct this, the bill bars employers, employment agencies and unions from discriminating in any phase of employment—including hiring, firing and wage rates—on the basis of age. It specifically bars help wanted ads setting an age limit.

The only exception granted is

As Funds Run Out:

Coalition Threatens Poverty Programs

A sharply-divided House debated the fate of the three-year-old war on poverty as projects ranging from Head Start for preschool children to Neighborhood Youth Corps programs in dozens of cities were forced to shut down for lack of funds.

Some neighborhood projects continued without money—carried on by volunteers who were helped with food and lodging by the poor people they were serving.

As protests mounted, the Republican-led coalition which dominates the House relented and debate on the poverty bill was interrupted to permit passage of a resolution allowing payments to anti-poverty workers, VISTA volunteers and Job Corps enrollees for another week.

Only the hard core of the conservative coalition in the House called for outright abandonment of the anti-poverty effort. But amendments were on the House floor, as the AFL-CIO News went to press, which would chop up the Office of Economic Opportunity and scatter bits and pieces of the anti-poverty programs to old-line federal agencies — without adequate funds to carry them on.

OEO Dir. Sargent Shriver said that if the anti-poverty budget is slashed as heavily as its foes are seeking he will quit his post. He said it would be "a delusion of the poor" and "a deception to the general public" to pretend that "something substantial" could be done without sufficient money to remedy "lack of education, lack of health, lack of justice, lack of housing, lack of opportunity."

The bill before the House carries a spending ceiling of $2.06 billion, the amount requested by Pres. Johnson. The Senate has already passed a bill authorizing $2.26 billion for an expanded program.

House budget-slashers were talking of knocking the program down as low as $1.2 billion and Chairman

Study Finds Mixture Of Negro Gains, Needs

By Robert B. Cooney

Some Negroes in America are making "substantial" progress while others remain trapped in the slums, their living conditions unchanged or deteriorating.

This mixed picture, while it may have been apparent to many, was verified in a statistical study ordered by Pres. Johnson in the wake of the ghetto riots of this past summer.

In releasing the report, "Social and Economic Conditions of Negroes in the United States," Pres. Johnson made this comment:

"This report, as I view it, backs up neither of the extreme positions that emerged in the wake of the summer disturbances.

"It does not confirm the diagnosis of bleakness and despair: that there has been no recent progress for Negroes in America and that violence is therefore a logical remedy. It does not confirm the opposite view: that 'Negroes have been given too much.'

"We know those views to be fruitless. This report shows them to be false as well."

The 97-page study was prepared by the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics and the Commerce Dept.'s Bureau of the Census. It pulled together information on how the Negro has fared in recent years

Public TV Law Signed, Labor Funds Pledged

Pres. Johnson signed into law an AFL-CIO supported bill establishing a Corporation for Public Broadcasting to channel both federal and private funds into better noncommercial television and radio programs.

Two unions were among the first private groups to pledge financial support to the new corporation. The Auto Workers pledged a $25,000 contribution and the Communication Workers pledged a $100,000 check to back up its expression of support for the new program.

The CWA board termed the establishment of the public broadcasting corporation "one of the greatest accomplishments of the century."

While the federal government has provided grants for construction of broadcast facilities by education stations, the new program represents the first contribution to programming expenses.

The bill signed by the President authorizes $9 million in first-year funds, although the money still must be appropriated by Congress. It also authorizes additional construction funds and a study of educational uses of television and radio.

DELEGATES TO a Consumer Assembly '67 in Washington, including many representatives of unions, joined in formation of a new Consumer Federation of America—a national organization that will permit consumer groups to speak with "one voice."

President Hails Action:

Consumer Assembly Sets Up Federation

Consumer Assembly '67, meeting in Washington, has taken a step toward strengthening the voice of American consumers.

The assembly, sponsored by 63 national organizations, including the AFL-CIO, established a new Consumer Federation of America to give mushrooming consumer groups the chance to speak with one "loud and clear" voice.

After endorsing the united consumers lobby, Pres. Johnson chose those descriptive words in appealing for "grass roots" support for vital consumer bills in Congress.

The President, who made an unscheduled appearance before the assembly, was backed in his appeal by other national leaders, who also pointed out that long-suffering consumers are at last beginning to be heard.

Speakers included Betty Furness, the President's assistant for consumer affairs; Ralph Nader, author and safety critic; Senators Gaylord Nelson (D-Wis.), Lee Metcalf (D-Mont.), Daniel B. Brewster (D-Md.); Representatives Wright Patman (D-Tex.) and Leonor K. Sullivan (D-Mo.), and former Sen. Paul Douglas (D-Ill.).

Strong Participation

The growing strength of consumers was evidenced in participation that nearly doubled the 32 organizations sponsoring the first Consumer Assembly in 1966. Some 500 delegates took part in this year's meeting.

Panels during the two-day meeting covering the soaring cost of medicine and the widespread charges of "scandalous" auto insurance practices drew strong attention.

Formation of CFA was announced at the assembly by the Rev. Robert J. McEwen, a member of the President's Consumer Advisory Council and chairman of Boston College's economic department. More than 30 state and local consumer groups announced plans to affiliate with CFA.

Jacob Clayman, administrative director of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., was named president of CFA. Robert Smith, assistant director of Consumers Union, is secretary-treasurer. McEwen is vice president.

CFA's platform emphasized it would seek reform in the nation's productive and distributive systems until they become fully attentive to "eyes and ears of consumers."

The organization will serve as a clearing house for consumer information, act as legal and research arm for the consumer movement and—as McEwen put it—become an advocate before Congress and federal agencies "on issues of consumer importance."

The officers and an 11-member board were named temporarily. Permanent officers will be elected next spring. Board members include legislative directors of two unions: John J. Sheehan, Steelworkers, and Robert D. Bollard, State, County & Municipal Employes.

Johnson urged citizens to press members of Congress for passage of 12 major consumer bills, including truth in lending, a measure to strengthen the Flammable Fabrics Act and minimum safety standards for gas pipelines.

Noting that economy has become a "by-word," he added, these should be among the first bills passed. The cost to the taxpayer is virtually nothing. The savings to the consumer are in untold grief and millions of dollars."

"It has been said that the consumer lobby is the most widespread in our land, yet the least powerful. I disagree," he continued.

"But you can only wield the power you have if you make yourselves heard. You have the interest, you have the organization, you have the numbers."

He also called on consumer groups to bring pressures for his 10 percent tax surcharge and against import quota bills.

'Becoming Aware'

Miss Furness pointed out that many of the assembly's delegates had "helped to lay the groundwork" for past consumer legislation and the bills in Congress. "Through your efforts the consumer is becoming aware of his needs," she declared.

But, she added, the need now is to make the consumer "understand that his voice is potent. He can use it to get what he wants. He can use it to make Congress give him what he wants."

Douglas—introduced by Asst. Sec. of Labor Esther Peterson as "the all-time champion of the consumer"—closed the conference with an address reminiscing over past efforts for consumers going back to the 1930's.

Consumer groups have not prevailed in the past because their interests have been "fragmented" in contrast to the producers' "concentrating theirs," Douglas said. But he looked for CSA to reverse that situation. "You have turned a most important corner," he concluded.

Major Negro Gains Contrasted With Stark Need of City Ghettos

in income, employment, education, housing, living conditions and health, family life and in slum living.

While the facts of the new study clear the air of the more extreme charges swirling around the Negro—from the left and the right—the facts also spotlight the distressing and dangerous conditions of the slums. The explosive nature of the problem lies in the well-known phenomenon that, where conditions are obviously improving for some, this very improvement makes clear to those left behind how bad off they are and how unnecessary it is. This comparison sows bitterness, frustration and, finally, violence.

The great contrast is pointed up by the study's findings that many Negro families have successfully climbed out of poverty and many have moved into the middle-income category. Last year, some 151,000 non-white families moved above the poverty line. Today, over 28 percent of Negro families have incomes exceeding $7,000 a year—twice as many as seven years ago. Outside the South, 38 percent have incomes above $7,000.

Then the study observes:

"But perhaps the most distressing evidence presented in this report indicates that conditions are stagnant or deteriorating in the poorest areas.

"About half a million poor Negro families—10 percent of the total—have lived all their lives in rural areas with very limited opportunities for improvement in education, employment, housing or income.

"Another 10 percent—half a million Negro families—have incomes below the poverty line and live in poor neighborhoods of large central cities. This tenth lives in comparatively wretched conditions: many have poor housing; a sizable proportion are 'broken families'; they are at the bottom of the job ladder; and they have the highest unemployment rates."

In specific terms, the study reports on a "dramatic" unevenness in Negro progress in the Cleveland area.

Five-Year Gains

"Outside of the poor neighborhoods in Cleveland, Negro families made major gains between 1960 and 1965. Average incomes rose, the incidence of poverty and the number of broken families were reduced.

"But in the poorest neighborhoods, all of these social indicators showed decline.

"In Hough, which is one of the worst of the poor neighborhoods, the incidence of poverty increased, the proportion of broken homes increased and the male unemployment rate was virtually unchanged. A similar study was made in various neighborhoods in South Los Angeles after the riot in Watts several years ago and showed much the same pattern."

The study summed up the nature of the change in this fashion:

"Despite the general improvement in the conditions of life for Negroes nationally, conditions have grown worse in places like Hough and Watts.

"As Negro families succeed, they tend to move out of these economically and socially depressed areas to better neighborhoods where they and their children have the opportunity to lead a better life. They leave behind increasing problems of deprivation in the heart of our largest cities."

Mixed Conclusion

The report concluded that the facts show "a mixture of sound and substantial progress on the one hand, and large unfulfilled needs on the other."

Pres. Johnson, while hailing the "substantial progress" reflected in the statistics, also focused attention on the issue of big city slums:

"In the urban area—large cities particularly—as I have pointed out time and time again, the nation faces a major problem. Successful Negroes are moving out of the worst slum areas, leaving behind communities that are inhabited largely by the deprived, the unskilled, the handicapped and new immigrants from the rural South.

"It makes all the more urgent that the federal programs for reclaiming these slums be adequately funded. We must put our country first by giving top priority to the problems of our cities. This must be without regard to party or politics."

The study made these points:

- While Negro family income remains low compared to the rest of the nation, both white and Negro incomes are at an all-time high and the gap has narrowed during the past year.

While Negro family income is only 58 percent of white income, a majority of Negro families live in the South where incomes are far below the national average and job chances for them are more restricted.

In the Northeast region, the median or mid-point income level of Negro families is $5,400—two-thirds the white median. In the North Central area, the median Negro family income is $5,900—about three-fourths the white median.

- Jobless rates for non-whites are still double those of whites, but the rates for both groups have dropped dramatically. In the past five years, the jobless rate for Negro married men—the breadwinners in three-fourths of Negro homes—fell faster than the rate for white married men and now stands at about 3.5 percent.

Still Lack Jobs

However, despite this bright sign, non-white males are more likely to be "not in the labor force"—neither working nor looking for work.

The Negro teenage jobless rate continues very high at 26 percent, the study added.

While the nation's jobless rate stood at 3.5 percent in November of 1966, the estimated jobless rate in nine slum areas was nearly triple at 9.3 percent.

The sub-employment rate—reflecting part-time work, discouraged workers and low-paid workers—was 33 percent in 1966 in the "worst" areas of nine large cities, the study reported.

Job Training Plan Renewed In New York

A "highly successful" program to train disadvantaged workers in New York — involving labor-employer cooperation—has been extended into its second year under a new $604,462 federal contract, Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz reported.

The program is conducted by Skill Advancement, Inc., a nonprofit organization established jointly by Cornell University, the Puerto Rican Forum and the New York Urban League. Funding is made possible by the Manpower Development & Training Act.

Among unions cooperating in the program, the Labor Dept. said, are State, County & Municipal Employes Dist. Council 37; Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union Local 1199; and Hotel & Restaurant Employes Local 164.

As evidence of the program's first-year success, Wirtz pointed out that about 1,800 low-skilled workers—mostly Negroes and Puerto Ricans—have been promoted to higher-paying jobs after completing a 40-hour course.

Glass Union Wins Award For Anti-Litter Program

New York—The Glass Bottle Blowers has received the first Keep America Beautiful Labor Award in recognition of the union's effective campaign to combat litter.

The award was present here to GBBA Pres. Lee W. Minton by Pres. Reuben L. Perin, of Keep America Beautiful, Inc., a national non-profit, public service organization.

Perin said the labor award, which will be presented annually from now on, has been established to mark the growing interests unions are showing in litter-prevention.

The Glass Bottle Blowers was named recipient of the 1967 award for the "effective anti-litter activities of more than 50 of the union's locals" that have worked closely with employers in litter-prevention programs.

Noting that union members "have literally rolled up their sleeves to fight litter," Perin told how they have conducted clean-up drives, distributed litter bags, held anti-litter contests and shown litter-prevention films to schools.

Closes Canadian Gap:

Auto Workers Win Chrysler Accord

Detroit—The Auto Workers and Chrysler Corp. reached tentative agreement on a new three-year contract just a few hours before a midnight Nov. 8 strike deadline set by the union.

The agreement, covering 95,000 production and maintenance employes of Chrysler, parallels the union's earlier settlement with Ford Motor Co., UAW Pres. Walter P. Reuther reported, but adds a provision to bring the pay of Chrysler's Canadian workers to the U.S. level over a two and one-half year span.

He called attention to pension provisions that will assure retirement security for thousands of Chrysler workers. Under the agreement, high seniority employes who since 1958 have suffered extended layoffs ranging up to four years will be made whole on their pension credits.

The Chrysler terms, the union and the company said, are similiar to those approved by Ford workers after a two-month strike.

The Ford settlement contained a wage increase package valued by the union at 58 cents an hour for production workers over the contract term, with skilled workers receiving increases averaging $1.02. Other provisions included cost-of-living adjustments ranging from 6 to 16 cents an hour, a $1 raise in the basic pension factor, major health plan improvements, and a new guaranteed income credit plan providing 52 weeks of income at 95 percent of takehome pay during layoffs, minus $7.50 a week for reduced travel-meal expenses.

UAW negotiators at Chrysler, headed by Douglas Fraser, returned to the bargaining table, meanwhile, in an effort to wrap up a separate contract covering some 8,000 white collar workers.

Fraser said he hoped to be in a position to schedule a meeting of the union's Chrysler Council on Nov. 12 to work out ratification procedures.

Some 35,000 Chrysler workers at 10 plants struck the company before the tentative national agreement was announced, but these walkouts were laid primarily to local plant issues. Local contracts remained unsettled in 36 of the 60 bargaining units composed of hourly paid workers and in 46 of the 76 units of salaried workers.

Still unsettled is the union's contract with General Motors, largest of the Big 3 auto producers employing some 400,000 UAW members.

ON STRIKE against Schatz Federal Bearing Co., Poughkeepsie, N.Y. for the past ten months, members of Auto Workers Local 297 are determined "to hold the line" until they win a satisfactory settlement of their contract dispute.

Schatz Bearing Strikers Solid In 10th Month

Poughkeepsie, N. Y.—Some 835 members of the Auto Workers entered the tenth month of a bitter strike at Schatz Federal Bearing Co. here determined to "hold the line" until they get a fair settlement in their contract dispute.

Pres. Ralph Losee of striking UAW Local 297 pointed out in a statement that "there has been not a single defection from our ranks," even though the company has continued limited production with supervisory employes.

Losee reported, however, that the workers have suffered severely from the long walkout. "We need all the financial assistance we can get and we need everyone to stop buying Schatz bearings," he said.

Talks Stalled

The strike began Feb. 1 after two months of what the union described as "management-stalled" negotiations proved fruitless and the company refused any further negotiations. Management also spurned a mediator's efforts to head off the strike, Losee pointed out.

At issue are the local's proposals for improvements in wages, pensions, vacations, holidays, seniority and other benefits—which the union says are "inferior" when compared to provisions of contracts governing workers in competitive bearing plants.

After UAW reached a settlement at Ford Motor Co., a Schatz official suggested that it might be a basis for an agreement here. Losee said the union immediately offered to accept wage rate and benefits at Ford but it "hasn't heard from the company since."

High Court Reverses ILA Injunction, Fine

The U.S. Supreme Court has unanimously reversed a lower court injunction and $100,000-a-day contempt fine against a Longshoremen's local. The high court found that an arbitrator's award and the anti-strike order both were too vague.

The case grew out of a 1965 dispute between ILA Local 1291 and the Philadelphia Marine Trade Association, an employers' bargaining unit, involving pay for longshoremen who are held back from work after being called for duty.

The union contended that workers were entitled to four hours pay under their contract when "set back" by unfavorable weather. The employers said they should get only one hour's pay. The dispute went to an arbitrator who upheld the employer.

Later, when some longshoremen refused to work over the issue, the employers obtained an injunction from U.S. District Judge Ralph C. Body in Philadelphia. Judge Body found the union and its officers in contempt and levied the fines following later scattered strikes.

The union's attorney asked Judge Body for clarification of his order but was told he would have to determine what it meant. The Third Circuit Appeals Court upheld the district court.

In its unanimous opinion, written by Justice Potter Stewart, the Supreme Court found that the arbitrator's award contained "only an abstract conclusion of law, not an operative command capable of 'enforcement.'"

As for Judge Body's order, the high court ruled that it violated the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure's requirement that an injunction "shall be specific in terms, shall describe in reasonable detail . . . the act or acts sought to be restrained."

The court did not rule on the ILA's contention that the injunction violated the Norris-LaGuardia Act's restrictions on issuing labor injunctions. Justice William O. Douglas, in a separate opinion, said the order should have been interpreted under Norris-LaGuardia. But he also voted to reverse the contempt finding.

In another action, the court denied review in five cases advanced by the Railroad Trainmen. All involved appeals of decisions by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia involving the 1963 compulsory arbitration award.

In four cases, BRT contended that the arbitration board illegally delegated its function to special boards on individual railroads, and further that these boards did not conduct their proceedings in conformity with provisions of the Railway Labor Act.

In the fifth, BRT wanted the court to declare that the board no longer existed. Other cases involving the arbitration award, including one that will determine the future course of BRT negotiations on crew consist, are still in litigation.

In another area, the Supreme Court for the fifth time since 1961 struck down a state's loyalty oath required of state employes. The latest oath to fall was Maryland's. Previously, oaths of Florida, Washington, Arizona and New York were voided.

Maryland's loyalty oath, based on a 1949 law known as the Ober Act, required all state employes, including teachers, to swear under penalty of perjury that they are not "in one way or another" engaged in an attempt to overthrow the state or national government by force or violence.

The law was challenged by Prof. Howard J. Whitehill of Johns Hopkins University, who was denied employment by the University of Maryland when he refused to sign the oath.

A 6-to-3 decision written by Justice William O. Douglas concluded that the law violated the First Amendment. It stressed that no employe could know what really was meant by "in one way or another."

The court also attacked two sections of the Ober Act itself, which attempt to define who is to be considered a "subversive person."

Rail Firemen Launch Drive for Wage Hikes

Cleveland—The Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen have served notices on the nation's major railroads calling for wage increases, minimum daily earnings, a cost-of-living clause and improved benefits.

The union, representing 38,000 firemen and enginemen, served its notices, effective Nov. 1, under the Railway Labor Act. Managements have 10 days to reply and initial conferences must be held within 30 days.

Under the law, unions have open-end contracts with employers. Most pacts contain moratoriums during which new notices may not be served. BLF&E's moratorium has expired in an agreement which last provided wage increases in August 1966.

Firemen's Pres. H. E. Gilbert announced here that the notices seek a 12.5 percent increase for employes on passen-er and freight trains and raises of 15.5 percent for members in yard service, plus a hike in all basic daily rates of 72 cents.

He said the union also asks for a minimum daily rate of $35 for engineers and $30 for firemen and hostlers. The latter employes move diesels between shops and assignments to trains.

No minimums exist under the present agreement.

The union proposes cost-of-living adjustments beginning June 1, 1968, based on the Labor Dept.'s consumer price index. A 3-cent-an-hour adjustment is sought for each nine-tenths of 1 percent rise in the index. Adjustments would be made every three months.

The notices also call for improved vacations ranging up to five weeks after 20 years service, double time for overtime, and a night differential of 20 cents an hour for work between 6 p.m. and 6 a.m.

In reporting on the notices, Gilbert noted that BLF&E is currently trying to secure national negotiations on health and welfare benefits and rules notices served earlier this year.

Changes sought in the health-welfare program include full coverage for dependent children, payment of physicians fees for both hospital and office visits, improvements in injury and life insurance benefits, and full payment of premiums by employers.

AFL-CIO Organizer John Maurillo Dies

Syracuse, N. Y.—John Maurillo, 58, veteran member of the AFL-CIO organizing staff in New York, died at his home here Nov. 3. He was a member of the Brewery Workers.

Maurillo was on the CIO organizing staff for 16 years and continued on the AFL-CIO staff following the merger in 1955. During his long career, he helped organize in retail, leather goods, paper, steel, shoe, packing, clothing and other industries.

Mexican Labor Alerted On 'Runaway' Problem

Mexico City—The AFL-CIO is "firmly resolved" to combat the mounting problem of U.S. manufacturers fleeing to Mexico to exploit low wages for greater profits, AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Herman D. Kenin emphasized here.

Kenin, president of the Musicians, spoke as AFL-CIO fraternal delegate to the eighth National Congress of the Confederation of Workers of Mexico.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council has called for repeal of a section of the tariff code that permits the runaway plants to take advantage of lower wages in Mexico to ship their products back into the U.S. at a reduced tariff.

Also, it has called upon the U.S. "to establish a general policy" of opposition to the runaway operations and to bar assistance and advice "to the foreign movement of plants that result in the loss of jobs."

Kenin, in discussing the problem, observed that "our own workers and those of Mexico will have won very little, if our gains are to be made at the expense of workers elsewhere."

While fighting the runaway movement, labor "entirely supports" current efforts by a U.S.-Mexican development commission to create new industries and expand old ones along the border, Kenin stressed.

"This kind of program will result in mutual benefit to workers of both countries," he asserted.

N.Y. Sessions Explore Union Arts Programs

New York—Twenty representatives of unions here attended a one-day workshop conducted by the New York State School of Industrial Relations on preparing and presenting programs in the arts.

The workshop, "Labor Explores the Arts," concentrated on informing the participants where to find materials for arts classes and how to make these classes interesting.

The workshop also supplied the participants with details on organizing tours of performing and creative arts centers that feature art exhibits, drama and classical and jazz music.

Organizations represented included the Meat Cutters; Clothing Workers; Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union; Hospital Employes Union; the Manhattan-Bronx Postal Union, and the Council of Scientific, Professional & Cultural Employes.

Warning Signal on Jobs

THE NATION'S ECONOMY flashed a caution signal last month that while employment keeps moving upward there is an increasingly larger number of persons unsuccessfully seeking jobs.

This seeming contradiction shows up in comparison of what's happened to employment and unemployment in the past 12 months. Since October 1966 the number of persons with jobs has increased 1.4 million. In the same 12-month period the number of unemployed has risen 500,000.

Labor Dept. economists explain this in terms of "unusually large labor force increases," meaning simply that more persons are looking for jobs in an economy that has marked 80 months of almost consecutive gain in economic growth.

The increases in the labor force registered 1.9 million persons, according to the Labor Dept. report, with most of it coming in the last three months. The unemployment rate of 3.8 percent in August—the same as in October 1966—moved to 4.1 in September and 4.3 in October, reflecting the surge of new persons looking for employment.

The "why" of the labor force increase is not touched on in the government report, but several reasons come to mind in looking back at economic developments of the past year.

For one thing, the rise in living costs has put new pressure on many families living on tight budgets. This may have touched off a move for women or teenage members of the families to hunt jobs to supplement the family's income.

Secondly, as documented recently by the Labor Dept. in its city's workers budget study, there is a continuing effort by families to improve their standard of living, to reach the "moderate" standard projected by the government report. This, too, may result in additional members of the family entering the job market to add to family income and help achieve family goals.

Thirdly, there is the influx of jobseekers stemming from the post-war baby boom.

There is of course a continuing pull toward the labor market in a period of growth attracting persons to shortage areas, etc.

An analysis by industry reveals that all sectors, with the exception of construction, showed a rise in unemployment rates over the 12-month period; durable goods manufacturing remained unchanged. A year ago construction was in a slump because of tight money, high interest rate policies.

An analysis by occupations discloses that unemployment rates have moved up in all divisions except for professional and managerial employes and skilled workers, the rates for semi-skilled, unskilled and service workers rising more sharply than the rest—especially unskilled workers, who tend to be teenagers.

It all adds up to a situation in which the nation's economy is moving ahead at a goodly clip but cannot absorb all of the women and teenagers seeking employment, those who tend to bring limited or no skills to the job market.

With 75 million persons gainfully employed, 1.7 million working parttime and 3 million unemployed, the nation obviously is in pretty good economic shape. But unless the trend of the past few months is reversed and the new jobseekers find employment, there could be trouble ahead.

Expert Proposes 'Basic Protection':

New Auto Insurance Concept Urged to End 'Jungle' System

The following is excerpted from remarks by Prof. Jeffrey O'Connell of the University of Illinois at the Consumer Assembly '67.

The years since World War II have revealed two crises of grossly inadequate private insurance coverage—medical insurance for the aged and automobile insurance.

The stubborn and totally unrealistic opposition of the medical profession and the insurance industry to changes in the clearly inadequate medical insurance for the aged resulted eventually in that opposition being swept aside by the Congress when it enacted medicare. Similarly, the gross inadequacies of automobile insurance are sure to be corrected by legislation.

What are the problems of the present system, and what kind of changes should be made.?

Prof. Robert Keeton of the Harvard Law School and I propose a plan which we call the "basic protection plan" under which the bulk of automobile insurance claims would be paid as fire insurance claims are paid—by one's own insurance company, for out-of-pocket loss and without regard to anyone's fault. Just as your fire insurance company pays for the loss you suffer when your house burns, regardless of whether you were careless with a lighted cigarette, so, under the basic protection plan, your automobile insurance company would pay you for out-of-pocket loss, regardless of negligence. (But just as fire insurance doesn't cover intentionally burning your house, so one who intentionally injures himself in a traffic accident would not be paid.)

Basic protection is an extension of the idea of the medical payments coverage one can buy in an automobile insurance policy today.

A person injured in an automobile accident would be reimbursed for doctor bills, hospital bills, and the like, and also for lost wages. The insurance company would be required to pay month by month, as losses occurred, rather than delaying until the injured person and the company could agree on a lump sum settlement.

The second main feature of the plan is that a new law would do away with claims based on negligence unless the damages were higher than $5,000 for pain and suffering or $10,000 for all other items such as medical expense and wage loss. This would mean that all but a very small percentage of the claims for personal injuries in automobile accidents would be handled entirely under the new basic protection coverage.

The fundamental difficulty with present automobile insurance is that you can be paid after a traffic accident only by making a claim (1) against the other driver's insurance company, (2) on the basis that such other driver was at fault in causing the accident and that you were blameless, and (3) for a completely uncertain amount that includes not only out-of-pocket loss but payment for pain and suffering—whatever that is "worth" in money. The result is that all traffic claims today are dominated by attitudes of distrust and even outright hostility . . .

The present system not only clogs our courts but is highly wasteful and expensive. Studies show that $2.20 must be paid in for each dollar that is paid out to an injured accident victim. The system leaves many victims either totally uncompensated or with only a fraction of their loss paid.

SUPPOSE THAT instead of proposing to apply a system like fire insurance to automobile insurance, I were to suggest the opposite—namely applying the auto insurance system to fire insurance? After a fire, a victim could be paid for his loss:

1—Only if he could prove that someone else was at fault or that he was free from fault (e.g., if he had failed to reshingle his roof with fire resistant materials, he couldn't recover, with all the attendant problems of proof.)

2—Only after he had hired a lawyer to press a claim against someone else's insurance company which felt no loyalty toward him.

3—Only after months or—more likely—years of delay.

4—Only after squabbling over a totalling indeterminate amount (for example, assume after a fire a homeowner would be entitled to claim not only for his out-of-pocket loss, such as the market value of his burned couch, but also for his pain and suffering arising from the fact that his beloved Aunt Minnie gave him the couch, with all the attendant problems of proof here, too).

No one would ever agree to trade the present fire insurance system for the jungle I have just outlined. And yet, in essence, is not that just what those who propose to retain the present system are suggesting for auto insurance?

Isn't it time we paid the traffic accident victim like the victim of fire—promptly, graciously and fairly, and without having to pay a third of what he is paid to a lawyer?

New 'Moderate' Family Budget:

BLS Studies Show Living Costs Not Related to Local Pay Rates

By Sidney Margolius

IF LIVING COSTS in your town are higher than average, you can't blame it on the pay rates local workers get. There is little relationship between pay scales and local living costs, analysis of the Bureau of Labor Statistics' new "moderate budget" for a family of four proves.

Living costs in some of the highest-pay cities such as Detroit, Cleveland and Pittsburgh, are no higher than average, and in some cases are even below average. In reverse, in New York and Boston, the two most expensive cities (except for Honolulu, costliest of all), workers earn no more than average or even less. Even in the same state, Texas, factory workers in Houston earn a husky 27 percent more than in Dallas, which has similar and even higher living costs.

Some high-pay cities have a little higher than average living costs, such as Seattle, Buffalo and San Francisco. But the higher pay far outweighs the higher living costs.

But living costs and wages are lower in the South. But Southern living costs actually are not quite as low compared to other areas as the BLS estimates indicate. The BLS used a lower-cost food pattern in pricing food costs in the South on the basis that this is the traditional or "preferred" pattern.

The food items priced for the South provide the same level of nutritional adequacy, explains Helen H. Lamale, chief of the Cost of Living Studies Division. But they include more poultry, fish and pork, and less beef, and also fewer already-prepared foods, especially bakery products.

The experts who made up the budget feel that this is a preferred eating and cooking pattern in the South. But since the regional differences in food buying have lessened in recent years, to some extent they may be due merely to lower income. Southern workers may not prefer Southern chicken to a beef roast. Maybe chicken is just cheaper.

Living costs are a good $1,000 a year lower in small towns than in large ones, on the average. But here, too, living costs show significant variations that bear investigating by community organizations. Some smaller cities are as expensive as the big towns in their area.

Study of the budget figures provides some useful guidelines to questions families often ask about budgeting. But keep in mind that you may not be able to spend as much as even this "moderate" budget provided for its mythical family of four with children under 15.

How much should you spend for food? If you're a typical wage-earner, you can't spend as much as the $181 a month allowed for the family of four in this budget. As previously indicated, you probably would have to keep your food bills under $5 a day for a family of four, or under $150 a month.

Does the budget allow much for dining out? Not really. The new "moderate" budget allows for a family dinner out about once a month. The former "modest" budget standard allowed for dining out about five times a year.

What should we allow for clothes? The new BLS budget allows $756 a year for the four people ($767 in cities, $709 in smaller towns). Papa's estimated clothing bill is $174; mother's $187 (not really much higher); the 13-year-old boy's, $168; the 8-year-old girl's, $154. Beat these figures, if you can, by shopping at sales.

What's a reasonable recreation budget? Let's face it: the recreation budget is limited even on the $9,000-$10,000 pretax income required for this moderate standard of living. The recreation allowance is about $25 a month for this particular size and age family.

THE NEW BUDGET cost is far beyond the reach of most working people, including most white-collar families, too. The $10,000 price tag on the American standard of living compares with current average earnings of factory production workers of less than $6,000 a year ($114.50 a week), and of all workers $5,360 ($103.06 a week).

The new standard would cost $9,191, including income taxes, on the average for the country, but $9,376 in metropolitan areas and $8,366 in nonmetropolitan areas. However, the budget was priced a year ago. Since then, living cost increases of almost 3 percent make the present costs approximately $9,439 for the country as a whole, $9,630 in large cities, and $8,592 in smaller cities.

The budget reflects the fact that more people now own homes instead of renting. It does allow a car for workers in New York and Boston as well as other cities. Most of all it provides a little better food allowance than the previous standard, which was a low-cost food budget.

The most serious omission is the lack of any provision for education for the children beyond high school. The budget allows just $60 a year for "school and college." This rules out any saving for college by the parents.

While the new budget allows for more dental care than the older one, the total medical allowance still does not provide the full cost if your employer does not pay part of your medical insurance. The amount allotted includes only the worker's contribution towards this expense. Thus, for people who do not have health insurance partly paid by employers, the budget would cost still more.

The new budget does show one saving that reflects changing times. The number of haircuts allowed for the boy of the family has been reduced to one every four weeks (if you can get him to the barber that often).

If you have more children than two, or they are older than 16, your costs for this moderate standard would be much higher. The cost would be 13 percent more if the children are over 16. For a five person family with three school-age children the budget would cost 16 percent more, or $10,950. With four children you should be an executive, with an income of at least $13,800. And you would still have to make omelets and watch the meat.

41 States Lack 'Sound' Laws:

Better Bargaining Machinery Urged for Public Employes

BETTER COLLECTIVE BARGAINING machinery for employes of state and local governments is a major goal of the State, County & Municipal Employes, the union's president declared in a network radio interview.

"By 1970, 25 percent of the workforce, is going to be in local and state governments," said Jerry Wurf, yet "only nine states have reasonable statutes which develop some kind of mechanism for a labor-management relationship."

That means "we have 41 states in which to get sound statutes," Wurf said as he was questioned by reporters on Labor News Conference, broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EST, on the Mutual Radio Network.

Wurf, who was a delegate to the recent conference of Public Services Intl. in Paris, said that while labor-management relations in government employment are older and more sophisticated in Europe than in the United States, the concept is winning wider acceptance here.

"Five years ago, one constantly encountered a refusal to deal on basic philosophical grounds," Wurf said. "Now, the right to strike is what is being discussed," he noted.

"Painful as the situation is at times, it is an important step forward," he asserted.

WURF ALSO pointed out that the public sector is one of the few areas today with job opportunities for unskilled workers, particularly in hospitals and highway work. He said that the union is working "very hard and very successfully" with hard-core poverty area residents to get them not only jobs, but also the "opportunity to upgrade themselves, in terms of responsibility, and position, and salary, and status."

Reporters questioning him on the AFL-CIO produced public affairs program were Stanley Levey of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers and Murray Seeger of Newsweek magazine.

To Spread 'Birchfacts':

Far Right's Spending Tops Both Parties

The following is excerpted from "Homefront," the monthly publication of the Institute for American Democracy, a year-old organization working to focus attention on the threat to democracy from the extremists of the right and left.

AS EVERY ERIC HOFFER READER knows, to a Bircher, nothing is more important than a "Birchfact." That accounts for the extremist compulsion to discredit their foes, force acceptance of their views.

Driving home Birchtype "facts" takes the big share of the $30 million which Group Research, Inc., projections indicated the Far, Far Right takes in and spends annually.

The combined national budgets of the 100 or so significant Far Right groups exceed the combined national budgets of both major political parties.

Much of the money goes for a paid staff, including field organizers. The Birchers and their allies also produce more films, books, pamphlets, magazines and tapes than the two national parties. Just one unsigned Birch film, Anarchy—U.S.A., has 400 prints in circulation.

They'll help "resolve" our policy problems on Viet Nam by convincing citizens the Administration has "a deliberate 'no win' policy."

They will show that "liberalism equals socialism equals communism" and, in the same breath, demand the end of mental health programs, medicare, and the graduated income tax.

They will attempt to eliminate the appeals for social action in Protestant, Catholic and Jewish groups by trying to besmirch the reputations of these religious bodies.

Driving home these basic attitudes will be the hundreds of voices of the John Birch Society, Liberty Lobby, Americans for Constitutional Action, Hargis Christian Crusade, the McIntire complex, H. L. Hunt, et al.

Those harkening to these voices are campaigning now for county, city and especially school board spots. These are the groups which captured the GOP convention and gave it to Barry Goldwater four years ago. They are back again with more money, more knowhow, and a bigger professional force.

Their speakers now crisscross the nation. They fan the flames of white backlash, demand the expulsion of the UN, call for Earl Warren's impeachment, shout you can't trust Uncle Sam.

When the Birchtype speaker comes to town, somebody has to identify him for who he is and what he represents. When the "Birchfacts" are flying, somebody has to supply the cleansing truth. Somebody has to shine a light on extremist tactics, nationally and locally.

IN THE 1940's the Communist Party and fronts had more influence than the Radical Right. The pendulum can always swing their way again. Indeeed, both extremes can grow at the expense of the middle.

The professional "anti-communists" are just that—professionals. They join the professional "anti-fascists" in the mutual assault on the middle ground. By giving the domestic communists attributes they do not possess, they steer the malcontents their way.

We must have responsible criticism of the Far, Far Left. The real foes of communism are the church, civic and labor groups who actually came to grips with this extremist threat while the Welches of the land were still peddling fudge.

For the economic extremists, the ends-justify-the-means philosophy usually just covers character assassination. For the racial extremists, it covers assassination—period.

All segments of our society must understand there is no great difference between Ku Klux Klansmen killing Jewish and Negro social workers in Mississippi and RAM "hero" Robert Williams openly calling for insurrection from his sanctuary in Communist China.

When Minutemen or Black Muslims set up gun caches and train their private militia, they both court the same explosive answer to what must be settled through communication. Democracy cannot function well enough at gunpoint.

IMPROVED COLLECTIVE BARGAINING machinery for state and local government workers is a major goal of the State, County & Municipal Employes, Pres. Jerry Wurf (center) said on Labor News Conference. Questioning him were Stanley Levey (left) of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers and Murray Seeger of Newsweek magazine. The AFL-CIO produced interview is broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EST, on the Mutual Radio Network.

Joblessness Cited as Key Riot Factor

Philadelphia—Last summer's riots in large cities, though tragic, were "merely symptoms of a greater problem—the high rate of unemployment among Negro youths," Dir. Donald Slaiman of the AFL-CIO Civil Rights Dept. declared here.

Slaiman spoke at a joint luncheon meeting of the city's Jewish Labor Committee and Negro Trade Union Leadership Council, attended by Jewish labor leaders and representatives of civil rights groups and community organizations.

The meeting was part of a continuing program through which the JLC and NTULC meet together to hear addresses from leaders from various fields.

Slaiman presented those attending with copies of labor's detailed program of "actions" needed to solve the urban crisis—adopted in September by the AFL-CIO Executive Council.

Describing joblessness among Negro youths as "a major but not sole component of the powder keg that threatens our cities," Slaiman pointed out that Negro teenage unemployment has ranged from 20 to 30 percent over the past two years.

By contrast, he noted, the nation as a whole is in its longest period in history without a recession, the overall jobless rate has dropped to 4 percent, and even unemployment among Negro adults has made "significant improvement."

He observed that unemployed Negro youths are generally to be found among those who haven't benefited from "the very real gains" resulting from the U.S. Supreme Court school-integration decision and the 1964 Civil Rights Act.

"For many minority group citizens," he pointed out, "the decision and the law resulted in economic progress, but others, especially these youths, have not realized any benefits."

Awards Cite Unionists for Retarded Aid

Portland, Ore.—Executive Sec.-Treas. Sam Ezelle of the Kentucky AFL-CIO and Meat Cutters Local 657 of Miami, Fla., have been named the first winners of labor awards granted by the National Association for Retarded Children.

The awards were established by NARC in cooperation with AFL-CIO Community Services Activities to recognize union locals and members who help the mentally retarded become useful citizens. Similar awards are given to employers.

Ezelle is a director of the Kentucky Association for Retarded Children and a member of the Governor's Committee on Employment of the Handicapped. Currently he is working with the pattern makers and artists in designing a Kentucky souvenir doll that can be made by the retarded in sheltered workshops. All time and skills are being donated by members of unions.

The Meat Cutters have helped train more than 100 retarded persons in a program launched three years ago at the Homestead, Fla., Air Force Base. Operating with a Labor Dept. grant administered by the Dade County Association for Retarded Children, the program safely trains the retarded for the highly skilled crafts of meat cutting, handling and wrapping.

Ninety percent of the trainees were placed in positions and half still remain on the job. Another 30 percent have gone on to other job in the industry, the union said.

A PRETTY GIRL and free hot dogs for everyone made for a gala City Hall ceremony in New York as the Butchers District Council of Greater New York and New Jersey—representing 77,000 members of the Meat Cutters—marked the 100th anniversary of the introduction of the frankfurter into America. Mrs. Betty Jo Carroll was crowned the "Frankfurter Queen" and a sidewalk frankfurter vendor was anointed "king."

where age can be proved to be "a bona fide occupational qualification."

The legislation would not require an employer to hire an older applicant in preference to a younger jobseeker. But it would require that the choice be based on factors other than age.

Education First

The secretary of labor is instructed in the legislation to initiate an education program to encourage employers to hire older workers and to seek through persuasion to bring about voluntary compliance. If that fails, enforcement would be through the courts in the same manner as is provided for violations of the wage-hour law.

Initially the legislation would cover firms with 50 or more employes. Next July, however, coverage would extend to firms with 25 or more workers.

The Senate bill does not require an employer to provide the same pension or insurance benefits to an older worker if this would increase his costs. But it does not permit the existence of a pension plan to be used as an excuse not to hire the older worker.

The only significant departure from the legislation proposed by the Administration is that the age coverage was extended from 45 to 40 years.

Sen. Ralph W. Yarborough (D-Tex.), floor manager for the bill, expressed regret that it doesn't take care of "the problem of airline stewardesses, who are forced to give up that job at age 32 or 35." He said the bill provides for a six-month study by the secretary of labor into this and any similar problems.

Twenty-four states have some type of law dealing with age discrimination, but many are weaker than the proposed federal law.

New COPE Leaflet Sounds '68 Warning

A new 13-page leaflet available from the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education asks the question, "If We Blow the Elections of '68 . . . Can We Survive the Assault of '69?"

The leaflet describes what might be in store for workers and unions "if we fail to reelect a liberal President, if we don't return our friends to the House and Senate, if there's a conservative take-over of Congress." It also contains tips on what unions can do now to head-off the threat.

The pamphlet, COPE publication number 178C, may be ordered in quantities at no charge, from COPE Publications, 815 16th Street, N.W., Washington, D.C. 2006.

At Mexico-American Hearing:

Employer 'Chiseling' In Southwest Scored

El Paso, Tex.—Mexican-Americans are "sick and tired" of being exploited by "chiseling" employers in the Southwest and are turning to unions as their best hope for achieving "a decent standard of equality or justice," labor witnesses testified at Cabinet-level hearings here.

Discrimination against Mexican-Americans is, however, primarily a governmental problem of law and law enforcement to assure equal rights, the hearing panel was told.

Among the 52 witnesses testifying before the Inter-Agency Committee exploring the problems of 5 million Mexican-Americans were Maclovio R. Barraza, Steelworkers southwestern regional representative, and Henry Munoz, Jr., equal opportunity director for the Texas AFL-CIO.

Participants in a workshop session during the two-days hearings included AFL-CIO Organization Dir. William Kircher, Civil Rights Dir. Donald Slaiman, and Henry Santiesteven, publications director of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.

Pres. Johnson, who made an unscheduled appearance at the hearings, cited past gains by Mexican-Americans, but pointed also to unachieved needs.

"Nobody can know, who has not experienced it, what it's like to be turned away at the personnel office because you have a strange accent," the President observed.

"Nobody can know from the outside what it's like to have your children stumbling over words in a schoolbook, because a teacher hasn't taken the extra time to help them learn.

"Nobody can know, but those who have lived it, how a man wonders whether he will ever break free of the old cycle of following the crops, and give his son a better chance."

Vice Pres. Humphrey, opening the hearings, warned that Mexican-Americans "have for too long been denied their rightful share in American prosperity" and often have been forced to give up their language and cultural heritage.

Barraza and Munoz both stressed that thousands of the Mexican-Americans suffering "gross discrimination" are farm workers who have been denied the benefit of social-welfare and labor legislation applicable to other workers.

They appealed to Congress to extend the National Labor Relations Act to cover farm workers, so they can use its machinery in choosing a union.

Barraza said such action would be "a good beginning toward making these workers full citizens." Munoz declared that the Mexican-American farm employes "more than anything else, need the protection of the law."

They also attacked abuses of the Immigration Act through which farm employers are bringing Mexican workers into the U.S. to break strikes and defeat Mexican-Americans attempts to unionize.

Urging the federal government to halt the import of Mexicans into areas of labor disputes, Munoz charged that current import procedures add up to "a system of legalized peonage, which has been in effect for too long."

Barraza and Munoz made it clear that Mexican-American farm workers weren't the only ones being discriminated against. They cited numerous ways in which plant employers discriminate against Mexican-Americans in hiring and promotion policies.

They called upon the U.S. government to enforce volations of Mexican-Americans civil rights; urged a halt to benefits that accrue to industries that run away to Mexico to secure cheap labor; and asked for strengthened educational and anti-poverty programs.

Wirtz Lists Hazardous Farm Jobs, Bars Use of Youngsters Under 16

The nation's farm owners have been ordered by the Labor Dept. to stop using children under 16 in a list of jobs designated as hazardous, ranging from handling insecticides to operating large tractors.

An estimated 800,000 youngsters under 16 work for pay in agriculture—one-fourth of the total farm workforce.

Until last year, farm jobs were totally exempt from the Fair Labor Standards Act prohibition against employment of children in hazardous occupations. The 1966 amendments gave children employed on farms some—but not all—of the safety protection accorded youth in other employment. The chief difference is that the ban on hazardous farm jobs applies only to children under 16; in non-agricultural jobs, the hazardous occupation ban extends to youths of 16 and 17.

AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nat Goldfinger termed the farm job directive issued by Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz "a useful first step toward raising safety standards in agriculture to the level that should be expected of all employers."

He expressed labor's regret, however, that Wirtz had no authority to protect older youngsters.

"We believe 16 and 17-year-old Americans should not be exposed to hazardous occupations and we urge further study be given to providing them with similar protection," Goldfinger said.

The farm job restrictions do not apply to children working on farms owned or occupied by their parents. And Wirtz noted that it doesn't affect most of the farm jobs done by children.

He stressed, however, that mechanization and increased use of chemicals have made farms more dangerous than many industries—with an on-the-job death rate exceeded only by miners and construction workers.

Youth are not immune to farm hazards, Wirtz noted. He said a recent Labor Dept. study "covering only seven states, and incomplete even in those seven, showed nearly 4,000 injuries in two years to farm workers 10 to 17 years old."

In an unrelated action, Wirtz announced a series of changes in hazardous occupations and child labor orders affecting non-farm youth.

An earlier Labor Dept. proposal along these lines had drawn opposition by labor and child welfare groups as going too far in eliminating protective safeguards in order to increase youth job opportunities.

The final version of the order dropped some of the more controversial proposals. The main change made was to allow 16 and 17-year-olds to work as helpers on trucks as long as they ride inside the vehicle cab, and permits them to operate and ride automatic enclosed elevators.

Still another order, applicable to all non-farm youth, extends permissible working hours for 14 and 15-year-olds from 7 p.m. to 9 p.m. during school summer vacation periods. Wirtz said the longer sunlit hours under Daylight Saving Time makes the 9 p.m. limit comparable to the 7 p.m. limit in effect during winter months.

There is no restriction on hours of work for children employed in agriculture, regardless of age, except for the continuing ban on employment during school hours.

The list of hazardous farm jobs for children includes operation or work in close contact with most power-driven farm equipment except for small garden-type tractors. It bars driving trucks and automobiles on public highways and buses under any conditions. Also prohibited is working from ladders or scaffolds at a height over 20 feet, working with timber more than 6 inches in diameter and working in an enclosed area occupied by a dairy bull, boar or stud horse.

As Funds Run Out:

Coalition Attacks Poverty Programs

George H. Mahon (D-Tex.) of the House Appropriations Committee said $1.6 billion would be the most his committee would consider in actual appropriations and "there are strong indications" that the final amount will be less than that. The $1.6 billion figure is the money the program actually received last year, although the congressional authorization was higher.

The nation's top civil rights leaders, including AFL-CIO Vice Pres. A. Philip Randolph, joined in a statement warning that failure to provide needed funds for the poverty program would invite disaster.

"America is a nation in crisis," they declared. They gave "solemn warning" that to break the national promise of three years ago, when the government declared war on poverty "would be to invite national disaster."

The anti-poverty bill wasn't the only target of the House economy bloc.

The nation's foreign aid program, which the AFL-CIO has termed "indispensable" to the world's freedom, peace and economic progress, was cut sharply below the President's $3.2 billion budget request.

The first slash was in the authorization bill, which sets the spending ceiling for the program. A House-Senate conference committee settled on a $2.67 billion bill. The House finally approved the measure, but only after defeating 201-196 an effort to send the bill back to conference with instructions to restore a series of restrictive anti-Administration amendments.

A much bigger cut was in the making as the House Appropriations Committee sent to the floor a bill carrying less than $2.2 billion for the program. It was drafted by a subcommittee headed by Rep. Otto E. Passman (D-La.), a long-time foe of foreign aid.

Passman's power was clipped in the heavily Democratic 89th Congress but he is back in the driver's seat in the coalition-controlled 90th Congress.

A stubborn House forced the Senate to back down on the issue of funds to complete the planning of the Dickey-Lincoln public power project in Maine—intended as a source of low-cost electricity for a New England area which now pays the highest rates in the nation.

The House refused to appropriate money for the project and rejected a conference report which included part of the funds added by the Senate.

The Senate initially refused to back down and with strong bipartisan support instructed its conferees to hold firm for the Dickey-Lincoln money.

But the House again voted heavily against even a token appropriation for the Dickey-Lincoln project and the Senate reluctantly abandoned the fight, allowing the multi-billion dollar public works appropriation bill to be cleared for the President's signature.

The Senate moved towards a vote on a bill to set federal safety sandards for pipelines carrying natural gas—a move urged by Pres. Johnson in his consumer protection message. AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller wrote all senators urging support for strengthening amendments, extending coverage and setting criminal penalties for willful violations.

Georgia Delegates Push State Wage Floor Drive

Savannah, Ga.—Georgia must enact a state minimum wage law or "hundreds of thousands of its citizens" will never emerge from poverty, the Georgia AFL-CIO warned during its three-day convention here.

A resolution adopted by the 411 delegates appealed to all unionists in the state to rally behind a federation drive for a $1.25-an-hour minimum wage in the 1968 legislature.

A $1.25 wage floor, covering all employes of government and industry not under the federal law, was introduced in the 1966 legislature and again this year, only to die in committee both times.

Delegates also passed a resolution urging the legislature to increase injury and death benefits under the state's workmen's compensation law and eliminate a one-week waiting period for unemployment insurance benefits.

In other actions, the convention urged passage of the situs-picketing bill in Congress, pledged backing to union organizing drives, and called for federal, state and local legislation to check the growing menace of air and water pollution.

Reports to the convention were submitted by all of the State AFL-CIO's principle officers — Pres. W. H. Montague, Sr., Sec. J. O. Moore, Treas. Louise Dean, Executive Vice Pres. M. J. Counihan and ten regional vice presidents.

The convention heard addresses from Georgia Labor Commissioner Samuel Caldwell, Georgia House Speaker George T. Smith, Mayor Curtis Lewis, Director W. E. Buckner of Georgia's workmen's compensation board; and a number of other state officials.

Jesse Lester, labor liaison officer with the Office of Economic Opportunity, and Ralph H. Phelps, Jr., OEO regional director, reported on the national anti-poverty program and its projects in Georgia.

Other speakers included R. E. Shadix, regional director of AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept.; Wilbur Hobby, COPE area director; and E. T. Kehrer, southern area director for the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights.

SEC. OF STATE Carl Bobleter of Austria (center), visiting in the U.S. called on AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany in Washington. With them is Dr. Ernst Lemberger, Austria's ambassador to the United States.

Hartley Finds New Villain — Wage & Hour Division

An ultra-conservative business group, headed by former Republican Congressman Fred A. Hartley, Jr., has found a new villain for its current fund-raising drive.

Hartley, co-chairman of the Conference of American Small Business Organizations, identifies the chief enemies of business as the Supreme Court, the National Labor Relations Board—both familiar targets of the right wing—and the Wage & Hour Division of the Dept. of Labor.

"As co-author of the Taft-Hartley Act," he wrote in a recent solicitation letter, "I well know that if they are not checked, the inter-meshing actions of these bodies will choke out more and more businesses, and half-strangle many more."

The Labor Dept.'s enforcement of the wage-hour law, Hartley complains, "regularly stretches a cloudy law against the business man, harassing him and disturbing employe relations."

Jobless Rate Hits 4.3%, Highest in Two Years

For workers whose last job was clerical, the jobless rate moved up from 3.2 to 3.9 percent over the year. The rate for sales workers moved from 2.2 to 3.4 percent and, for service workers, from 4.6 to 5.5 percent.

Job stability continued for certain key groups. The report said the jobless rates for adult men and married men, at 2.5 and 1.9 percent in October, were not significantly changed from a year ago and remained close to their average levels for the past 12 months. Similarly, the rate for workers insured under state jobless pay programs, those with a "firm labor force attachment," was unchanged over the month at 2.4 percent.

Non-farm payroll employment rose by 120,000 over the month, seasonally adjusted, to 66.2 million, the report said. The rise was centered in state and local government and in trade. The return of striking teachers accounted for 60,000 of the job gain in government, the report added.

Factory employment totaled 19.2 million, seasonally adjusted, in October, unchanged from September. This was 400,000 below the all-time high set in January 1967, the report observed.

Over the year, payroll jobs are up by 1.5 million. The Labor Dept. tied the entire increase to job growth in the service-producing industries. Government, primarily state and local, was up by 670,000. Miscellaneous services were up by 500,000 and trade by 400,000.

Factory employment was down by 260,000 from October 1966, with much of the reduction attributed to an increase in striking workers who were off payrolls. Strikers are counted, however, in the separate household surveys since they are considered as employed but not at work.

Average hourly earnings for workers on non-farm payrolls were $2.72 in October—up one cent from September and 12 cents from October a year ago. Their workweek averaged 38.1 hours, down six-tenths of 1 percent from a year ago.

For factory production workers, the workweek edged down one-tenth of 1 percent over the month to 40.7 hours, seasonally adjusted. The workweek was down more than one-half hour from a year ago.

Rightist MDs Press Drive to Kill Medicare

The American Medical Association may be conservative enough for the run-of-the-mill doctor, but it's too soft on medicare for the militantly reactionary Association of American Physicians & Surgeons.

The AAPS, with a membership estimated at between 15,000 and 20,000 doctors, excluded the press from the three-day session of its House of Delegates. The magazine Medical World News reports this was done after the president of the AMA said doctors should "launder our linen in private."

With the press excluded, delegates heard a keynote speech which declared repeal of medicare to be the organization's chief objective and warned physicians against being "seduced by the siren's deceitful song, 'Medicare is the law of the land and we must obey it.'"

The delegates, Medical World News reports, also called for repeal of medicaid, the federal-state matching program for the medical needy which the AMA once pushed as an alternative to medicare.

Revealed at the meeting was the formation of an "action group" of AAPS members known as the American Physicians Guild. A spokesman for the new group described how it had overcome a "problem" with a county welfare department by "eliminating" the head of the department.

At the close of the session, the new president of the AAPS, Dr. Charles F. Row of Santa Monica, Calif., again exhorted members to work for repeal of medicare. "We should never give up," he said.

Romney, Shivers Follow Same Script on Unions

In almost identical language, Michigan's Gov. George Romney and U.S. Chamber of Commerce Pres. Allan Shivers charged that the American labor movement has become too powerful.

Romney, a leading contender for the Republican presidential nomination, spoke at the University of Denver Law School.

Shivers, a former governor of Texas, spoke to an oil producers' convention in Houston.

The Denver Post said Romney, former head of American Motors, charged that U.S. labor unions have become so powerful they may wreck the economy.

"In our desire to help the working man overcome his difficulties," Romney said, "we have done what we often do. We've gone overboard."

As a result, Romney contended, unions are acquiring "monopolies" over labor and "this threatens our whole economy."

Shivers likewise spoke of the "old concept of labor as an underdog" which led to laws protecting the rights of workers to organize and bargain collectively. Now, he said, there is need to curb "the monopoly power of unions."

Romney, in the portion of his speech reported by the Denver Post, did not say what he wants done to curb the "power" of unions. But Shivers was explicit.

The national Chamber of Commerce, he said, "has devised a labor reform package which would rid us of a 30-year accumulation of abuses."

He said the "key" element of the chamber's program "is to reform the National Labor Relations Board by turning over its judicial authority to the courts."

Shivers said that with labor "power" thus curbed, there would be "rules worked out to immunize the public welfare against labor trouble without any help from government." The end result, he said, would be "a completely united economic family" in which labor would have learned the advantages "of being a better all-around partner in the business enterprise."

ILPA Agenda Seeks to Stir Editors' Ideas

The Intl. Labor Press Association has announced a convention program designed to stimulate editors of the nation's trade union publications.

Its goal, Pres. Ray Davidson and Sec.-Treas. Kenneth Fiester say in the ILPA convention hall, is to generate new ideas on how the labor press can do a better job in reaching:

- Workers under 30, who make up a large group of today's union members.
- Negroes and other minorities trapped in urban ghettos.
- Union members who have become suburbanites, sharing in an affluence unions helped to create.

Major speakers will include Edward P. Morgan, now with the Public Broadcasting Laboratory, Bayard Rustin, the veteran civil rights leader and Saul Alinsky. Panelists will come from both the commercial press and the trade union movement.

The Dec. 3-6 sessions will be held at Miami Beach, closing on the eve of the AFL-CIO convention.

GOP Posts Scattered Gains:

Meany Hails City Elections, Cites 'Rejection of Racism'

By Duane Emme

The "rejection of racism as a political issue" in Boston, Cleveland and Gary, Ind., was hailed by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany as the most significant development emerging from the nation's off-year elections.

The voting—heavy in some areas, light in others—was marked by scattered Republicans gains across the country most notably in Kentucky and New Jersey.

On the other hand, Democrats retained mayors' offices in Philadelphia and San Francisco—posts that pollsters had said they would lose—and held control of three state legislatures up for election.

In Cleveland, Democrat Carl B. Stokes, a 40-year-old Ohio legislator, became the first Negro elected mayor of a major city, defeating Republican Seth C. Taft by 2,000-plus votes.

In Gary, City Councilman Richard Hatcher, also a Negro and a Democrat running without local party support, was elected mayor by some 1,400 votes, but his GOP opponent, Joseph B. Radigan, launched court proceedings to challenge the outcome.

In Boston, Kevin H. White was elected mayor, defeating Mrs. Louise Day Hicks, an opponent of school integration who became a symbol of racial backlash. Both are Democrats, but the race was non-partisan.

Meany described the outcome in these three cities as a "defeat of prejudice at the polls" and an "important and encouraging development that far outweighs" other election results.

"The AFL-CIO, which believes in equality in every respect of American life, is delighted with the Boston, Gary and Cleveland victories," he added.

Two states elected governors in the Nov. 7 voting—Kentucky and Mississippi—and a third, Louisiana, held a Democratic gubernatorial primary, Nov. 4, which is tantamount to election.

Conservative Republican Louie B. Nunn, a Glasgow attorney, became his party's first Kentucky governor in 24 years, defeating Democrat Henry Ward.

Rep. John Bell Williams, a Democrat who was deprived of his seniority in Congress for backing Barry Goldwater for president in 1964, won an easy victory for the Mississippi governor's office over GOP opponent Rubel Phillips.

In Louisiana, incumbent Gov. John J. McKeithen got a majority of the vote over five opponents in the Democratic primary. Rep. John R. Rarick, an ultra-conservative segregationist, ran a poor second. McKeithen has no Republican opposition in the general election next Feb. 6.

In Philadelphia, incumbent Democratic Mayor James H. J. Tate gained re-election by beating Republican District Atty. Arlen Specter in the face of a sharp rift in the local Democratic organization and pre-election polls dooming him to defeat. He attributed his election to "strong backing" from organized labor. Democrats also captured 13 of 17 councils seats.

San Francisco elected Democrat Joseph L. Alioto as mayor, succeeding Mayor John F. Shelley, a Democrat who did not seek re-election because of poor health. Republican Harold S. Dobbs, ran second, and another Democrat, Jack Morrison, ran third. Fifteen other candidates received only token votes.

One of the biggest gains for the Republicans came in New Jersey, where the party swept control of both chambers of the legislature from the Democrats. The GOP now controls the Senate by a 31-to-9 edge and has a 58-to-22 margin in the House.

Democrats kept control of legislatures in Virginia and Mississippi where all seats were up for election and in Kentucky, where all members of the House and half the senate were elected.

Hatcher and Stokes weren't the only successful Negro candidates. Members of their race scored other important victories. Mrs. Georgia Davis, a Democrat, became the first Negro ever elected to the Kentucky Senate. In Virginia, Dr. William Ferguson Reid, also a Democrat, became the first Negro member of the General Assembly since 1891, and rural Charles County elected a Negro Sheriff and a court clerk. In Mississippi, Robert Clark won election to the 174-member legislature, and Negro candidates won county offices.

Voters in many states cast ballots on a wide range of issues in addition to choosing among candidates for office:

In San Francisco, a referendum calling for an immediate cease fire in Viet Nam and pull-out of U.S. forces was defeated 132,402 to 76,632.

In New York, the electorate turned down a new state constitution by a 2 to 1 margin. However, voters overwhelmingly approved a $2.5 billion transportation bond issue.

Ohio voters approved a reapportionment plan, the third plan to go to a ballot in two years. The others were rejected in special elections.

Ohio labor opposed the plan on grounds it would permit gerrymandering of districts by the party in power at the time of reapportionment. But unions conceded it was an improvement over the two previous plans.

Pennsylvania voters overwhelmingly approved a referendum that will permit the state's legislature to authorize cities to enter arbitration agreements as parts of bargaining with firefighters and policemen.

The proposal was backed by the AFL-CIO, and Firefighters Pres. William D. Buck voiced hope that the legislature will move quickly to carry out the mandate of the voters.

Social Security Raise Heads for Senate Action

and will certainly undermine the public's confidence in the soundness of social security."

The Republican-sponsored move would have resulted in a maximum 1968 tax hike of $150. After the widespread protests against an unnecessary hike, committee Democrats substituted a formula by Sen. Vance Hartke (D-Ind.), which would raise the payment of workers making $8,000 a year or more by $61.60 during 1968 but leave unchanged the tax on workers earning under $6,600.

The higher benefit structure under the Senate bill would be largely financed by raising the present $6,600 taxable wage base from the $7,600 figure in the House bill to $8,000 next year, $8,800 in 1969 and $10,800 in 1972. This would also result in a big increase in future years in the maximum social security benefits.

The combination of social security and medicare tax paid by workers and their employers is already scheduled to rise gradually. Both the House and Senate bils make only minor changes in the rate—a little less than present law for the next few years, fractionally higher in later years.

The other big stumbling block in the Senate committee was the punitive public welfare section of the House-passed bill and a labor-opposed proposal considered by the Senate committee to subsidize private employers who hire "untrainable" persons on welfare.

Some of the more stringent House restrictions were modified. Mothers of pre-school children will not be forced to take jobs or training to continue to receive benefits, and a House freeze on aid to dependent children was lifted. Hiring subsidies will be permitted only to non-profit employers, not to commercial enterprises.

All sections of the bill—benefits, taxes and welfare restrictions—will be subject to amendment on the Senate floor.

In floor action, the Senate finally gave in to the House and passed a public works bill without funds for the Dickey-Lincoln public power project in New England. But it rejected a conference report which, at House insistence, would have allowed states to wait until after the 1970 census before complying with the one man, one vote standards for congressional districts.

Unless a satisfactory compromise can be worked out, this would leave the redistricting situation where it is now—with several states under court order to meet one man, one vote standards before the next election.

Meat Industry Political Fund Drive Exposed in Midst of Inspection Vote

An Iowa newspaper has exposed the attempt of a meat industry trade association president to raise funds for friendly congressmen—at a time when the House was about to vote on a meat inspection law.

The fund-raising project was abandoned at the insistence of leaders of the House Agriculture Committee, who supported the industry's position on meat inspection but were concerned lest the fund solicitation be "misinterpreted" and prove "deeply embarrassing" to congressmen.

Most House members who voted for the industry-favored meat inspection bill — and against a strengthening amendment sought by labor and consumer groups—did not know of the abortive fund solicitation until the next day.

That's when the Des Moines Register carried the expose written by Nick Kotz of its Washington bureau. It revealed that the fund solicitation letter to meat inspection firms had been sent out by L. Blaine Liljenquist, president of the Western States Meat Packers Association, in his capacity as trustee of a separate congressional campaign fund.

A copy of the letter reached House Agriculture Committee Chairman W. R. Poage (D-Tex.). Poage consulted with the senior Democratic and Republican members of the committee and fired off a demand that the solicitation letter be withdrawn and any funds collected be returned. Until that was done, he served notice, the industry-favored bill would not be brought to the floor.

The association official agreed to refund the contributions and the bill was cleared for floor action.

The Des Moines Register story quoted the Washington lobbyist for the American Meat Institute as terming the fund-raising letter "most unfortunate, ill-timed and utterly stupid."

No Steamroller

Although the public disclosure of the election fund solicitation came after the House vote, it may have helped block an effort to push the House bill through the Senate before public opinion is brought to bear for a stronger bill.

Sen. Walter F. Mondale (D-Minn.), who supports extension of federal meat inspection to the thousands of one-state plants now exempt, said the attempts of portions of the meatpacking industry to escape inspection has given the entire industry "a black eye."

He warned that revelations of a "political slush fund" would boomerang on the industry.

Mondale added: "The meat industry's sudden interest in the political careers of 'friendly' congressmen, coming at a time when federal legislation regulating the slaughter and processing of meat sold to consumers is under consideration, can only lead to the conclusion in the public eye that this was a crass attempt to influence the Congress."

Mondale expressed the hope that meat packers whose products are already inspected because they cross state lines will now "speak up in the public interest" and support legislation to "plug the gaping holes in the present meat inspection system."

The House-passed bill, now before the Senate Agriculture Committee, would help states finance inspection programs but would not compel them to have such programs. The meat industry had initially opposed even this step, but switched to support the bill as the alternative to extension of federal meat inspection to most of the plants now exempt.

Fanning Renamed To Labor Board

Pres. Johnson has reappointed John H. Fanning, senior member of the National Labor Relations Board, to a third term as a board member. The Senate quickly confirmed the appointment. Fanning is the first NLRB member named to three full five-year terms and the first appointee of three successive Presidents—Eisenhower, Kennedy and Johnson.

Fanning is a Rhode Island Democrat who started his board service in 1957 after 15 years with the Labor Dept. and the Dept. of Defense. He is 51.

Johnson announced the appointment of the first two members of the new corporation's 15-man board of directors—Milton S. Eisenhower, president-emeritus of Johns Hopkins University, and James R. Killian, Jr., board chairman of Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

Besides the broadened, quality programs envisioned through a loose-knit noncommercial network, Johnson spoke of his hope that a domestic satellite communications system would some day become "a great network for knowledge" that could link a remote doctor with a teaching hospital and a scholar in one part of the country with a major library in another area.

The President signed the bill in the East Room of the White House in the presence of several hundred people, including union officials and educators, who had worked for the passage of the legislation.

House Passes Poverty Bill, Labor Seeks Full Funding

Meany Urges Prompt Action:

Senate Bill Backed On Social Security

The social security bill up for a vote in the Senate is "a considerable improvement over the extremely inadequate bill passed by the House," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared. With one major change, he said, it should be passed "without delay."

Meany's statement of support came as the Senate opened debate on a committee-approved bill which would:

- Raise all social security benefits by at least 15 percent, as contrasted with 12.5 percent in the House bill.
- Lift the minimum benefit from $44 to $70 for a single person and from $66 to $105 for an elderly couple. The House raise only went to $50 for a single person, $75 for a couple.
- Raise the wage base on which social security taxes are paid by gradual steps to pay for the improvements and provide bigger future benefits for higher-paid workers.

Meany said the Senate committee had made a number of improvements in the punitive public welfare provisions of the House-passed bill. He welcomed assignment of work and training programs for welfare recipients to the Labor Dept., "which has the experience and qualifications for successfuly operating them," rather than to the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare.

He also praised elimination of a House-voted freeze on the number of children who could be helped.

"A glaring defect" still in the bill, Meany said, is a compulsory work provision for many mothers. While the Senate bill, unlike the House version, exempts mothers of preschool children, it would force other mothers to take even low-paid, dead-end jobs or lose their welfare benefits. In many of these cases,

House Meat Bill Scored As 'Hoax'

American labor spearheaded a consumers' revolt against an "ineffective" House-passed meat inspection bill and urged the Senate to insist on federal inspection of billions of pounds of meat sold without crossing state lines.

The AFL-CIO termed the House bill — which encourages but does not require states to set up inspection programs—"a hoax on the American consumer."

Two federation affiliates — the Meat Cutters and the Packinghouse Workers — and Pres. Johnson's consumer adviser, Betty Furness, joined in support of a bill by Sen. Walter F. Mondale (D-Minn.) to extend federal inspection to all meat and meat products.

Also before a Senate Agriculture subcommittee was a bill by Sen. Joseph S. Montoya (D-N.M.), which would amend the House bill by imposing federal inspection if the states did not act to establish comparable state-run inspection programs.

In a surprise move — reflecting the flood of protests against the STRONG PRAISE was extended by Pres. Johnson to both AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and the labor movement as the President made a surprise appearance at a banquet in New York at which the National Trade Union Council for Human Rights of the Jewish Labor Committee honored Meany with its first Labor Human Rights Award.

At JLC Award Dinner:

LBJ Praises Record Of Meany, AFL-CIO

New York—Pres. Johnson made a surprise, brief trip here to join in a Jewish Labor Committee testimonial to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany.

The President headed a roster of labor and government officials hailing Meany as the JLC's National Trade Union Council for Human Rights conferred on him its first annual Labor Human Rights Award.

Johnson used the occasion to praise the AFL-CIO for its record under Meany in sponsoring progressive legislation. (Excerpts, Page 7.)

At the same time, he lashed out at those who block progress:

- The "old coalition of standpatters and nay-sayers who never wanted to do anything and who this year say they can't do it because of Viet Nam."
- Those who say, "What America has built is rotten."
- Americans who hold that the nation cannot meet its commitments both at home and abroad.

"Our commitment to a small and distant country in Southeast Asia is being tested," the President declared. "And along with it America itself is being tested on the anvil of war. I believe that America can defend its precious principles abroad without relaxing our efforts at home. Our problems are great. But our resources are greater . . . and they include the great human and moral resources of the American labor movement."

Asserting that Meany had been busy "remaking American history since his young manhood," President Johnson said that the AFL-

GOP Fails To Block Program

By David L. Perlman

The House voted 283-129 to continue the nation's war on poverty but imposed a budget cut which the AFL-CIO denounced as a roadblock to an effective program.

The money slash was adopted by a 221-190 rollcall ballot.

On this key issue, 148 Republicans and 73 Democrats voted to chop 22 percent from the $2.06 billion authorization sought by Pres. Johnson—dropping it to $1.6 billion. Voting to keep the full amount were 162 Democrats and 28 Republicans.

Earlier, however, the House decisively rejected a series of Republican amendments to dismember the program and cut the budget even further.

Next step is up to House-Senate conferees. The Senate had previously approved a strengthened anti-poverty program, with a $2.26 billion spending ceiling—$200 million more than the Administration had sought.

In a telegram to the conferees, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller declared that the House action "saved the structure of the war on poverty, but much more is needed."

In the AFL-CIO's opinion, Biemiller stressed, every congressman who voted for the budget slash "was voting against an effective program to eradicate poverty."

He added: "The conferees can—

Chamber of Commerce Spells Out Tough Anti-Union Law Program

The U.S. Chamber of Commerce hopes that the 91st Congress, to be elected next November, will be even more conservative than the present Congress and will pass legislation to strip the National Labor Relations Board of virtually all its powers.

Peter J. Pestillo, the Chamber's labor relations manager, lashed out at the NLRB in a press conference at which he spelled out both the short and long-term goals for what the business organization calls "labor law reform."

The prevailing management viewpoint, Pestillo said, is to support a bill introduced in the last Congress by Sen. John G. Tower (R-Tex.). As explained in a new CofC pamphlet, it "would transfer the NLRB's jurisdiction over unfair labor practice cases to the federal district court." The hollow shell left of the NLRB "would continue to determine what groups of employes are appropriate for bargaining."

Tower, however, has not introduced such a bill in this session.

Pestillo acknowledged that management looked with favor on the NLRB during the Eisenhower Administration. But he said business opinion has "matured" with the realization that a change of administration can bring a change in NLRB policy.

He said the Chamber is hopeful that the 91st Congress will be more conservative and would support a management-backed labor law.

For its "here-and-now" program, the Chamber advocates amendments to the National Labor Relations Act to:

- Place further curbs on picketing and boycotting.
- Impose sharp restrictions on

Labor's Aid Rallied For Copper Strike

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany rallied the labor movement behind 60,000 copper workers now entering the fifth month of a strike for modern wages and working conditions.

Calling presidents of 20 affected unions to a Nov. 20 meeting in Washington, D.C., Meany charged that producers of most of the U.S. supply of nonferrous metals have "shown an unwillingness to bargain in good faith."

The entire labor movement, Meany reiterated, "supports the efforts of these unions to secure equity and justice" for copper workers and their families.

He said the meeting at AFL-CIO headquarters would be asked

'Green Power' Stressed At Civil Rights Parley

Chicago—"We must get the message across to the younger generation that you don't solve the world's problems by burning draft cards or solve the problems of the slums by burning stores," William Robert Ming, Jr., a member of the Chicago Commission on Human Relations, told the 13th Labor Conference on Civil Rights.

Ming is one of the attorneys who worked with Richard G. Hatcher, Gary, Ind., mayoral candidate, to assure Negroes their voting rights in the November 7 election.

"Freedom isn't free," he said. "It takes money to hire the talents of people and buy radio and TV time and space in newspapers to carry the message of freedom and equal opportunity to young people. For this work we need 'green power,' not black power or white power."

Ming said that most of what today are regarded as civil rights problems are not racial or religious issues, but matters of economics, politics and social reform.

"We must dramatize our concern for life and death among the poor, both black and white, to young people," he said.

Ming was principal speaker at the luncheon session of the conference which drew 500 participants. It was sponsored by the Jewish Labor Committee of Chicago and endorsed by the Illinois AFL-CIO and the Chicago AFL-CIO.

Local 1031 of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers; the Midwest edition of Steel Labor, official publication of the Steelworkers; and Carl Shier of Auto Workers Local 6, were winners of the top civil rights awards presented at the luncheon.

Panel Discussions

Six panel discussions were held in the morning. They covered racism in the civil rights movement, the model cities program, local labor community action, legislative action, the community union, and labor education in the local community.

Vice Pres. Morris Bialis of the Ladies' Garment Workers is chairman of the Chicago JLC. Harold Schwartz, ILGWU assistant Midwest director, was conference chairman, and David Schacter, secretary-treasurer of Jewelry Workers Local 4, was conference coordinator.

Musicians Win Ruling In Nevada Club Dispute

Band leaders performing in Reno, Nev., and Lake Tahoe clubs and hotels are not independent contractors but employes of the resort operators, a National Labor Relations Board examiner ruled in a report recommending dismissal of a complaint that Local 368 of the Musicians refused to bargain with the band leaders.

AFM Pres. Herman Kenin called the ruling—by Trial Examiner Joseph I. Nachman—a "salutary victory in the long-continuing efforts" of the union to win full protection of the law for both leaders and players.

The union said band leaders were induced to file charges by a spokesman for the Reno Employers Council after a two-day strike in 1966 for a wage increase and other contract improvements.

The AFM said the employers drafted the charges, presented them to the leaders for signature, and appeared for them at the NLRB hearings. At least two of the leaders, it said, expressed the hope the union would win the dispute.

The leaders do pay taxes for their sidemen but the clubs exercise the right of control over leaders, Nachman said. He cited provisions in the contract between club operators and band leaders that the club is the employer, the leader and bandsmen are its employes, and the leader "as agent of the employer and under his direction" hires the band members and supervises their work.

Another factor listed by Nachman was the contract provision that the leader, as agent of the club, distributes the money called for by the contract and gives the employer receipts for himself and each bandsman.

If the relationship between the club and the leader is one of "independent contractor," Nachman wrote, it is "difficult to understand what interest the club has in being assured that the leader has properly paid his sidemen, or indeed that he has paid them at all."

Anti-Union Goals Listed By Chamber

actions the NLRB may take to remedy an employer's unfair labor practices.

- Ban union recognition on the basis of card checks.
- Curb internal union disciplinary powers, including a ban on union fines against members who cross a picket line.
- Allow employers to subcontract work without consulting the union.
- Assure employers that a "take-it-or-leave-it" offer, described by the CofC as a "fair firm offer," would not be considered a refusal to bargain.
- Give employers even greater rights than they now have to say whatever they want, short of open coercion and bribery, to try to persuade workers to vote against a union.
- Permit employers to initiate a decertification election and to call for a strike vote or a vote on acceptance of the employer's offer.

Both the Chamber and the National Association of Manufacturers recently held a series of meetings in cities throughout the nation to drum up business support for legislation to curb unions.

The Chamber of Commerce said its new pamphlet incorporates legislation which CofC representatives "discussed with more than 1,500 business leaders" at the 12-city workshops.

Its proposed amendments to the National Labor Relations Act, the Chamber said, "are the result of more than two years' study by more than 100 management lawyers . . . and discussions with other national business organizations."

to develop a program for support and to "demonstrate solidarity in this struggle." All the unions that have bargaining relationships with the struck firms will send their top officers to hear reports on the stalemated negotiations and to intensify their joint effort.

Members of the Steelworkers and other unions joined for the first time this year in coordinated bargaining for major contract improvements. They were unable to get "realistic" offers from a united industry in negotiations that started last March and struck on July 15. The walkout was called at Far West locations of copper, lead and zinc producers — Kennecott Copper Corp., Anaconda Co., Phelps Dodge Corp., American Smelting & Refining Co., and four smaller firms.

The strike originally involved 37,000 employes but the total swelled as other contracts expired and additional workers joined the walkout. Latest to strike were 1,000 Anaconda refinery workers at Perth Amboy, N.J., where company negotiators "summarily rejected 90 percent" of the contract improvements sought by USWA Local 4985, according to the union.

Union response to appeals for financial support for the strikers spurted after a previous call from Meany and the AFL-CIO Executive Council. Delegates to a Chicago conference of USWA District 31 locals approved a $100,000 donation to the strike relief fund—half donated at once and half to be forwarded at a later date.

In Great Falls, Mont., the Montana Farmers Union appealed for cash or food for strikers in Butte, East Helena, Anaconda, Great Falls and other locations.

For many days, the MFU said in its appeal, "our worker friends in the copper industry have been trying . . . to obtain a contract that would provide them and their families with a living wage comparable to that of workers in other industries." It urged: "Share a part of your harvest with the families of these hard-pressed people."

Meanwhile Sen. Lee Metcalf (D-Mont.) said in a Senate speech Oct. 24 that a settlement reached recently by five unions with the Pima Mining Co., Tucson, Ariz., should set a pattern for the entire industry. He urged the other companies to "sit down and make collective bargaining work."

The Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service called company representatives to a Washington meeting Nov. 13, but postponed meeting with the unions when it found no "significant changes" in the companies' position.

Twenty Unions Involved

Besides the USWA the striking unions are the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, Machinists, Operating Engineers, Auto Workers, Sheet Metal Workers, Iron Workers, Carpenters, Painters, Boilermakers, Bricklayers, Molders, Plumbers, Blacksmiths, Railroad Trainmen, Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen, Railway Carmen, Laborers and the Office & Professional Employes.

New NLRB Attorney Named in Boston Region

Retirement of Robert E. Greene as Boston regional attorney for the National Labor Relations Board and the appointment of Harold M. Kowal to succeed him was announced by NLRB General Counsel Arnold Ordman.

Greene entered NLRB service in 1938, transferred from Washington to Boston in 1942, and served since 1951 as regional attorney there. Kowal became an attorney in the Philadelphia regional office in 1948, and has been in the Boston office since 1952.

Serafino Romualdi Dies, AFL-CIO Latin Expert

Serafino Romualdi, retired AFL-CIO Inter-American representative and a veteran of labor's fight against fascism and communism, died in Mexico City of a heart attack. He was 66.

Before retiring in 1965, Romualdi also served as executive director of the American Institute for Free Labor Development and assistant secretary general of the Inter-American Regional Labor Organization.

He died while in Mexico on a two-week assignment as a consultant for the State Dept. and as a lecturer at Cuernavaca Labor College.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany praised Romualdi as "a true believer in freedom, democracy and brotherhood"—a leader who "detested dictatorship and fought it all of his life."

"So it follows that he was a devoted trade unionist who spent all of his days helping others," Meany said.

In a eulogy delivered at funeral services in Bethesda, Md., Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler declared that "his unselfish dedication to the loftiest ideals of mankind . . . set an example we will remember all our lives."

Born in the Province of Perugia in Italy, Romualdi was forced to leave the country in 1923, at age 23, because of his active opposition to the dictatorship of Benito Mussolini.

He came to the U.S. where he continued his battle against fascism through editorial posts in the Italian language press. In 1933, he joined the Ladies' Garment Workers editorial and publicity staff.

After World War II began, he helped organize the Congress of Free Italians at a conference in Montevideo, Uruguay, and served in labor posts in Latin America. In 1944, he went to Italy with the OSS and aided in rebuilding unions there.

Fought Communism

Romualdi became AFL Inter-American representative in 1948, continuing in that position after the AFL-CIO merger in 1955. In post-World War II years, he was active in labor's struggle to blunt communism as he had been in fighting fascism.

When U.S. labor, business and government combined in 1962 to set up AIFLD to aid the growth of trade unions in Latin America, he was chosen as its executive director.

Survivors include his wife, Miriam; a son, Dr. James Romualdi of Pittsburgh; and a stepson, Jesse Friedman, a member of the AFL-CIO International Affairs staff in Washington.

'Sound, Equitable Policy':

Appeals Court Backs NLRB Address Rule

The 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals has upheld a National Labor Relations Board decision ordering an employer to furnish the names and addresses of workers before a union representation election.

This represents a "sound and equitable policy well within the board's power" under the law, the appeals court declared.

The ruling was the second of the kind in support of the NLRB's so-called Excelsior rule, developed by the board to help insure that both labor and management can communicate with all eligible voters. The prior decision by the 4th U.S. Circuit Court directed Hanes Hosiery Division of the Hanes Corp. to provide names and addresses of employes in its plants near Winston-Salem, N.C., before an election sought by the Textile Workers Union of America.

Three 7th Circuit judges ordered the Crane Packing Co., Morton Grove, Ill., to provide an address list prior to an election petitioned for 18 months ago by the Auto Workers, with the Machinists as intervenors.

The company refused to provide an address list but permitted union leaflets to be distributed outside the plant and in time-clock areas inside. At the same time, management used its records to mail campaign material to employes' homes and, two days before the election, permitted the UAW to examine a list of employe names but no addresses, the judges noted in their decision.

Both unions were defeated in the election, after which the UAW filed objections, based in part on the company's refusal to comply with the Excelsior rule. The NLRB regional director recommended that the election be set aside and the board approved a second election, in compliance with Excelsior.

Crane Packing still refused to comply and the second election was postponed. When the company president defied NLRB subpoenas, the board filed a complaint in the Chicago District federal court; the court granted enforcement of the board's subpoenas and the company appealed to the 7th Circuit.

"We find little new in the company's attack which has not already been carefully and exhaustively considered and rejected by the board in the Excelsior decision," the judges wrote, adding "that the board waited nearly 30 years to conceive and implement this new rule should not militate against its validity."

The need for an Excelsior rule, aimed primarily at insuring that employe choice is made after full exposure to competing views, has "become all the more important because of court decisions which have limited to some extent a union's access to employes" during organizing campaigns, the court observed.

The court also rejected a company challenge to District Court enforcement of board subpoenas. It said court enforcement was proper in the Crane case because the address list involved a matter under investigation and was evidence.

Flight Union's Delegates Give Gill New Term

London, England — Reports on airline and union activities in eight countries highlighted sessions of the Flight Engineers 19th annual convention here.

The union has units in Argentina, Australia, Greece, Israel, France, Netherlands, Pakistan, Spain and Great Britain, in addition to the United States, and each country sent delegates.

Last year, delegates to the Flight Engineers San Francisco convention, voted to hold the 1967 meeting here in recognition of this growing international character of the union.

Pres. William A. Gill, Jr., who has headed the Flight Engineers since 1963, was unanimously re-elected to another two-year term without opposition. The term of Exec. Vice Pres. and Sec.-Treas. Harry S. O'Brien does not expire until next year.

The union's air safety and engineering committee took advantage of the London convention to visit the British Airways Corp. factory at Filton, England, where part of the British-French supersonic, Concorde, is being built.

Canadian Unions Post Sharp Gain in Members

Ottawa—Trade union membership in Canada at the start of this year totaled 1,921,000, an increase of 185,000 and 10.6 percent over Jan. 1, 1966, the federal Dept. of Labor reported.

Affiliates of the Canadian Labor Congress and CLC-chartered locals had a total of 1,451,000 members, up 12 percent from 1966.

Strike Ban Called 'Flop' In Public Employe Field

New York—Disputes involving public employes can best be solved by voluntary agreements rather than through punitive no-strike legislation, Mediator Nathan P. Feinsinger told a professional group here.

The Condon-Wadlin Act, which failed to prevent a 12-day transit workers' strike last year, was "dead the day it was passed," said Feinsinger, who was chairman of a panel that mediated the 1966 srtike.

The Taylor Law, passed as a successor to Condon-Wadlin to prohibit strikes by public employes, already had "flopped" when the city used it for the first time in the recent strike of public school teachers here, Feinsinger told the 15th annual conference of the Methods-Time Measurement Association.

"I'm afraid it was passed a little in anger," he said.

School officials are still seeking to apply Taylor Law penalties to teachers for refusing to report for school until favorable contract terms were agreed on. The union is appealing a $150,000 fine levied on the local and a 15-day jail sentence imposed on Teachers Local 2 Pres. Albert Shanker.

OUTSTANDING ACHIEVEMENT award of the Screen Actors Guild is presented to veteran actor William Gargan (right) by SAG Pres. Charlton Heston. Gargan learned to speak esophageally after losing his larynx, since then has traveled 400,000 miles encouraging others to learn how to speak again. Previous SAG award winners were Bob Hope and Barbara Stanwyck.

Screen Actors' Guild Cites William Gargan

Hollywood, Calif.—The Screen Actors Guild presented its annual award for outstanding achievement to William Gargan, veteran actor who lost his voice to cancer, taught himself to speak again and now spends 10 months a year helping others.

SAG Pres. Charlton Heston presented the union's third annual award—a black onyx and antique bronze replica of the ancient Greek masks of tragedy and comedy—to Gargan at the union's annual meeting before 1,000 members at the Hollywood Palladium.

Gargan entered the theater world in 1924 and for 36 years was a featured player on the stage, in motion pictures and on radio and television. He was in the play "The Best Man" in 1960 when he became hoarse, and later lost his voice when his larynx was removed in an operation.

Heston told the audience that Gargan spent months learning to speak through the esophagus, and that since then he has traveled more than 400,000 miles on behalf of the American Cancer Society — aiding fund drives, visiting hospitals, and encouraging others to learn how to speak again.

Union members, Heston said, know Gargan "as a fine gentleman, a warm and understanding person who has never lost his sense of humor, and as the epitome of the true professional actor."

Contract Gains

Executive Sec. John L. Dales reported that negotiations for a new television film contract, completed last summer, produced "the best results of any Guild negotiation in memory." Rates for day players were increased from $100 to $112 now and to $120 in 1969, with the weekly rate rising from $350 to $392 now and to $420 in two years, he recounted.

Because of the agreement, SAG members are now receiving more than $1 million a month in domestic and foreign residual fees and payments for feature pictures sold to television, Dales said.

He reviewed increases in Guild pensions to a current total of $30,000 a month; listed improvements in the union health and welfare plan, and cited intensified activity in the areas of community antenna television (CAT) and pay TV.

Dales warned against giving the three major TV networks the unrestricted right "to unfairly compete in the production of feature films" and become the "overwhelming power in feature film production that they already are in TV production." Also he reported a slowdown in the importation of foreign actors and a lessening of race discrimination in the use of actors in both television and theatrical pictures.

Treasurer Gilbert Perkins reported an increase in union surplus funds and a paid-up national membership of 18,495, an increase of nearly 2,000.

Officers who were re-elected and inducted for new terms were Heston, Perkins, Vice Presidents Whit Bissell, Macdonald Carey, Ricardo Montalban and Ron Rawson and Recording Sec. Marie Windsor.

NABET Strike Talks Spurred, Rally Slated

New York—The New York City AFL-CIO called a city-wide union rally Nov. 20 as a demonstration of solid support for the Broadcast Employes, now in the eighth week of a strike against the American Broadcasting Co. at five television and radio stations.

The rally was scheduled to start at 5 p.m. in front of national ABC offices here unless contract agreement is reached before that time. Meanwhile, negotiations were moved to Washington and intensified at the request of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service.

Progress Made

Despite a news blackout agreed to by ABC and NABET bargaining committeemen, the parties were reported closer to settling their differences than at any time since the strike started Sept. 22. Major issues include the length of the workweek and company proposals that the union called "backward-looking."

The strike is the first ever called by NABET against any U.S. network. While management personnel manned network programs the union staged a national "don't advertise" campaign, and both sides filed unfair labor practice charges with the National Labor Relations Board.

NABET said 10 major national advertisers and 30 to 40 local advertisers have agreed to withdraw their commercial messages from ABC stations for the duration of the strike. The stations are in Chicago, Los Angeles, New York, San Francisco and Washington, D. C.

In charges filed with the NLRB, the union accused management of refusal to bargain and management charged ABC was unlawfully picketing an advertiser.

The union represents 1,500 engineers and technicians at ABC, and another 1,500 technicians, newswriters and maintenance personnel of the National Broadcasting Co. Union members at NBC approved a three-year agreement a month ago. It provides a $250 top weekly wage and a 37.5-hour week in the third contract year.

New Mexico AFL-CIO Elects New Leadership

Carlsbad, N.M.—The New Mexico AFL-CIO chose three top officers in a rollcall election contest at the 12th state convention and set its sights on intensified political action and affiliation of all local unions.

New officers elected by the nearly 200 delegates for two-year terms are Pres. Luther Sizemore of the Carpenters, Albuquerque; Executive Sec.-Treas. Neal Gonzales of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Carlsbad; and 1st Vice Pres. Byron Stewart of the Office Employes, Albuquerque.

Gonzales is the only full-time officer. Formerly president, he took over the secretary-treasurer's job when Al Rodriguez resigned in September after being assigned to Puerto Rico by the Carpenters.

Reporting on legislative developments of the past year, Gonzales noted improvements in the state workmen's compensation law, a state minimum wage close to federal wage-hour standards, and the defeat of a proposed "right to work" law in the House by a 40-30 vote, the largest margin ever.

A labor-supported proposal to authorize collective bargaining for public employes was carried in the Senate but fell four votes short of House passage. The convention voted to urge the governor to include such a law in his call for a special session of the state legislature in January.

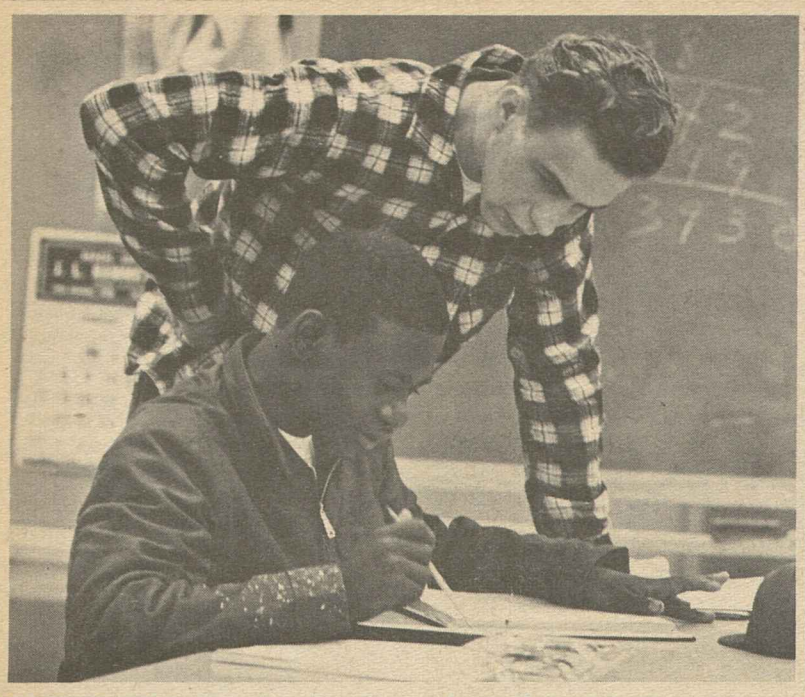
Gonzales made a plea for unified action on a vigorous legislative and registration program. Most urgent needs, he said, are the affiliation of all locals in the state with the central body and a continuous program aimed at getting all union families to register and vote for endorsed candidates. Less than half the state's unions are affiliated, he reported.

Constitution Changed

Delegates approved a constitutional change under which no endorsement of political candidates can be made in the future unless it is approved by a two-thirds majority of the convention delegates.

Gov. David F. Cargo (R) told the convention that he hopes to establish a state labor department at the capitol in Santa Fe, headed by a labor secretary with responsibility for allied departments.

Other major guests included AFL-CIO Civil Rights Dir. Donald Slaiman, Deputy Dir. Joseph Rourke of COPE, and Mrs. Margaret Thornburgh, western area director of COPE women's activities.



CATCH-UP basic education is emphasized in Job Corps camps as a first step in learning the skills necessary to obtain useful jobs at decent wages. Here a youngster is helped in mathematics.

Major Pay Gains Mark Guild, N.Y. Times Pact

New York—Newspaper Guild members at the New York Times have approved a new contract settlement providing a weekly minimum salary of $250 in its third year for experienced employes in key classifications. The agreement includes general wage increases of up to $45.95 a week. It benefits 2,300 employes in all covered departments retroactive to March 31.

The $250 minimum rate for experienced reporters, display ad salesmen and circulation roadmen guarantees a $50 increase over three years. It is $12.70 above the highest minimum previously negotiated in any ANG daily newspaper contract—at the Daily News here.

The contract sets a starting minimum of $221 a week for reporters, an $85.75 increase — the highest ever negotiated on any Guild daily, and higher than the minimum for fully experienced employes in all but three daily contracts, the union said.

Supervisors and special writers are covered by a starting minimum rising to $250, up $50 from the old rate, and a top minimum of $275, up $60 over the contract term.

Other top minimums include $216.50 a week for classified ad salesmen and teletype operators; $192.10 for advertising production deskmen and classified copy passers; $171.85 for photostat operators; $161.20 for classified solicitors and advertising maskers; $147.85 for stenographers; $139.10 for telephone operators.

The New York Guild also won numerous fringe improvements including a fifth week's vacation after 25 years' service, a cost-of-living escalator clause, better mileage and expense allowances, improved severance pay and night differential clauses, pooling of all company medical-insurance payments into a single fund, and establishment of a joint employe training program.

Revisions in other contract clauses will bring 150 more employes into union jurisdiction—100 of them in advertising branch offices in Boston, Chicago, Los Angeles, Miami, Philadelphia and San Francisco.

A new clause will require at least agency-shop payments by any employe promoted into an editorial job exempt from Guild Shop provisions.

With two contracts settled, the New York Guild turns next to negotiations at the Post and the Long Island Press and Star-Journal. The union is one of 10 which has been seeking since last January to negotiate new pacts with local dailies. Another is Typographical Local 6, which voted Nov. 8 to strike the Star-Journal, owned by S. I. Newhouse, unless Newhouse agrees to match settlements at the Times and other area newspapers.

Contempt Fine Levied Against Wage Violator

New York—A sportswear firm in this city's Chinatown area has been fined $526 and ordered to pay a coercive fine of $100 a day for every day its owners fail to keep "adequate and accurate" records of the hours worked by their 70 employes.

U.S. District Court Judge Dudley B. Bonsal imposed the fines in the first sentence of the kind under the Fair Labor Standards Act in the New York-New Jersey region, according to Regional Dir. Frank B. Mercurio of the Labor Dept.'s Wage & Hour and Public Contracts Divisions.

The court found Mang Kong Lau and his wife, Yick Oi Lee Lau, president and vice president respectively of Henry's Sportswear Corp., guilty of civil contempt for failure to obey a previous order to pay their employes in accordance with the minimum wage, overtime and record-keeping provisions of the federal wage-hour law.

Labor Dept. inspectors reported that the Laus failed to keep work records for more than half the employes of the firm under a court order issued June 9, 1965.

The court acted on a complaint filed by Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz. It directed his department to make another investigation and report whether the law is being complied with.

Morten, Borstel Take IUE Posts

Pres. Paul Jennings of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers announced the appointment of Baker E. Morten as head of the union's public relations and Gerard Borstel to take charge of publications.

The appointments followed the resignation of Martin Waxman to become public relations director for the Associated Jewish Charities, Baltimore.

Morten was a columnist and reporter for the Baltimore and Washington Afro-American newspapers before joining IUE in 1966. Borstel came to the union from the Baltimore Sun last December.

3-Year-Old War on Poverty Off to Good Start, Study Says

The war on poverty is less than three years old, but it has already brought "basic changes in American society," an AFL-CIO staff expert reports in the November issue of the American Federationist.

Julius F. Rothman, AFL-CIO anti-poverty coordinator and an assistant director of the federation's Dept. of Social Security, points out that labor's endorsement of the program stems from the first-hand knowledge of participation at the national, state, city and neighborhood levels.

The only valid criticism that can be made of the anti-poverty program, Rothman makes clear, is that it has not done enough and that the keystone must be "the creation of enough job opportunities, at decent pay, to meet the needs of all Americans willing and able to work."

He stressed, however, that the federal government has made "a good start" with the programs of the Office of Economic Opportunity and the attacks have come from those who want to do less, not those who want to do more.

Rothman cites these accomplishments of the war on poverty:

- "It has trained unskilled men and women and placed them in good jobs at decent wages.
- "It has enabled youngsters to stay in school and complete their high school education.
- "It has enabled others to return to school.
- "It has taught thousands of illiterate youngsters and adults how to read and write.
- "It has given millions of preschool children the opportunity to overcome their cultural deprivation.
- "It has given school drop-outs a chance to learn good work habits and obtain training.
- "It has given thousands of poor people a part in the community decision-making process in areas of major concern to them, their children and their neighborhoods."

The article praises the Community Action Program of OEO for having given the poor "a voice in shaping programs to help themselves." It has also employed the poor to work in their own neighborhoods "to seek out the deprived and the needy and help them use the available services to better their conditions."

It cites the deservedly high praise accorded the Head Start program for pre-school children, neighborhood legal aid and health centers that have been set up in poverty area neighborhoods, and the two major innovations—the Neighborhood Youth Corps and the Job Corps.

The Neighborhood Youth Corps, administered for the OEO by the Labor Dept., has helped youngsters stay in school through part-time jobs which also provide useful work experience, and has provided basic work experience at useful but low-skill jobs as a first step to improving the employment opportunities of poorly-educated, untrained drop-outs.

Studies in a sampling of cities show that youngsters in the Neighborhood Youth Corps program have a much smaller school dropout rate than other students. In the District of Columbia, schools with an overall dropout rate of 20 percent had only a 2 percent dropout rate for NYC enrollees.

The out-of-school program, statistically, has been less successful but in at least some areas the basic program has served as a feeder for more meaningful and advanced job training. In some of the best of these, unions have sponsored pre-apprenticeship training to bring willing youngsters up to the point where they can qualify for full apprenticeship in a well-paying skill.

The Job Corps, too, is shaking off some of its early problems and has provided for thousands of young people from the bleakest backgrounds "an opportunity to develop useful work experience, a chance to get a basic education and a chance to live in a new and healthy environment."

It has been criticized as costly, but Rothman points out that "human reclamation is never cheap, but in the long run it is cheaper than riots in the streets, juvenile delinquency and public welfare."

In these programs, and in local programs such as the Watts Labor Community Action Committee, in leadership education in Appalachia and elsewhere, the American labor movement is in the front lines of the anti-poverty war.

Rothman cites both the formal participation of top union officials in national anti-poverty programs, the presence of some 2,000 local union leaders on community boards and committees, and the vast amount of voluntary participation in programs by rank-and-file members.

Chrysler Deadline Set For White Collar Units

Detroit—The Auto Workers set a strike deadline of Nov. 21 for 8,000 salaried workers at Chrysler Corp. and pushed for settlement of all local agreements at Chrysler locations before resuming negotiations with General Motors Corp.

The union reached tentative settlement with Chrysler Nov. 8 on a national production and maintenance contract paralleling one achieved earlier at Ford Motor Co. but some plants have not settled negotiations over issues at the local level.

Besides the national settlement, 40 of 60 production and maintenance units have worked out local settlements with Chrysler managers. In addition, 45 of 78 units of salaried workers have also settled locally.

Union and company bargainers hope to agree on local pacts covering the remaining white collar units by the 10 a.m., Nov. 21, deadline. The salaried workers have two contracts—one covering office and clerical workers, the other for engineering units.

Most Chrysler locals voted Nov. 17 and 18 on ratification of the national agreements. Early returns, the UAW said, indicated "overwhelming acceptance" of the settlement. It will give 95,000 production workers improvements similar to those won at Ford plus better pension provisions and an agreement to bring the pay of Canadian Chrysler workers to the U.S. level over a two and one-half-year span.

In other negotiations conducted at the same time, the UAW set 11:59 p.m. Nov. 17 as the deadline for reaching contract agreement with Deere & Co., farm equipment manufacturers, for 20,650 UAW members at eight Deere locations. The union also notified the Detroit Tooling Association, representing 54 independent tool and die shops with 5,500 UAW members in the Detroit area, that it will strike unless agreement is reached by 10 a.m., Nov. 20.

The union won what it called a pattern for other settlements after a seven-week strike at Ford. The Ford pact contained wage increases valued by the union at 58 cents an hour over three years for production workers, $1.02 for skilled trades workers. Other gains included a new guaranteed income credit plan providing 52 weeks of income at 95 percent of takehome pay during layoffs, minus $7.50 to offset reduced travel and meal expenses.

IATSE Vice President Orin M. Jacobson Dies

Tacoma, Wash.—Burial services were held here for Orin M. Jacobson, second vice president of the Theatrical Stage Employes, who died of a heart attack while on assignment in Portland, Ore. He was 74.

Jacobson was first elected an IATSE vice president in 1951 and was re-elected at each succeeding union convention. He also served as secretary-treasurer of IATSE Dist. 1 and editor of its quarterly bulletin.

To Improve Relations:

N.Y. Labor, Industry Set Up Joint Council

New York—Organized labor and industry here have joined in forming the Labor-Management Council of New York to promote better labor relations and improve the city's economy.

The council, which was planned over several months of informal talks, will be made up of 50 business and union leaders. It will meet regularly to identify problems of mutual interest and seek their solution.

Co-chairmen are Pres. Harry Van Arsdale, Jr. of New York City AFL-CIO and Ralph C. Gross, president of the Commerce & Industry Association of New York.

Following an organization luncheon meeting, the Council issued a "fact sheet" of basic objectives. It included a pledge of labor - management cooperation to help expand industry and develop programs "for finding jobs" and training people to fill them.

Gov. Nelson Rockefeller and Mayor John Lindsay were present at the initial meeting to endorse formation of the council.

Speaking at the meeting, Rockefeller told council members that their initiative, cooperation and recognition of a need in forming the council was "in the tradition of enlightenment that made this city great."

Gross pointed out that "informal cooperation between labor and management in New York is not new" but with formation of the council "we now have an apparatus to move ahead on wider issues."

He described the establishment of the labor-management group as a "historic and unique milestone" for the city.

Van Arsdale expressed hope that the council would promote understanding between union and management leaders that would help them both in resolving past differences.

Gross and Van Arsdale agreed that the new council did not propose to involve itself in settling specific collective bargaining disputes or establish any new bargaining procedures.

Theodore W. Kheel, New York arbitrator and mediator, who is serving as public member on the council's 13-member executive committee, said the value of the group can be "incalculable."

He particularly emphasized the importance of its role in maintaining a channel of regular communications between management and labor.

Pres. Peter J. Brennan of the New York Building & Construction Trades Council and Victor Borella, an employer consultant, are associate co-chairmen of the council.

Labor's members on the executive committee, in addition to Van Arsdale and Brennan, are Pres. Louis Stulberg, Ladies Garment Workers; Pres. Matthew Guinan, Transport Workers; Pres. Arthur L. Harckham, Building Service Employes Council 11, and Business Manager Michael Sampson, Utility Workers Local 1-2.

Local's Welfare Fund Teams with Medicare

New York—A unique merger of public and private financing will assure comprehensive health care for the families of a large portion of the membership of Local 60 of the Leather Goods Workers.

The plan was developed by the union and the employers' association in cooperation with the Health Insurance Plan of Greater New York and the New York City Dept. of Social Services.

Local 60 Business Mgr. Harry Frankel said the money the union-negotiated welfare fund now pays to provide medical and surgical care for members will help finance the broader health care program which includes dependents.

The expansion is possible because most of the families involved are within the income limitations for New York State's medicaid program. Under the new arrangement, the Welfare Fund will turn over to the city social services department the amount of money it now spends for partial coverage. The department will pay HIP, the non-profit group practice health program, for its services and arrange—without red tape—for the full range of medicaid benefits, including dental care, drugs and optical services.

New York's Deputy Mayor Timothy J. Costello hailed the new program at a ceremony at the union's headquarters. He termed it an important step toward integrating privately and publicly financed health services.

HIP Pres. James Brindle said the program demonstrated the flexibility of prepaid group health plans to respond to new methods of delivering and financing medical care.

Leonard Lurie Named To Labor Dept. Post

Leonard J. Lurie, a government career executive, has been named deputy director of the Labor Dept.'s Office of Labor-Management & Welfare-Pension Reports. He is a former field examiner for the National Labor Relations Board and has been with the Labor Dept. since 1960.

Struck Kingsport Press Bewails Sagging Profits

Kingsport, Tenn.—Kingsport Press operations for 1967 have been "unsatisfactory" and there do not appear to be "any reasonable prospects for improvement in the immediate future," Pres. E. J. Triebe reported to stockholders of the book-printing plant struck by members of five unions in 1963.

Net income for the nine months ending Sept. 30 dropped in a year from $1 million to $358,979 and net income per share from $1.23 to 43 cents, Triebe said in announcing a "regular quarterly dividend" of .125 cents per share.

He blamed unsatisfactory plant operations on "the continued lack of production as our customers continue their inventory liquidation." However, Triebe said he expects "substantial improvement in production and profits in 1968."

The Allied Kingsport Press Union, respresenting crafts which lost bargaining rights in National Labor Relations Board elections in which strikers were not allowed to vote, is continuing a nationwide "Don't Buy Kingsport" campaign while around-the-clock demonstration picketing continues at plant gates.

"Nothing has changed," said a spokesman for the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept., coordinating the boycott. "The plant is still staffed by strikebreakers and we are continuing to picket and distribute strike benefits while waiting for management to bargain a fair contract."

The dispute involves more than 1,000 members of the Bookbinders, Printing Pressmen, Stereotypers & Electrotypers, Machinists and Typographers who struck the Kingsport management Mar. 11, 1963, after repeated attempts to bargain acceptable contracts failed and the employer refused arbitration.

The AFL-CIO convention in 1965 pledged American labor's continued support of the pickets and endorsed a boycott of books produced by strikebreakers, especially textbooks and encyclopedias used by school children and paid for in large part from the tax dollars of union workers.

School boards in several cities have since voted not to use Kingsport Press products where books of equal value are available.

NLRB Member Cites Need for Change In 'Too Little, Too Late' Remedies

Dallas, Tex.—A National Labor Relations Board member told a lawyers' institute here that "it is time for a change" in prescribing unfair labor practice remedies that are often "too little and too late" to help victimized workers.

Charges involving firings and other unfair management treatment of workers exercising their rights to union representation have for 32 years continued at a rate of 66 to 69 percent of all unfair labor practice charges, NLRB Member Gerald A. Brown told the Southwestern Legal Foundation's 14th annual labor law institute.

Remedies prescribed by the board are not only inadequate in many cases but they also "fail to encourage compliance with the law," said Brown, an NLRB member since 1961.

The need to concentrate on the prevention of unfair labor practices is clear, he said, because "while most employers and unions obey the law, our steadily rising unfair practice caseloads proves that too many parties find it advantageous to defy the law."

Citing public support for his position, Brown noted that a committee of the New York Bar Association found in a recent study that "there is a considerable premium on delay. A recalcitrant party can gain the advantage of time solely because of the backlog in the board's own enforcement docket." There is "no justification for permitting a respondent to profit" from his own unlawful conduct, the bar committee declared.

Brown told the lawyers "the need for developing more effective remedies is most acute in the area of job discrimination." In 1936, the first full year of NLRB operation, charges of unlawful discrimination against workers accounted for 69 percent of all charges filed, compared with 66 percent 30 years later, he said.

The board has tried to tailor remedies to the facts involved, Brown said. Besides ordering payment of lost wages, with interest at 6 percent, the NLRB has in some cases ordered employers to give a union the names and addresses of employes in the bargaining unit.

A recent suggestion was that the NLRB order reimbursement for workers who have lost a home, an auto or other possession because of an unlawful discharge. In the Ex-Cell-O group of cases, still under study, unions have asked that employers found guilty of refusing to bargain be ordered to pay their employes for beenfits they might have won had bargaining occurred.

Declaring that the NLRB's standard order to cease and desist from unfair practices and to post notices "often seems inadequate to offset the effect of an employer's unlawful campaign to prevent employes from selecting" a union, Brown said the board has "made some effort to fashion more realistic remedies."

His chief hope, Brown said, is that "compliance with the law will eliminate the remedial problems," but "the answers are not easy and the results may not be impressive."

Bunker Lauds Labor Aid to Service Units

The AFL-CIO has been "commended" by U.S. Ambassador Ellsworth Bunker for "support and continued concern for the welfare" of our armed forces and merchant seamen in Viet Nam.

The commendation, in a letter to Community Services Dir. Leo Perlis, singled out labor's assistance to three major agencies: American Red Cross, United Service Organizations and United Seamen's Service.

Bunker reported that the Red Cross now has 20 locations in Viet Nam, serving more than 316,000 personnel monthly; the USO has 15 clubs serving 470,000 monthly; and USS has established one club and is in the process of setting up another.

Perlis recalled that Bunker was president of the Red Cross in the 1950's when labor negotiated a program providing for labor representatives attached to the organization.

Enlarging upon labor's help to the agencies, Perlis noted that unions and their members have contributed "millions of dollars through federated appeals, millions of pints of blood and millions of volunteer hours."

"We shall continue to do so as long as the need lasts," he added.

Meanwhile, Perlis said servicemen in Viet Nam are in need of letters from home, publications from their unions and communities, and such items as pens, stationery, shower shoes, shave lotion, cameras, film and flashbulbs.

New Mediation Talks Slated in TWA Dispute

Kansas City, Mo.—The National Mediation Board re-entered a contract dispute between Air Line Employes and Trans World Airlines after the union overwhelmingly approved a strike if necessary to reach a settlement.

The board assigned mediator Arthur Glover to press further negotiating efforts here after ALEA Pres. Victor J. Herbert announced ten-to-one approval of the strike in a ballot taken among the union's 350 members on TWA.

The union took the vote after failing attempts to negotiate a settlement, including an earlier round of mediation efforts, proved fruitless.

The six-month dispute involves ALEA's notice for a sizeable wage increase and other benefits in a one-year agreement. TWA has insisted on a three-year pact "with an inadequate wage increase in line with industry standards," Herbert said.

ALEA's members, communications and computer personnel, are employed by TWA in major cities throughout the U.S. The heart of the company's system is its computer center here operated by union members.

Leo George Dies, Led Postal Clerks

Leo E. George, who served as president of the Postal Clerks from 1923 until 1956, died at 79 after a stroke.

As a leader of the clerks union at the Chicago Post Office, George was fired in 1920 by a union busting U.S. Postmaster General for running newspaper ads attacking low wages and poor working conditions in the postal service.

A later postmaster general reinstated him, but George then resigned to devote full time to his union.

Hard Facts on Slums

THE GOVERNMENT'S latest statistical study of the economic and social condition of the Negro in the United States solidly documents the pace of Negro progress and the tremendous job that still remains in bringing millions out of the despair and abject poverty of the slums.

The report documents also the explosive problem of the continuing stagnation and deterioration in the slums where the contrast of obviously improving conditions for some Negroes sows bitterness, frustration and the threat of violence in those left behind.

The President, in releasing the report, declared that the nation must give "top priority to the problems of our cities . . . without regard to party or politics," stressing the urgency of adequately funded federal programs.

If the need for these programs was ever in doubt, the government's report strips away the confusing rhetoric and reveals the hard facts of the problem. The task for the nation is to assure the pace of the Negro's progress by giving immediate and overriding attention to those still caught in the tragedy of city slums.

The Chamber's Dream

FOR THOSE still wondering what the U.S. Chamber of Commerce's "new look" adds up to in terms of labor relations, the chamber has furnished a clear and simple answer.

Elect a conservative President and a conservative Congress in 1968 that will produce "labor law reform" by emasculating the National Labor Relations Board and enacting primitive anti-labor legislation.

From time to time learned editorialists write about the advanced age of labor-management relations, noting that we have reached a point of mutual interest and cooperation. The chamber has made a contribution of sorts to the analysis by making it so very clear that it hopes to wake up some morning and find that unionism and collective bargaining was a bad dream that never really happened.

That the chamber is still harboring these dreams is notice once again that the struggle for economic justice continues unabated and a new, intense battle is shaping up in 1968.

Support for LBJ

THE DEPTH of trade union support for Pres. Johnson as a presidential candidate in 1968 and for the Administration's policies in Viet Nam is demonstrated in a recent COPE poll.

The delegates and official guests at the 11 state AFL-CIO conventions and the sessions of three international unions held in the past two months participated in a secret preference poll. Out of the total of 4,196 votes cast for 11 listed possible candidates, the President received 2,344, or 55 percent. The next highest total was for Sen. Robert F. Kennedy of 6.7 percent with Gov. Nelson Rockefeller topping Republican candidates with 4.6 percent.

On the Administration's Viet Nam policies, 41 percent voted to continue the present policy.

Support for a move to cease bombing North Viet Nam and attempt to negotiate a settlement totaled 12.9 percent and a policy of complete withdrawal garnered 7.8 percent. Escalation of the present level of military action was backed by 38.3 percent.

The delegates represented all sections of the nation and all segments of labor in their support of the President and his policies.

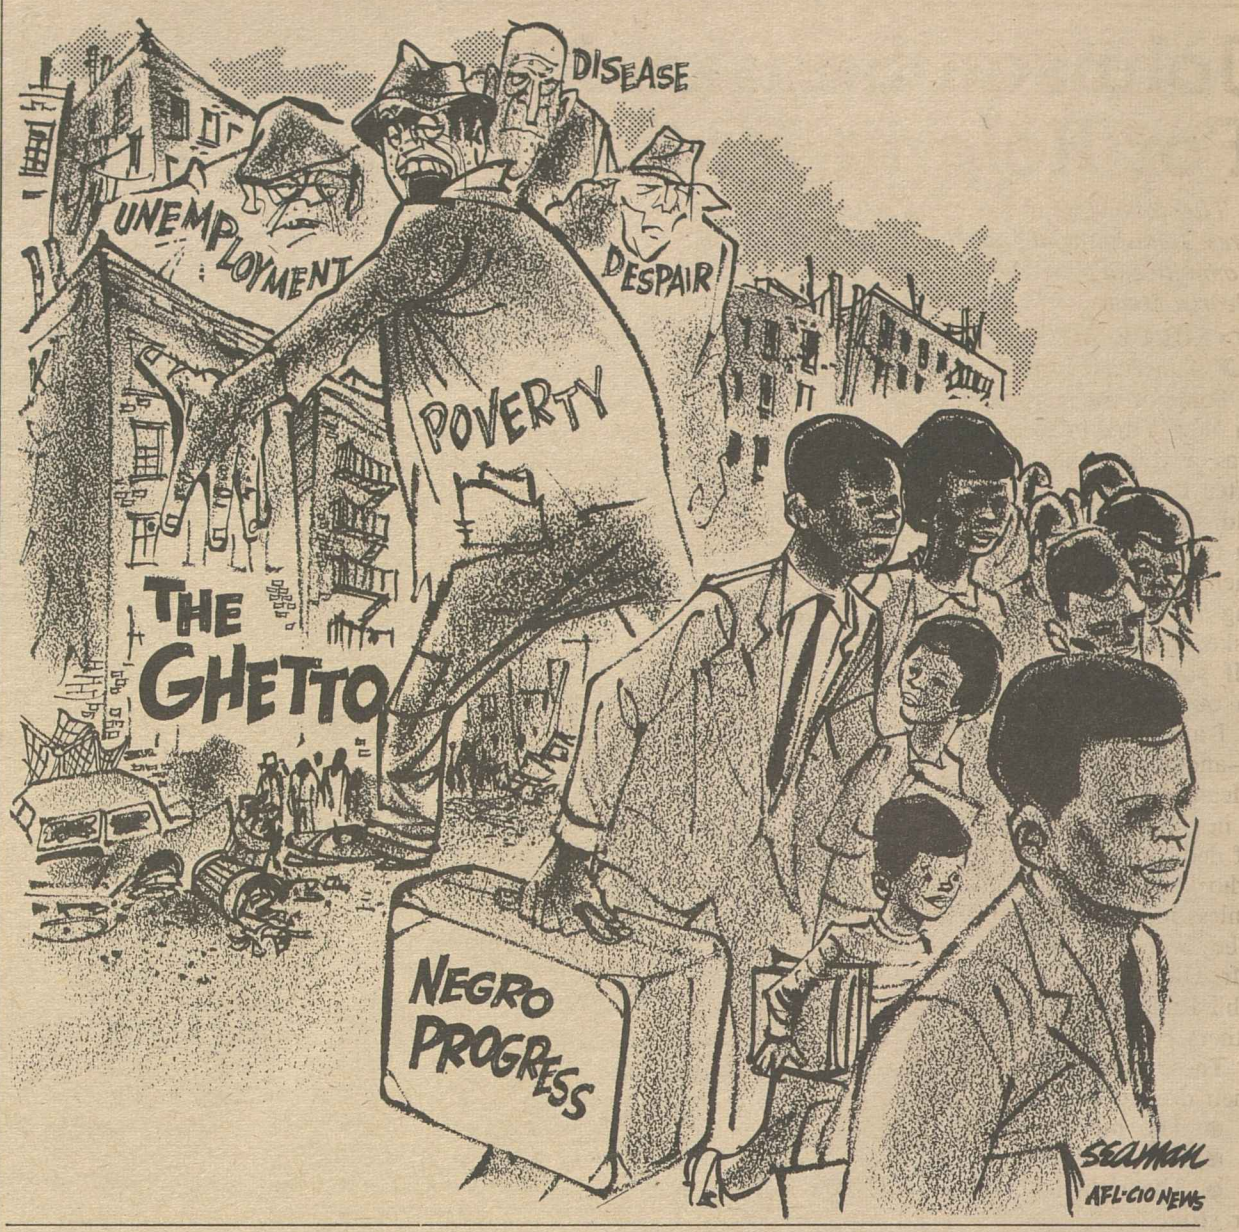
The Problem Remains



Terry Sanford Optimistic:

Revitalized States Offer Hope For Return To Leadership Era

Following is an excerpt from a review in the American Federationist by David L. Perlman of a new book by former North Carolina Gov. Terry Sanford:

IN AN OVERWHELMINGLY urban nation whose problem-plagued cities look increasingly to Washington, are the state capitals more than an irrelevancy?

Terry Sanford, as a former governor of North Carolina, can be expected to stand up for the states. And he does—with reason, intelligence and balance.

Sanford's book, "Storm Over the States," is not the states' rights dogma that might be anticipated from a southern governor. But then Sanford is no Dixie demagogue. North Carolina labor rates his 1961-65 term in office as "outstanding" and for the following two years Sanford headed a foundation-financed study of state governments.

In an earlier era, it was the states which fashioned the building blocks of American progress. It was the states which provided the first schools, enlarged the franchise, enacted the first laws protecting the health and safety of workers.

But at least since the New Deal era, liberals have looked to the national government for the action needed to overcome injustice and build a better life for the American people.

One man, one vote reapportionment at least gives hope that more states will become leaders rather than foot-draggers in the nation's progress.

So let's not write off the state capitals as a relic of antiquity—the American equivalent of the House of Lords. Sanford certainly doesn't. To begin with, he points out with unarguable pragmatism that the states are an integral part of our system of government and will remain so for the foreseeable future.

There is state pride and state self-interest. State boundaries, however illogical, are not going to dissolve—at least not in our lifetime.

The problem, then, is to make the states a force for progress and a useful tool to help meet the needs of the American people.

SANFORD DOES NOT TRY to defend the indefensible in the record of the states. He runs through the list of criticisms of state governments and acknowledges that they "are true about all of the states some of the time and some of the states all of the time."

But neither does he see the federal government as the fount of all wisdom—or administrative efficiency. It is not an evil octopus, but the blueprint drawn up in Washington may not be the best for Seattle and Savannah, Texas and Connecticut.

The states are often "a bit untidy," Sanford notes. But in that untidiness is the diversity which serves as a testing laboratory for the nation.

He asserts that the challenge of the urban areas must be accepted by the states. "Each state should develop a forceful and competent department or agency for urban affairs."

Problems of metropolitan areas do not stop at city lines and the taxing power of the states is essential if wealthy suburbs are not to be free-loaders on the services provided by increasingly less affluent cities.

Despite an increased federal role, the states still face what Sanford terms a "staggering" demand for action in such areas as air and water pollution, public transit systems, educational services, housing, law enforcement, mental health, conservation and recreation.

He calls for a broad federal-state tax-sharing program. Initially, he asks that a substantial portion of state income tax payments be credited towards federal income taxes—an inducement to the states to tax incomes as well as property and sales.

Eventually, he advocates turning a percentage of federal tax revenues over to the states without strings. Here most persons concerned with the nation's unmet needs would probably balk. The record of the states to date simply does not justify the assumption that the absence of federal standards and supervision would result in better rather than inferior programs.

Sanford would like to see stronger governors with greater powers and more flexible state constitutions. He would like to see a better mechanism for the states to transmit their views to the federal government—shortcutting bureaucracy.

In essence, Sanford acknowledges the inevitable supremacy of the national government but argues vigorously for a stronger role for the states.

His book is provocative in the best sense of the word—provocative of thought and a challenge to rigid, preconceived opinions.

At JLC Tribute:

Johnson Salutes Meany, Labor For Role in Nation's Progress

The following is excerpted from remarks by Pres. Johnson at the meeting of the Jewish Labor Committee in New York honoring AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany.

GEORGE MEANY has been busy remaking American history since his young manhood.

Some of you may remember what life was like in New York in those days when George Meany was a young man. It was in 1910—two years after I was born—when Mike Meany's 16-year-old son George became a plumber's apprentice in the Bronx. Downtown that year—in the garment district—six-year-old children were working in the sweatshops, and when the workers asked for a day off every week, the bosses said: "If you don't come in on Sunday, don't come in on Monday."

I am glad to say that things are different now—and they are different in part because George Meany has fought the good fight. He has fought it in good company—he has fought it with a band of dedicated men and women across this country who knew that America could not become great unless its workers could live and labor in dignity. They were men like Mr. Dubinsky, Mr. Stulberg, Mr. Hillman, Mr. Rose, Bill Green, Phil Murray, Phil Randolph, John L. Lewis and a number of others.

These men fought and worked—and in time, their dreams came true:

- The minimum wage
- The forty-hour week
- The right to organize, the right to bargain or strike
- The child labor laws
- Safer working conditions
- Social security

But there is more to the story—there is very much more.

By the time George Meany became president of the AFL in 1953, some critics were saying that the labor movement had gone soft. They said that it had lost its fighting spirit—that it sold out for a few more dollars, two weeks of vacation, and a house in the suburbs.

George Meany had a different idea. He saw new battles to fight. He believed that what is good for America is good for American labor—and that is why we have come here to honor him tonight.

Tonight we can look back—although George Meany never looks back—but we can look back and we can count our victories. Tonight I can report to you, not about how labor has fared under George Meany's leadership—I think all of you know that—but what I want to report to you is how America has fared in a time when labor has put its shoulder to the work of social justice.

I have played some little part in these efforts. Together:

- We have fought for and we passed through the Congress of the United States and through the law of the land one civil rights bill, and a second civil rights bill, and a third civil rights bill. George Meany and the American labor movement backed every single one of them to the hilt every time.
- We fought for and we passed medicare. George Meany was there for the battle—and he was there for the victory.
- We fought for and we passed the greatest series of education bills in history—36 in all—and George Meany's leadership helped that cause to triumph.
- We fought for and we launched a war on poverty. When that war began, George Meany was already a five-star general.

Now, the struggle for progress and reform in America has never been easy. George Meany will testify to that. And I can tell you tonight that it is not easy going now.

On the one hand is the old coalition of stand-patters and nay-sayers.

They never wanted to do anything. But this year they say they can't do it because of Viet Nam. That is just pure bunk.

This crowd was against progress before Viet Nam. They are against progress tonight and they will be against progress tomorrow. And they will be against it when the war is over and when it is nothing but a dim memory.

And far off at the other end of the political spectrum, there are those who say, "What America has built is rotten. Let's tear it apart."

I say they are wrong. They will be wrong tomorrow.

I ought to tell you and tell the country tonight that we can meet our commitments, and we can keep our word at home and abroad—and we will.

LAST YEAR, under the leadership of that great American, Willard Wirtz, the Labor Dept. contracted for the first of a series of programs to recruit and to prepare young men to qualify for apprenticeship training. That pilot project—begun right here in New York by the Taconic Foundation in partnership with the Workers Defense League—showed great success. It enabled very poor boys to qualify for apprentice slots in unions, and it worked, because New York union officials helped to make it work.

Earlier this year, on the basis of the New York story, 10 new apprenticeship training programs were launched in 10 other cities scattered all over America.

Tonight, I came here to tell you that we are moving forward still more. Within the next few days six more cities are going to have these programs—Dayton, Oklahoma City, Tulsa, Denver, Milwaukee, Atlanta.

You and I know George Meany. We know him pretty well. We know him better than those who think he is so tough and hard-boiled. He is a kind man. He is a warm man.

I may be telling some secrets to the men he negotiates with. But to his fellow workers in the labor movement, to his great friends, the Jewish Committee, I tell you no secret when I say that he has a soft touch when the people's welfare is at stake.

Two-Year Decline Cited:

State Administrators Renege On Jobless Protection Pledge

JOBLESS WORKERS have less protection now than two years ago when state administrators assured Congress that state laws would be modernized, James O'Brien, assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security, charged in a network radio interview.

O'Brien said this was borne out by a recently-completed two-year Labor Dept. survey comparing state unemployment compensation programs with federal standards proposed, but not adopted, in the last Congress. Similar legislation has been introduced in the present Congress. O'Brien appeared on Labor News Conference, the AFL-CIO produced public affairs interview broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EST, on the Mutual Radio Network.

Only Hawaii, he said, now meets the proposed benefit standard of 50 percent of the individual worker's average weekly wage.

O'Brien said that in large measure, the shortcomings of the present system are the result of the failure to raise the taxable wage base as wages have increased and the failure to extend the system's coverage to millions of workers now denied its protections.

He pointed out, also, that while the number of workers excluded from state unemployment insurance programs grew from 15 million to 16 million during the two-year survey period, new coverage under the system was extended to only 150,000 workers.

O'BRIEN SAID that reluctance to improve state laws often stems from fear of a competitive disadvantage. But, he stressed, federal standards like those now before Congress would put all the states on an "equal footing."

Reporters questioning O'Brien were Neil Gilbride of the Associated Press and Alan Adams of Business Week magazine.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

IN THE MAIN LOBBY of the Dept. of Commerce in Washington is a huge census clock which inexorably ticks off the population growth in the United States.

According to its computerized complex at 11 a.m. on November 20, the clock will officially note that this country will have a population of 200 million.

This will make the U.S. the fourth nation in history to reach and exceed this number. Mainland China has 750 million, India about 510 million and the Soviet Union 240 million.

In 1790, the year of the first census, U.S. marshals on horseback counted 3.9 million people — about as many as live in the state of Georgia or in metropolitan Detroit.

In recent years the U.S. population growth rate has been on the decline. During the 19th century the rate was about 3 percent or more a year, the result of a high birth rate and heavy immigration. Ten years ago this had dropped to 1.8 percent. Today it is 1.1 and is expected to go lower.

Despite this, the fact that we have such a large population base, the total population continues to grow—about 21 million since 1960. And this number is larger than the populations of 112 of 136 countries of the world.

Even though the U.S. population has increased nearly 50 times since that first recorded census in 1790, the U.S. land area has increased little more than four times. The average population density has risen from less than 5 people to 55 per square mile.

If you compare this figure with say that of the Netherlands at 935 people per square mile, it might appear on the surface that population is not a compelling issue in this country. Here, again, averages are misleading.

The problem is that while the land areas of this country are 90 percent rural some 70 percent of the population lives on the 10 percent of urban land. In 1965 the population density of Detroit (Wayne County) was 4,448 people per square mile, Chicago (Cook County) had 5,671, Washington, D.C. had 13,148, New York City had 26,703 and Manhattan Island had 67,870.

"IT IS IRONIC," said Robert C. Cook, president of the Population Reference Bureau in Washington, "that we've managed, with real genius, to get ourselves a population crisis in the midst of plenty of land."

He said that today's crisis is not so much a population explosion but a population "implosion"—an explosion turned inward.

Cook expressed real concern over whether this population implosion, with the confinement of 20 million of our citizens in urban areas, may be moving the U.S. "socially and politically, toward a point of no return."

Certainly the problem is recognized by the Johnson Administration with its urgent call for a war on poverty, model cities, rent supplements, housing programs, urban renewal. But a reluctant Congress is critically aggravating the crisis to an alarming degree.

The crisis is far more than just the central city, though. Urbanization has turned the city into the metropolis and is fast turning the metropolis into the megalopolis—a business and administrative center interspersed too often with deteriorating living sectors and surrounded by ever-spreading and sprawling suburbs.

Between 1960 and 1966 the population growth of the suburbs was about seven times greater than that of the central cities. In 1966 there were 66 million people living in the suburbs compared to 59 million in the central cities.

As the suburbs push out, the future points to one metropolitan area blurring with another. By the year 2000 it is expected that the proportion of the population living in urban areas may well amount to 90 percent.

The developing problems in such a pattern could make our current implosion crisis look like a pretty alley-sweeping job. And failure to meet the current problems poses a frightening future.

JOBLESS WORKERS have less protection today under state unemployment compensation laws than they had two years ago when Congress was assured the laws would be modernized, Assistant Dir. James O'Brien (center) of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security charged on Labor News Conference. How to Buy:

Rising Television Repair Costs Hit with Budget-Busting Impact

By Sidney Margolius

HIGHER RATES for repairing TV sets are leading a parade of rising appliance and auto repair and service costs that often become an unexpected burden for moderate-income families. Between the many items of mechanical equipment families now have, and the breakdown due to production short-cuts and careless use, repairs now are a noticeable living expense.

Unfortunately, most families have not yet learned to budget for repair and service expenses. For one reason, they are preoccupied with meeting the installment payments. For another, who buys a new appliance expecting repair bills?

Who? Either a born pessimist or a knowing consumer who realizes that dealers and manufacturers play down service problems when selling appliances.

Recent increases in TV repair charges have made it even more urgent that your family uses its set with care, and when it does need repairs, that you choose a service company with care.

It now is important to determine the availability and cost of service even before you buy an appliance. Some authorized or factory-sponsored service firms have raised rates more than others.

One reason the factories give for raising service rates is the shortage of technicians, with many of the best technician prospects now in Viet Nam, according to Home Furnishings Daily.

LET ALONE the high costs from reputable firms, you can get into even more trouble with tricksters, a number of recent surveys again have shown. In Illinois, for example, Attorney Gen. William Clark found that some TV repairmen charged anywhere from $14.85 to $45.70 for "repairing" a number of sets purposely disabled by an electronics expert. All that the sets really needed was replacement of one tube in some cases, two tubes in others, at a cost of $5 to $15.

One repairman even charged for a "filament blocking capacitor." The expert said: "There is no such thing."

A frequent charge was for cleaning, repair and overhauling the tuner. But later examination showed that the tuner had not been touched nor removed from the set as is necessary to repair it.

While the durability of black-and-white TV sets seems to have improved in recent years, color TV is more complicated, with color picture tubes requiring more frequent replacement.

Another problem, some servicemen say, is that factories have eliminated some parts to simplify production. While these short-cuts reduce manufacturing costs they also often reduce the durability of sets. This is one of the problems in other household appliances. The factory tendency is to design appliances so they move through a production line quickly, rather than designing primarily for durability.

The labor charge usually is by far the largest part of a service charge for TV or other appliances. But you can't blame the serviceman's pay. My own investigations indicate that the actual wage paid to the serviceman who fixes your set or washer is about one-fourth of the labor charge that appears on your bill.

BECAUSE OF THE HIGH PRICE of service, ask your family—for its own sake—to use the TV set with care:

- Before you call for service, make sure you merely did not forget to plug in the set, or that the trouble is not merely a blown fuse. Keep in mind that the service company is going to charge you four times the actual cost of the serviceman's pay to stick the plug in the socket.
- Don't leave the set on like a radio while you are not watching the picture. Sets heat up tremendously, and heat is the enemy of tubes and other parts. Also keep the set away from the wall so it doesn't heat up excessively, or even create a fire hazard.
- If you use your TV set or other appliances only moderately and with care, you probably are better off not buying an annual contract. Contract fees are set to include the costs involved in servicing heavy and heedless users too.
- Beware the serviceman who immediately or habitually takes the set to the shop, known in the trade as "set napping." Reputable service firms estimate that about 90 per cent of TV service jobs can be done in the home.

Not Always Wisely:

Mid-Income Group Uses Most Credit

MOST AMERICANS do not know how to estimate the rate of interest on a loan, but they do have credit priorities and some idea of where credit is cheapest, according to a University of Michigan economist.

Prof. James N. Morgan, of the university's Institute for Social Research, says that people's predominantly favorable attitude toward installment-plan buying has not changed over the 13 years the research center has been conducting national surveys in this field.

People appear to have a priority order for uses of credit they regard as acceptable, ranking from medical expenses down to fur coats or jewelry:

Medical expenses	80%
Education	77%
Buying a car	65%
Furniture	52%
Paying piled up bills	43%
Covering expenses when income is cut	40%
Vacations	9%
Fur coat or jewelry	4%

"The use of credit is common in the middle of the income range," Morgan noted. "High-income people use it more rarely, but for longer period commitments, as when they buy cars.

"The lowest-income people rarely use credit—whether from their own 'won't power' or the unwillingness of lenders to lend to them is difficult to say. They are even less likely to use revolving credit accounts, charge accounts, and gasoline credit cards, even though the last two provide free credit for short periods."

A great deal of the increase in installment credit in the last decades has been the result of its increasing use in the upper middle income brackets, rather than any increase in the proportion of people with more debt than they could handle, Morgan says.

However, he adds, there may not be a lot of leeway for further expansion of installment credit. When a national sample was asked early this year, nearly two-thirds reported that it would be difficult for them to manage larger payments than they had at the time.

ONE OF THE REASONS people have credit trouble is that the algebra of interest rates is too much for most of us, Morgan asserts.

"Perhaps the most effective thing we can do with students is not teach them how to construct a table of compound interest but to realize such things as that a $10,000 house bought on a 20-year mortgage calls for payments of $17,200 at 6 percent," the economist says. "If the mortgage runs for 40 years, the same house will require total mortgage payments of $26,400 at 6 percent. And yet, those extra amounts may be cheaper than buying a succession of cars on credit over the same period."

Some evidence on auto installment paper indicates that lenders have been selling long-term paper, 36 months for instance, knowing that a large fraction of the buyers will trade the car in before that, pay off the loan, and take some penalties for prepayment, Morgan adds. "Once again the consumer is lulled into a false sense about what something is costing."

"And now the mail order houses are lengthening their terms, so that you can buy an appliance at Ward's in September, not start payments until March and take 36 months to pay after that, adding a third to the total cost, so that a $460 appliance actually ends up costing $616," Morgan says.

To educate people as to the complexities of modern merchandising and credit systems, something more than "dull books, teaching, and panel discussions" will be necessary, he adds. Morgan suggests "television drama focused on the economic problems of the household, where the truth gradually unfolds, and we learn from others' mistakes."

From Soup to Nuts:

Happiness Is a New Rice Ball For Victims of Catalog Fever

By Jane Goodsell

I FEEL ABOUT CATALOGS the way some people feel about The Daily Racing Form. They fascinate me. I like toy catalogs and book catalogs and fancy food catalogs and catalogs from Fifth Avenue jewelry shops with price tags ($16,975, including tax) that leave me drop-jawed. But best of all, I like kitchenware catalogs that feature esoteric items like espresso coffeemakers and copper kugelhoff moulds and duck presses and coeur a la creme baskets.

I can spend hours pondering the relative merits of Item No. 124 (Fancy Bottom Brioche Mold, 9-inch, 1¾ qts., $1.25) versus Item No. 128 (Plain Bottom Brioche Mold, 9-inch, 1¾ qts., $1.10).

I love to Send Away for things. I get as excited as a five-year-old composing a letter to Santa Claus when I write: "Dear Sirs, Please send me Item No. 161, 5½-inch Rice Ball. I am enclosing $1.80 plus 35 cents to cover mailing costs. . . ."

I like the I'm-getting-a-present excitement of waiting for No. 161 to arrive. The maybe-it-will-come-today anticipation. The disappointment when it doesn't.

Oh, the spine-tingling excitement of cutting the string, ripping open the cardboard carton and burrowing through the excelsior. And, finally, the pulse-throbbing moment of climax when I lift out the gleaming aluminum rice ball.

SO WHY SHOULDN'T IT be exactly what I wanted? I ordered it myself, didn't I? And paid for it, too, with my own money. So what's to get so steamed up about? After all, it's just a rice ball, not an emerald bracelet.

True enough. And if I'd seen it in a store, I doubtless would have passed it by without a second glance.

Chances are, I wouldn't even have known what it was, never having seen a rice ball before. And it's not as though I'd been yearning for a rice ball. Or a kugelhoff pan. Or a set of Swedish tartlet tins. Or a quiche pan. Or any of the other things I send away for.

So why do I do it? Darned if I know. Why does a dog chase cars? What would he do with it if he caught it? Why does a fisherman go fishing? Not because he wants a fish, which he could obtain with far less fuss and much more certainty at a fish market. He goes fishing because he likes to go fishing.

That's why I send away for things. It's not a bad reason.

Stress on Leisure:

Contracts Set Trend To Longer Vacations

In nearly half the negotiations occurring each year, American workers are taking some of their gains in the form of "additional leisure—more vacations and more holidays."

This stress on vacations and holidays, an article in the November issue of the American Federationist emphasizes, benefits not only the workers involved but the entire economy.

The article, by Rudolph Oswald of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research, is titled "The Growth of Longer Vacations." It analyzes trends in holidays and vacations and focuses on some of the newer vacation plans.

The increased leisure that longer vacations and holidays provide, Oswald points out, "means additional job opportunities for workers who provide the leisure time goods and services"—such as sports equipment, parks and resorts.

Vacations and holidays also mean more jobs as workers enjoying these benefits "are replaced by otherwise unemployed workers," Oswald writes.

Another use of vacations, he continues, "is to help workers adjust to retirement living." The worker becomes accustomed to spending long periods away from the job.

Most workers under major collective bargaining agreements—those covering 1,000 or more workers—receive one week's vacation after one year of service, two weeks after two years, three weeks after 10 years and four weeks after 20 years, the article reports.

Citing a Labor Dept. study showing that 13 percent of major contracts surveyed in 1966 provided for five or more weeks of vacation, Oswald predicts that five- and six-week vacations may become as common in 10 years as four-week vacations are now.

The article points to examples of six-week and longer vacations in contracts negotiated by Papermakers & Paperworkers, Rubber Workers, Stone Workers, Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers and Brewery Workers.

Oswald also traces the growth of "sabbatical vacations" negotiated by such unions as the Steelworkers, Machinists, Auto Workers and Aluminum Workers to bring top seniority workers 10-week and longer vacations every five years.

The "graduated vacation" with the duration based on length of employment is "the most popular" vacation plan, used in more than 90 percent of current union contracts, according to the article.

Other types of plans are the "uniform" plan where all workers vacation simultaneously, the "ratio-to-work" plan which sets an employe's vacation in ratio to work-days in a year, and the "cents per hour" plan in which a worker's vacation is based upon an employer contribution to his vacation fund.

On holidays, Oswald reports that nearly a third of major contracts now call for nine or more, whereas five years ago only 10 percent were up to that standard.

"The rate of pay for work performed on a holiday has been rising," the article asserts, with two-thirds of major contracts now calling for a worker to receive 2.5 times his regular rate of pay when he is required to work on a holiday.

Guild Blasts Police Attacks On Newsmen

The Newspaper Guild's executive board has called upon federal, state and local officials to investigate police attacks on newsmen reported during recent demonstrations in Oakland, Calif., and elsewhere.

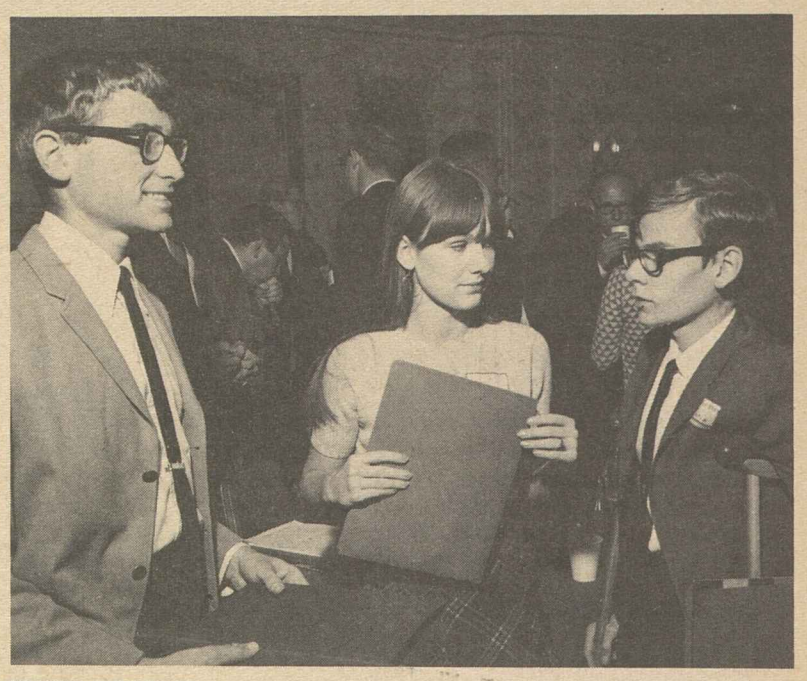
In Oakland, where news media covered anti-draft demonstrations, the board said reports of "unprovoked and deliberate" assaults by police on "clearly identifiable" newsmen "have outraged all who adhere to the principles embodied in the First Amendment."

The board noted that a California legislative committee will hold a special hearing on the treatment of newsmen in Oakland at the request of the Guild's San Francisco-Oakland local. The local is preparing documentation of police actions, the board said.

The board also cited as "alarming" reports of police action against newsmen during demonstrations in Washington, D.C. and Columbus, Ohio.

It said two United Press Intl. newsmen were clubbed and arrested during antiwar demonstrations at the Pentagon; and in Columbus, police deliberately squirted a chemical irritant into a reporter's face during a student demonstration.

Investigations of these reports are needed to determine reponsibility for the attacks, the Guild said, and also to prevent recurrence of incidents "that interfere with freedom of the press" and place newsmen in danger from forces, "whose job it is to protect their rights as well as those of all citizens."



HIGH SCHOOL seniors and faculty advisers, nearly 100 in all, learned about unions at a one-day High School Institute arranged by the Milwaukee County AFL-CIO. The program—featuring workshops and panel discussions—was drawn up with assistance from the University of Wisconsin School for Workers and the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education. Above, former Milwaukee Mayor Frank P. Zeidler leads a discussion of collective bargaining. Below, three students compare notes during a break between classes.

Profile of a Moonlighter Points Up Money Needs

The typical moonlighter, a Labor Dept. survey discloses, "is a comparatively young married man with children who feels a financial squeeze."

Teachers, policemen, firemen, postal workers and farmers have the highest proportion of second jobs.

Persons who worked 35 to 40 hours on their main job were no more likely to be moonlighters than those who worked 41 to 48 hours. This indicates that reducing the workweek by a few hours without a reduction in pay would not cause more people to take a second job.

These and other conclusions in the Bureau of Labor statistics survey are discussed in an article in a recent issue of the BLS magazine, Monthly Labor Review.

The survey, conducted in the spring of 1966, found 3.6 million workers, just under 5 percent of all employed persons, holding two or more jobs.

It also found that:

- The lower the earnings in the primary job, the more likely it is that a man will moonlight.
- While 6.4 percent of male workers hold more than one job, only 2.2 percent of women hold an extra job.
- Married men are twice as likely to be moonlighters as single men.
- The moonlighting rate tends to increase with the number of children. A man with five or more children is twice as likely to hold two jobs as a man with one child.
- The average moonlighter works 13 hours a week on a second job.
- One out of 10 postal workers holds a second job, the highest multiple-job rate for any occupational group.
- Persons living on farms also have a high rate of dual jobs. In some cases, farm work is the main occupation; in others, the farm is the secondary job.
- About one-fourth of multiple job-holders work part time on both jobs, and 8 percent work full time at two jobs. The bulk, however, work full time on one job and part time on a second job.

NLRB Ruling Stands Against Winn-Dixie

The Supreme Court refused to review a lower court decision upholding a National Labor Relations Board order against Winn-Dixie Stores, Inc., big Southern grocery chain.

In March 1966 the board approved a trial examiner's decision that Winn-Dixie was guilty of illegal coercion in quizzing employes in Greenville, S. C., about their union activity and threatening reprisals if they voted to join the union, the Teamsters. The board also ruled that the discharge of a union leader was motivated by a desire to head off the union. It ordered his reinstatement with backpay at 6 percent interest.

Winn-Dixie lost an earlier appeal when the 4th U.S. Circuit Court, Richmond, Va., ordered enforcement of the NLRB's order. Management then asked for Supreme Court review on the ground that the board had no right to take its previous union-smashing record into consideration in the Greenville case. The high court's refusal of review leaves the order in effect.

The Supreme Court also left standing the refusal of the 1st U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Boston, Mass., to enforce an NLRB order that Purity Food Stores, Inc., must bargain with the Retail Clerks for employes of one store at Peabody, Mass.

The RCIA won an election at Peabody but the seven-store chain refused to bargain on the ground that Purity is an integrated company and the only appropriate bargaining unit would be one representing employes of all the stores.

The NLRB rejected the firm's argument. It ruled that each store has a manager with power to hire and assign work, and that each was independent in other ways also. The appeals court reversed the board, holding that, while the facts might differ in other chains, there was "no rational basis for fractionating" Peabody's operations.

In seeking Supreme Court review the NLRB argued that the lower court decision "may be crucial" in union organizing campaigns among 9 million retail store employes. Furthermore, it said, Congress gave it wide latitude in determining the size of bargaining units and that under the circumstances in Peabody, a single store unit was appropriate.

Lockheed Hails 30 Years Of Bargaining with IAM

Los Angeles — A major corporation here marked its 30 years of a union contract by issuing a pamphlet calling collective bargaining one of America's "most precious rights."

The eight-page pamphlet was distributed at plant gates by Lockheed Aircraft Corp. on the 30th anniversary of the company's first contract with the Machinists.

The IAM called the pamphlet, "Free Collective Bargaining, What It Means to You," probably the first of its kind in labor relations. The Los Angeles Times said that "no major corporation has used the approach adopted by Lockheed."

The pamphlet carried pictures and statements of both IAM Pres. Roy Siemiller and Lockheed Pres. A. Carl Kotchian.

"When an organization grows in size, as has Lockheed," the pamphlet declared, "the problem of keeping in touch with its people grows even faster. How do you solve it? One way is through collective bargaining.

"It helps keep our lines of communication open—something that critics frequently forget."

The praise for the relationship with the IAM doesn't mean that everything is perfect between the union and management. The IAM is still fighting for the union shop and other gains.

Rail Union Sponsors Car Design Contest

Cleveland — The Railroad Trainmen announced a contest calling for model railroaders to redesign, in model form, the interior of any passenger car now in service on a U.S. railroad to make it more attractive for travelers.

BRT Pres. Charles Luna said the contest is an attempt to "uncork some new design ideas from people who know railroads as well as anybody —model railroaders."

Models can be of any scale up to one-quarter inch to the foot. Prizes will be brass brakemen's lanterns with blue lenses for first place, red for second and clear for third.

Union, Con Ed Start Student Job Program

New York—Utility Workers Local 1-2 and Consolidated Edison Co. of New York have joined forces in a new program to provide jobs for youth from depressed sections of the city without interrupting their education.

Under the program, announced at a joint labor-management conference, Con Ed will hire both high school and college students who are in need on a part-time basis so they can remain in school.

The company also will seek out high school dropouts for training that will give them employment skills needed to stay on with Con Ed or obtain jobs elsewhere.

The New York City Central Labor Council will have an important role in the program. Through its civil rights committee, it will recruit youths for the job openings.

As part of an agreement worked out between Local 1-2 and management, the apprenticeship hiring-in rate for the youths will be $1.60 an hour. It is expected that the program will provide each part-time worker with 20 to 28 hours of employment each week.

Upon completion of training or expiration of the trial period under the union's collective bargaining agreement, whichever is later, the trainees will become full members of the union.

Local 1-2 Business Manager Michael Sampson stressed that youths receiving training under the program "will have no limits on developing skills and securing promotions and appropriate pay scales."

Both he and Con Ed. Vice Pres. Bernard Gallagher said they expected that 90 percent of the youths in training under the program would find future opportunities with Con Ed.

Pres. Harry Van Arsdale, Jr. of the Central Labor Council, who attended the conference, urged Con Ed Board Chairman Charles F. Luce, who was also present, to use his influence to extend the program to other corporations in this area.

New Haven Teachers Pick Union Over NEA

New Haven, Conn.—The American Federation of Teachers, AFL-CIO, dislodged the New Haven Teachers League, affiliated with the National Education Association, as collective bargaining agent for 1,271 public school teachers here.

The vote was AFT 635, NEA 434 in an election conducted under a new state law permitting public employes to organize and bargain.

AFT Local 933 announced that it is preparing to negotiate new contract terms with the New Haven School Board despite the league's existing three-year pact which still has nearly 18 months to run. The pact was so unsatisfactory, the union said, that teachers turned to the AFT to improve wages, said to be among the poorest in the state, and unsatisfactory working conditions.

The union's victory was one of a series in which AFT locals have defeated long-dominant NEA units—in New Rochelle, N. Y., Ansonia, Hartford and New Britain, Conn., and several Michigan school districts this year, following AFT successes last year in Washington, Baltimore, Detroit and other big-city areas.

The NEA unit defeated the AFT in a 1965 election and accepted a contract which permitted no bargaining on salaries for a three-year term. When the union won substantial wage gains at other cities in the East, New Haven teachers launched a move to replace the Teachers League with the AFT as bargaining agent.

Drive Leaders

The union's organizing drive was headed by Local 933 Pres. Harold Rogovin and AFT Rep. John Converse.

As of September, the AFT reported it had won 68 recent elections across the nation giving it the right to bargain collectively for 145,000 teachers, while NEA units won 72 elections covering 49,000 teachers.

Where teachers have had "a choice and a secret ballot, AFT outscored the NEA by almost 3 to 1," the union reported in its publication, American Teacher.

When the school semester opened in September, the determination of union teachers to win contract improvements led to work stoppages by 49,000 AFT members in the New York City school system, largest in the U.S.; 15,000 in 10 Michigan school districts including Detroit; and superior settlements in East St. Louis, Ill., after an eight-day "stayout" from school; in Baltimore, Md., and several Michigan school districts.

Average Rises To 5% In Contract Settlements

Major collective bargaining settlements negotiated during the first nine months of 1967 contained first-year increases averaging 5 percent for nearly 2.75 million workers, the U.S. Dept. of Labor's Bureau of Labor Statistics has calculated. This was for wages only, without counting the value of new fringe benefits.

Median increases surpassed the 4.8 percent hikes won by unions for the full year 1966. They average 5 percent for both manufacturing and nonmanufacturing industries against 4.2 and 5 percent, respectively, recorded in 1966.

The number of workers covered by the increases was more than twice the number affected by settlements during the comparable period last year, according to preliminary BLS estimates.

The report was the latest by BLS on major wage developments in contract agreements covering 1,000 or more workers in all private nonagricultural industries.

Key settlements—those affecting units of 5,000 or more workers—covered 1.7 million workers in the nine-month period. BLS estimated that when actual timing of wage and benefit changes was taken into account, the median increase amounted to 4.9 percent a year, compared with 4.5 percent the year before.

Figured in percentages, 30 percent of the affected workers will get annual increases of 3-4.5 percent under the key settlements; 48 percent will get 4.5 to 6 percent and 22 percent, 6 percent and up.

Third-quarter settlements alone covered about 700,000 workers, compared with about 2 million in the preceding six months, and did not alter the bargaining picture recorded earlier in the year, the report showed.

Bargaining in the auto and copper mining, smelting and refining industries did not result in settlements in the quarter. The Auto Worker-Ford agreement was reached in October and 60,000 Steelworkers and other copper company workers are still on strike for improved contracts. The strike started July 15 against eight nonferrous metals firms producing most of the industry's copper.

BLS said that the only industry-wide settlement in the third quarter was between the Rubber Workers and the major rubber firms. These provided wage boosts of 43 cents an hour over three years, with additional 10-cent increases for skilled workers, and improvements in supplemental benefits.

Meany Urges Prompt Action:

Senate Bill Backed On Social Security

Meany noted, "they would be much better occupied taking care of their children in their homes. The Senate should recast the work and training program to make it voluntary and meaningful."

A hard core of conservative opponents served notice they would fight to substitute the less-generous House bill. However, the more liberal majority appeared to have the votes to preserve the higher benefits of the Senate Finance Committee bill.

Awaiting the floor in the Senate after the social security bill is passed were two other major bills—an Administration-backed expansion of the aid to elementary and secondary education program and a bill combining postal rate increases with pay raises for nearly 2 million salaried federal employes.

A key feature of the school aid bill would permit appropriations to be made a year in advance—thus enabling school districts to plan ahead with knowledge of the federal funds which would be available in the new school year.

It also modifies somewhat the "bloc grants" the House voted for state agencies for supplementary education centers—dropping federal controls over how the money is spent.

A threat of a southern filibuster to force the Senate to go along with the House version led Senate leaders to hold up action on the bill until after the social security legislation is acted on.

The pay raise provisions of the Senate bill are the same as those passed by the House—a two-step 11 percent raise for postal workers and an initial 4.5 percent increase for the classified civil service, with additional raises over the next two years to achieve full comparability with private industry. Deleted by the Senate was a provision of the House bill which would have denied any raises to employes of the Office of Economic Opportunity.

Before taking up the social security bill, the Senate passed a labor-supported bill establishing federal safety standards and regulation of natural gas pipelines. The Senate approved one amendment to the committee bill urged by the AFL-CIO and rejected another.

Adopted was an amendment to cover natural gas gathering lines as well as the big transmission pipelines. Rejected was a proposal to set criminal penalties for willful violation of the safety regulations.

Congress sent to the White House a sharply cut $2.67 billion foreign aid authorization bill and the House Appropriations Committee cleared for a floor vote an even more heavily slashed $2.2 billion money bill.

Pres. Johnson, who had asked for $3.2 billion, voiced deep concern as he signed the authorization bill into law.

He said the cutbacks and restrictions in the bill "will seriously inhibit this government's effort to assure and enlarge the security of the free world. For 20 years we recognized the link between that security and our own. We should not lose sight of it now."

The President asked each member of Congress to search his mind and heart before acting "to erode these vital programs even further." He said foreign aid is not "luxuries to be disposed of when the going gets tough" but "the lifeblood of freedom in the world."

Labor Backs Proposal For D.C. House Member

The people of the District of Columbia are entitled to voting representation in Congress, the AFL-CIO said in Senate testimony supporting a proposed constitutional amendment.

Legislative Rep. F. Howard McGuigan endorsed a resolution by Sen. Birch Bayh (D-Ind.), chairman of the Senate Judiciary Subcommittee on Constitutional Amendments. It would guarantee the District of Columbia one House member, with authority for Congress to increase the representation in the future.

McGuigan said the proposed amendment, which has been urged by Pres. Johnson, would be "a significant step forward" toward the goal of "full suffrage and full representation for the people of the District of Columbia."

He said the AFL-CIO prefers the Senate resolution to a companion measure approved by the House Judiciary Committee. The House committee added to the resolution a provision that the nation's capital be treated as a state, with two senators as well as House members.

Controversy over statehood status, most observers believe, would be a major handicap in obtaining the two-thirds vote needed in each House of Congress to initiate a constitutional amendment and the three-fourths ratification by the states.

The 800,000 D.C. residents now may vote only for President and a a local school board. McGuigan stressed that "unfortunately, they still have no vote, no voice in their local government and they have no elected representative to speak up for them in the halls of Congress."

$1.60 Buys 'Volunteers' To Seek Union Shop Ban

Tulsa, Okla.—The going rate for "volunteers" to solicit signatures on a "right-to-work" petition in Oklahoma is $1.60 an hour.

A reporter for the McAlester Daily Democrat discovered the pay scale when he questioned some of the young women seeking signatures in downtown Tulsa.

The director for Oklahomans for Right to Work, the group which is sponsoring the drive to put a proposal to outlaw the union shop on the ballot in Oklahoma, said 4,000 "volunteers" are collecting signatures.

But the newspaper found that two Tulsa firms—a company which hires out part-time workers to businesses and a market research company—were supplying solicitors.

One of the $1.60 "volunteers" said she and the other hired petition circulators were supposed to bring in 15 names an hour, but seldom were able to meet the quota.

Glass Container Talks Set to Open Nov. 28

Philadelphia—Negotiations covering 40,000 workers in the glass container industry will begin Nov. 28, more than a month ahead of schedule, Glass Bottle Blowers Pres. Lee W. Minton announced.

Minton said the industry accepted the union's proposal for an early start in bargaining. He predicted that an agreement can be negotiated before a Jan. 31, 1968 contract expiration.

Senate Opens Hearings:

Unions Spur Drive For Strong Meat Bill

House rejection of federal inspection — the major meat packing companies indicated they would not oppose the Montoya compromise. The meat packers had first opposed any action by Congress, then retreated to support of the House bill as a "lesser evil" than federal inspection.

Labor still prefers the Mondale measure, AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. James S. Doherty told the Senate subcommittee.

Most of the 28 state inspection programs which now exist, he stressed, "have lax standards, weak enforcement and are under-financed and under-manned."

Meat Cutters Vice Pres. Leon B. Schachter and Les Orear, spokesman for the Packinghouse Workers, spoke of the conditions that exist in plants without federal inspectors.

"Filth, vermin and even parts of rats become part of products to be consumed by human beings," Schachter said.

He told the senators that "it is hardly a secret in the trade that live cattle which obviously cannot pass inspection are sent to uninspected plants." This is done, he said, even by "some highly reputable firms. Their competition does it. They must do it. . . . Only Congress can break this cycle by extending meat inspection and by providing the same rules for all."

Orear said UPWA members working in uninspected plants have reported such incidents as "cartons packed with lard after rat leavings had been emptied from them."

He showed the committee a collection of photographs of unsanitary conditions found by the union in Chicago—even though Illinois has one of the better state inspection programs.

Miss Furness reiterated in her testimony that the Administration favors federal inspection of all meat plants, even though an Agriculture Dept. spokesman endorsed the Montoya bill.

She said most housewives mistakenly believe all meat is federally inspected, not realizing that almost 9 billion pounds of uninspected meat is sold each year.

Two House members who had led an unsuccessful fight for a stronger inspection bill told the Senate subcommittee they believed the House would go along with federal inspection on a showdown vote. Representatives Neal Smith (D-Ia.) and Thomas S. Foley (D-Wash.) stressed that their federal inspection amendment lost on a non-record vote. It would pass, they predicted, on a rollcall.

The AFL-CIO statement stressed that meat inspection is not "an academic issue." It involves "cheating" the consumer into paying normal prices for meat which may have come from sick animals and which could cause serious illness, Doherty noted.

He said there is no issue of states' rights because packinghouses exempt from federal meat inspection are covered by other federal laws, including the Fair Labor Standards Act. "Certainly, Congress will not tell a mother that her children can become ill because meat inspection legislation places a plant in intrastate commerce when that very factory is considered in interstate commerce under a host of other existing legislation," he added.

FEDERAL INSPECTION of all meat was urged by AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. James F. Doherty in Senate testimony. He tells Sen. Harry F. Byrd, Jr. (D-Va.), chairman of an Agriculture subcommittee, that the weak House-passed bill is "a hoax on the American consumer."

Farmers' Body Backs NLRA In Agriculture

The National Farmers Organization, which speaks for tens of thousands of Midwest farmers and ranchers, has given a strong endorsement to a labor-backed bill to bring agricultural workers under the National Labor Relations Act.

The NFO urged Congress to pass the legislation "so that farm laborers may have the opportunity to join together and bargain collectively for a fair price for their labor just as we are bargaining for a fair price for the agricultural products produced by the family-type farmer."

Its statement was submitted by Harvey Sickels, NFO secretary and legislative representative, to a House Labor subcommittee headed by Rep. Frank Thompson, Jr. (D-N.J.).

Small farmers are competing with their own labor against the low-paid workers employed by the big corporate farms, the NFO stressed.

When the big farms "hire cheap labor because agriculture is not under the National Labor Relations Act," the NFO said, "this is unfair to the family-type farm operator since it means that the farmer and his wife will only be able to earn a like amount for their own labor. . . . Such competition makes it extremely difficult if not, indeed, impossible for the family-type farm operator ever to share in the prosperous economy of this nation."

Labor Condemns Bid To Curb FPC's Scope

The consumer would be the loser if Congress should exempt a large group of electric power companies from federal regulation, the AFL-CIO warned.

Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller urged a House Commerce subcommittee to reject legislation shrinking the jurisdiction of the Federal Power Commission. A bill sponsored by Rep. Paul G. Rogers (D-Fla.) would exempt privately-owned utilities operating in a single state without direct power tie-ins across state lines and all electric cooperatives financed by the Rural Electrification Administration.

Biemiller charged the legislation is "primarily intended to afford relief for the Florida Power & Light Co.," which has brought a court challenge to the jurisdiction of the FPC.

Although the FPC regulates only wholesale rates, this has helped keep down the cost of power purchased by small publicly owned utilities, Biemiller noted. The lower wholesale rates have meant lower electric bills for consumers.

A major ill-effect of curbing the FPC jurisdiction, the AFL-CIO statement stressed, would be to discourage utilities from participation in interstate power-pooling networks which result in both lower costs to consumers and greater reliability of electric power.

Biemiller charged that the bill being considered by the House subcommittee would "erode sound regulation. It would make it more difficult to achieve reasonable power rates to the consumer. It would provide a major roadblock to the achievement of a modern, efficient, reliable and non-discriminatory mixed ownership national power supply system."

Oakland Trainees Given Chance as Apprentices

Oakland, Calif.—Unemployed young men from the Central Labor Council's job-training program will be given a chance to become apprentice carpenters under an agreement reached here by the Alameda County AFL-CIO and the Bay Counties Carpenters District Council.

Two youths from the council's $1.5 million training program—financed by the U.S. Labor Dept.'s Neighborhood Youth Corps — already have taken the apprentice carpenters' entrance examination. One passed and was hired by an employer. The other had math trouble and will be permitted to try again with the next three applicants.

J. W. Gaines, director of the council training program, and Tom Cherry, coordinator for the Carpenters' apprenticeship and training program, announced the agreement to employ qualified youths as apprentices on construction projects, including a Bay area rapid transit program. Those selected come from poverty or low-income areas.

Cherry said the objective is to build up a backlog of qualified apprentices to be placed on jobs as openings occur. Employment prospects are "fairly secure," he said.

The Alameda AFL-CIO first sponsored an anti-poverty program in cooperation with the Office of Economic Opportunity in 1965. The program was transferred to the Youth Corps and won attention when its evaluation and developmental program was adopted by the Corps last April, according to Gaines. Under it, high school dropouts from poverty areas get their first work experience, training in marketable skills and job placement.

The council announced here that 112 youths from its Youth Corps program would be selected for a pre-apprenticeship training project developed by the Labor Dept. and the Operating Engineers at Santa Rosa, Calif.

War Is 'Handy Excuse' For Great Society Foes

Worcester, Mass.—The Viet Nam war is being used as an excuse for budget-cutting demands by people who would want to slash Great Society programs even if there were no war, a top White House aide charged.

Presidential Assistant Joseph A. Califano, Jr., speaking at Holy Cross College, said bluntly that the end of fighting in Viet Nam would not mean that Congress would transfer the $24 billion-a-year appropriation to needed domestic programs.

"The Viet Nam war provides a handy excuse for some who never really wanted the Great Society programs," Califano asserted.

"These are the men who believe that poverty is the eternal lot of those born into it, something to be changed by chance not by choice; who think that good health is the privilege of the few who can afford it, rather than the right of all; who consider a good job a privilege for those who can pay for education and training, rather than a birthright opportunity for those with . . . talent and ambition.

"War or no war," Califano stressed, "these men will oppose Great Society programs."

The presidential aide told the students that one of the Administration's "little noticed—and most significant — achievements" has been the development of a "public interest partnership" in which the resources of government are joined with those of industry, labor and other private organizations to attack social problems.

This concept, he said, is bearing fruit in such examples as:

- "The Job Corps Center run by a space-age contractor.
- "The doctor who brings his healing skills to the war on poverty or to a Peace Corps mission.
- "The participation of a firm in a Neighborhood Youth Corps Center to salvage high school dropouts.
- "The involvement of a union, a church group or a fraternal organization in the rent supplement program."

Clothing Workers Cite Member Gain

Rochester, N. Y. — Organizing drives have expanded the Clothing Workers' membership at a rate of 7.5 to 8 percent over the past five months, the union's executive board was told at a meeting here.

ACWA Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky said reports from all regions indicate the gains in members are being made in all areas of the union's jurisdiction.

Dir. Howard D. Samuel of ACWA's Union Label Dept. said that promotion of the label is being used in connection with organizing drives.

Labor Asks Full Funding:

Anti-Poverty Drive Preserved by House

and must—restore the funds and strengthen the programs which are vitally necessary to help those Americans at the bottom of the economic ladder. An affluent nation can do no less."

Even if the conference improves on the House bill—as it is expected to do—the decisive money showdown is still to come. Separate legislation is required to actually appropriate the funds Congress authorizes, and the powerful House economy bloc has served notice it will fight any significant increase over last year's appropriation of slightly more than $1.6 billion.

In addition to the money difference, the House bill would give more control over community action programs to elected public officials and would require local programs to put up 10 percent of the cost in cash as well as 10 percent in services and facilities.

The Senate-passed bill continues the present 90-10 financing, with the 10 percent local contribution payable in services.

Held Southerners

The decision of the House Education & Labor Committee to give elected public officials greater control over programs in their communities was credited with helping to hold southern votes against repeated Republican attempts to change the entire structure of the war on poverty.

Republicans turned out in an unsuccessful attempt to substitute state rather than city and county control, but GOP leaders were noticeably absent on a vote on an amendment by Democrat Augustus F. Hawkins (Calif.) to leave the community action programs as they are now.

Despite the money reduction, passage of the anti-poverty bill without crippling amendments through a basically conservative House was viewed in the nation's capital as a major Administration victory.

At the start of the six-day debate, there was a serious question as to whether any poverty bill could muster a majority in a House seemingly hopelessly split over the direction the war on poverty should take and over whether in fact the entire program should be scrapped.

The final vote, at the end of an exhausting 12-hour day, brought the biggest bipartisan majority for the program in its three-year history — a stronger vote of confidence than had been mustered even in the liberal 89th Congress.

While hard-core opponents were mocking the program—at times in language similar to the "rat debate" earlier this year—the new urban coalition was making quiet progress in the lobbies of the Capitol and in the offices of congressmen.

Labor, the League of Women Voters, church and civil rights groups worked in close harmony. And so did a new breed of business and industry spokesmen—not the lobbyists from the Chamber of Commerce and the National Association of Manufacturers, but community leaders concerned at the cancer of hard-core poverty and hopelessness in the midst of a prosperous America.

Telegrams and statements from Republican as well as Democratic mayors, painstakingly-written letters from mothers of children in Head Start programs which were being forced to shut down for lack of funds, all had their impact.

The Speaker of the House, John W. McCormack, who normally does not participate in debate, took the floor to lead a successful fight against a Republican amendment that would have hacked the spending authority to a crippling $1.4 billion.

About two dozen Republicans broke with the GOP leadership to help defeat the cut.

McCormack termed the vote "a crucial test" of whether an affluent America "has become calloused and blind to the needs of the less affluent."

The nation, he said, "can well afford an adequate war against poverty. The question is whether we care enough to want it."

On final passage, most Republicans joined the big majority of Democrats to support the bill, but House GOP Leader Gerald R. Ford (Mich.) and Republican Whip Leslie C. Arends (Ill.) were among the 129 diehard holdouts.

Also voting against final passage were Representatives Charles E. Goodell (R-N.Y.) and Albert H. Quie (R-Minn.), who earlier had insisted that their series of gutting amendments was intended to "save" the war on poverty from being abandoned.

On the final vote, 186 Democrats and 97 Republicans voted for the bill.

Opposed were 79 Republicans and 50 Democrats.

President Joins Tribute to Meany, Lauds Labor's Role in Progress

CIO president had fought "in good company" to achieve a higher minimum wage, a 40-hour work week, the right to organize, bargain and strike, the enactment of child labor laws, safer working conditions, and social security.

"But there is more to the story—much more," the President added. "George Meany . . . saw new battles to fight. He believed that what is good for America is good for labor . . . and that is why we honor him tonight."

Broadening the horizons of opportunity is a great challenge to Meany, the President declared. He said that the AFL-CIO president "understands that America's most urgent problems are also union problems, that civil rights, the rights of the poor, the rights of consumers, the rights of citizens to a pure and safe environment . . . all these constitute the human rights of Americans."

Sharing the speakers' platform with the President were Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, Sen. Jacob K. Javits (R-N.Y.), Israel's Golda Meir, New York Mayor John V. Lindsay and AFL-CIO Vice Pres. A. Philip Randolph.

Charles S. Zimmerman, a vice president of the Ladies' Garment Workers and former chairman of the President's Committee on Civil Rights, was toastmaster. Frederick O'Neal, president of Actors Equity Association, was dinner chairman. Nearly half the members of the AFL-CIO Executive Council were guests.

Accepting the Human Rights Award, presented by Zimmerman and JLC Executive Sec. Emanuel Muravchik, Meany said he was doing so because he considered it a recognition of the whole trade union movement. He used the opportunity to deliver a searing indictment of the Soviet Union on the occasion of the 50th anniversary of the Russian revolution.

"I am concerned," he said, "about developments in western Europe . . . people going to Moscow to celebrate the 50th anniversary of the death of social democracy and of the free trade union movement."

He blasted the USSR for its "insidious" techniques of controlling social, political and cultural life and called on his trade union audience "not to reject the commitments on which the American labor movement has based its efforts to bring about a better way of life for all people." He said:

"We in this country seek no rapprochement. The American trade union movement stands for the dignity of the human being, for education, for full voting rights, for civil rights for all Americans and people everywhere, and for better living standards."

Randolph paid tribute to Pres. Johnson for his "magnificent contributions" to the battle for civil rights, the war against poverty and for social justice. He deplored the escalation of racial violence and demonstrations against the war in Viet Nam.

"These eruptions pose a threat to the safety of our cities, our states and our nation," he declared.

He called black power "a step backward to degradation and segregation," adding that those who advocate black power or white supremacy become their own "grave diggers."

Wirtz pointed to a "tradition of leadership leading from Samuel Gompers to William Green to George Meany," and held that a "partnership" of labor and government has brought about progress for all Americans.

Mrs. Meir praised Meany for his efforts in behalf of the free labor movement throughout the world and especially in behalf of Israel.

Mayor Lindsay declared that "our country, this city and our community has been better off because of the work of this man."

Congress Votes Step-Up In Air Pollution Control

Congress voted final approval of a major expansion of federal state programs to combat air pollution—a high-priority legislative goal of the Administration and the AFL-CIO.

It sent to the White House a "Clean Air Act," authorizing $428 million in federal pollution control and research funds over a three-year period.

Congress didn't give the federal government the first-level authority to set pollution control standards which the AFL-CIO Executive Council strongly urged earlier this year. But it did authorize the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare to step in and do the job if the states fail to act.

The bill also empowers the federal government to seek emergency court injunctions to shut down sources of pollution which create a "substantial" health hazard. Under this authority, the government could even bar auto traffic as well as close down smokestacks during a smog emergency.

The Senate accepted the lower dollar ceiling in the House bill—$272 million less than the Senate had voted. However, if the full amount authorized should actually be appropriated—which is far from certain—it would be a fivefold increase over the total federal spending on air pollution control during the past three years.

The bill provides for regional airshed approaches to pollution control standards, with federal authority to set up commissions to regulate problem regions where the states did not act.

It earmarks $125 million in the first two years of the program for research to determine which fuels or pollutants are most to blame for dirty air.

California won its battle to continue to insist on higher automobile pollution controls than the federal government imposes nationwide.

The state pioneered in compelling auto manufacturers to put special pollution control devices on all cars sold in the state. The first bill brought to the House floor would have made the federal standards binding on all states. But with rare, bipartisan unanimity, California's congressional delegation won the right to impose tougher standards so that auto-choked freeways will be less likely to mean smog-choked cities.

15% Social Security Boost Wins by Big Senate Margin

Copper Probe Asked:

Strike Assistance Given Top Priority

By Eugene A. Kelly

Twenty-two unions representing striking copper workers rallied the labor movement to give "generous financial support" to the 60,000 strikers and pledged that "we will not permit the strikers to be starved out."

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told representatives of the unions at a Washington, D. C. meeting that he will give the plight of the strikers "first priority" at the Executive Council meeting Dec. 6 and the convention that follows in Bal Harbour, Fla.

The conferees met as the strike against eight copper firms entered its fifth month without any meaningful move by the employers to seek contract settlements.

By unanimous vote, the meeting urged the U.S. Dept. of Justice to "launch an immediate investigation of the domestic and international manipulations of these companies that are the root cause of their refusal to bargain."

It also called on the National Labor Relations Board to speed up its efforts to end the "intransigent refusal" of the companies to bargain in good faith.

"We solicit the generous financial support of other affiliated unions of the AFL-CIO," the conference declared, "to a fund established in the headquarters of the AFL-CIO to insure the continued protection of the strikers and their families

LBJ Prods Bills to Aid Consumers

Pres. Johnson prodded Congress to faster action on consumer legislation, including "the strongest possible meat inspection bill" and a "truth-in-lending" law urgently needed because "interest rates are going up every day" and "poor people pay the highest rates."

The President signed a bill creating a Product Safety Commission to report on hazardous products and complained that it was the first consumer bill to reach his desk this year.

"It ought to be the twelfth," he said sternly. "We need many others. We need them now. We ought to have had them already."

Opposition Collapses:

Stronger Meat Bill Up for Senate Vote

The Senate moved toward passage of a strong, labor-backed meat inspection bill as opposition collapsed under a storm of public protest against an ineffective House-passed bill.

At issue is whether 9 billion pounds of meat sold each year without crossing state lines should carry the same guarantee of wholesomeness as the 51 billion pounds of federally-inspected meat sold in interstate commerce.

The Senate bill, the AFL-CIO said, would provide that guarantee.

Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller termed it an "effective, common-sense measure" that could "put an end to the sale of tainted meat. It establishes strong federal standards that the states must match to maintain their jurisdiction over inspection procedures."

Such a federal-state partnership, Biemiller said, "can at long last relieve American families from the danger of poisoning at the meat counter."

The final version of the Senate bill was put together by Senators Joseph M. Montoya (D-N.M.) and Walter F. Mondale (D-Minn.) who, during a weekend of intensive negotiations, combined key features of their separate bills.

They brought it before the Senate Agriculture Committee and won a unanimous endorsement.

As does the House bill, it provides matching funds to any state that sets up an effective meat inspection program up to federal standards.

It goes beyond the House bill in these key provisions:

- If a state does not set up an

Meany Hails Gains Over House Bill

By David L. Perlman

The Senate voted 78-6 approval of a bill raising social security payments by at least 15 percent for the nearly 23 million persons receiving old age or survivors' benefits.

Those receiving the lowest benefits would get considerably bigger percentage increases under the Senate measure. The minimum would rise from $44 to $70 for a single worker—a 59 percent jump—and from $66 to $105 for an elderly couple.

The Senate also dropped most of the punitive public welfare restrictions which had been voted by the House and adopted an amendment which could lead to lower prices for prescription drugs.

In a key 58-22 vote, the Senate beat down a Republican motion to substitute the less generous, more restrictive House-passed bill for the labor and Administration-backed bill.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany termed the Senate-passed bill "substantially better—in every important category—than the bill passed earlier by the House."

It has "a better benefit structure, sounder financing, more humanitarian welfare provisions, somewhat better medicare provisions and considerably improved medicaid."

The AFL-CIO is "particularly pleased that the Senate has restored Pres. Johnson's recommendations for increased social security benefits," Meany said.

NLRB Asserts Coverage Over Private Hospitals

The National Labor Relations Board has asserted jurisdiction over private hospitals and nursing homes in the United States because of their "ever-increasing impact" on commerce and also because they are "intimately connected with the public health and welfare of the nation."

Reappraising a 1960 decision in the light of vastly expanded hospitalization insurance and the medicare program, the five-member NLRB agreed unanimously to order elections within 30 days at two private health care facilities—a hospital in Oroville, Calif., and a nursing home in Wheaton, Md., a Washington suburb.

The board granted petitions for representation elections by Building Service Employes Local 22 among 125 nonprofessional employes of the Medical Center Hospital in Oroville, and State, County & Municipal Employes Local 1 among 41 workers at the University Nursing Home, Inc., Wheaton.

The AFL-CIO filed briefs supporting the NLRB's finding, which was opposed by employer organizations.

Times have changed, the board declared, since its 1960 decision declining to permit an election among employes of the Flatbush General Hospital in Brooklyn, N. Y.

Runaway U.S. Plants 'Mushroom' in Mexico

A sharp increase in the number of U.S. firms jumping the Mexican border to exploit low wages for greater profits has been reported by AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nathaniel Goldfinger.

Goldfinger said the "mushrooming" problem of border-jumping runaway industries is a cause of "increasing concern" to the U.S. labor movement.

The AFL-CIO, he noted, has called on federal agencies to refuse assistance and advice to runaway operations that result in the loss of jobs by U.S. workers.

Goldfinger's statement called attention to recent reports that U.S. firms are setting up operations across the border in ever-expanding numbers.

In April 1967, the Labor Dept. listed 33 U.S. firms operating in Mexico. A recent New York Times article said more than 70 are now there. The AFL-CIO Dept. of Research suggested that the figure may exceed 100.

New Deadline Set by UAW in Chrysler Talks

Detroit — The Auto Workers sanctioned two new strikes and set a new deadline—Nov. 26—for settlement of national contract terms for 8,000 white collar workers at Chrysler Corp. offices.

The Chrysler deadline was put back five days because of the death of Valentine Reuther, father of UAW Pres. Walter P. Reuther, in Wheeling, W.Va. The elder Reuther, 86, was a past president of the Ohio Valley Trades & Labor Assembly.

Eight plants of Deere & Co. were struck Nov. 17 when management refused to match the pattern won by UAW at Caterpillar Tractor Co., farm equipment maker. Most of the 20,000 strikers are in the Peoria, Ill. area.

The 54 tool and die shops represented by the Detroit Tooling Association closed down Nov. 20 when a local representing 5,500 employes rejected an offer the union called "'shocking and grossly inadequate."

Still to be settled are contracts with Allis-Chalmers, Massey-Ferguson, Oliver and Intl. Harvester, other farm equipment makers.

The UAW won a three-year contract for 95,000 Chrysler production and maintenance workers Nov. 7. The pact has been approved by vote of affected locals—by a margin of 70 percent among production workers, 55 percent among skilled trades workers, with two locals still to vote.

Most Chrysler workers have been recalled but full production cannot resume until agreements at the local plant level are concluded. The union won a settlement similar to the Ford Motor Co. agreement but still must win terms that will meet the approval of clerical and engineering workers on national and local issues. Negotiations are continuing on all unsettled issues.

A feature of the Chrysler settlement was a provision that will bring Canadian workers up to the U.S. pay level over a span of 2.5 years. In Windsor, Ont., UAW Local 444, with 10,000 Chrysler workers as members, voted to accept the parity formula and to extend the deadline on other issues to next Jan. 15.

The UAW said it is preparing to intensify bargaining with General Motors Corp., largest of the auto firms employing 400,000 members of the union in the U.S.

AIR LINE STEWARDESSES backed by their union, Transport Workers Local 505, picketed Pan American Airways at San Francisco Airport after it took away a stewardess's credit card for wearing a mini-skirt on an off-duty flight. Strengthened Meat Bill Gains Support in Senate effective program within two years, federal meat inspection will be extended to all plants in that state.

- Without waiting for the two-year period, the federal government can close down any plant that constitutes a health hazard and seize and destroy any unwholesome meat.
- Any governor may immediately extend federal meat inspection to all plants in his state instead of setting up a separate state inspection program.
- Even after a state inspection program is established, the federal government would make periodic inspections to assure that the program is being adequately enforced.
- State standards must be "at least equal to" those of the federal meat inspection service.

The Montoya-Mondale bill received a quick endorsement from the Meat Cutters, which termed it "strong, effective protection to safeguard the health of consumers and meat industry workers." Betty Furness, Pres. Johnson's consumer affairs assistant, said "It has my fullest support." She said it "will assure the nation's housewives that the meat they serve their families will be pure."

Industry Maneuvers

The meat industry lobby, rolling with the punch, decided against a frontal attack on the Senate bill. The American Meat Institute, the leading industry spokesman, had initially opposed any further inspection of meat. Then it backed the House bill in order to stave off legislation extending federal meat inspection to larger plants within a single state. When it became apparent that the Senate would insist on a stronger bill, it endorsed the original Montoya proposal. And finally it said the strengthened Montoya-Mondale bill was acceptable if it could be modified to take care of some "problem areas."

The Senate Agriculture Committee made a minor change in the bill, but rejected any major modification.

Conference Next

After Senate passage, the next move would be up to a House-Senate conference committee—and to the House. The House rejected full federal inspection on a non-record vote with heavy absenteeism. Supporters of a strong bill have expressed confidence that the Senate bill would win House approval on a roll call vote.

Newspapers throughout the nation and television programs, including the new Public Broadcasting Laboratory, have brought to millions of housewives dramatic exposes of unwholesome meat being processed in filthy plants—the same type of conditions which led to passage of the federal meat inspection law 60 years ago.

NLRB Asserts Coverage Over Private Hospitals

In its Oroville ruling the NLRB relates that the employer argued that the operations of private hospitals in general have an insufficient impact on commerce to warrant a change. The board disagreed, citing these reasons:

- While all hospitals are primarily humanitarian institutions, operationally they are a multi-billion dollar complex comprising one of the nation's largest industries.
- Registered nurses, dietitians and therapists must be recruited from all parts of the country.
- Purchases of supplies and equipment "clearly have a substantial impact" on interstate commerce.
- As of 1965, more than 970 private hospitals had gross revenues of $551 million. More than 18,000 private nursing homes had 835,000 beds and gross national expenditures of $1.2 billion—an increase of 754 percent since 1950.

The NLRB also cited the "financial impact of billions of consumer dollars expended by millions of Americans for health protection and care."

The national medicare program had a first-year operating budget in excess of $2 billion, said the board, adding that at the end of 1964, 79.2 percent of the U.S. civilian population was enrolled for health care benefits in Blue Cross and other hospital care programs.

Cited also were the "numerous public health and welfare enactments" of Congress, financed by public funds. They have a major impact on commerce, the board said, and "we believe that the public interest would be served by making available the orderly and peaceful procedures" of the labor act.

Presidential Task Force:

Health Panel Asks Sweeping Reforms

A Presidential task force—whose 15 members include eight doctors—has recommended sweeping reforms in health care, medical schools, hospitals, health insurers and in the licensing of physicians.

Unless changes are made, "a crisis in American health care" will worsen with citizens getting less and less satisfactory care at higher and higher costs, the National Advisory Commission on Health warned.

The commission, named by Pres. Johnson, has studied the state of the nation's health services since May 1966. In addition to the eight doctors, it has three representatives from business, three from education and one from labor—AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph A. Beirne, who is president of the Communications Workers.

The report submitted to the President by the commission recommended more than 50 major changes in the nation's health care system.

The need for added federal funds was evident throughout the proposals—with more money urged to assist medical schools, medical students, health research, hospitals and special programs for "disadvantaged".

In accepting the report, the President said he would ask every department of government concerned with health care to evaluate the recommendations and report back to him with full comment on them.

Commission Chairman J. Irwin Miller, board chairman of Cummins Engine Co., Columbus, Ind. at a briefing on the report, said that until the present decade the nation has had tough problems to face in improving health care.

But "from here on out," he added, "we probably have catastrophes to prevent."

Symptoms of the health care "crisis," the commission said, are long waits to see a doctor, hurried impersonal attention once the patient is seen, obsolete hospitals in major cities and costs rising so "sharply" that "they already prohibit care for some and create major financial burdens for many more."

It also hit the "uneven distribution of care," as indicated by health statistics of the rural poor, urban ghetto dwellers and migrant workers—statistics that it said resemble "those of a developing country."

Among the commission's major recommendations were:

- Highest priority for improving the health care for the poor and needy. Government and private programs in this area should be "markedly expanded with recognition of the problems of this segment of the population," the commission said.
- Revisions in government medicare and medicaid payment arrangements to provide economic incentives for more efficient operations by hospitals and other health-care institutions, and greater penalties for those that waste federal funds.
- A firm requirement by government programs that local groups of doctors review charges and treatment methods to prevent "bill padding," unnecessary services or low-quality care.
- A system of review boards that also would subject physicians to periodic examinations to qualify them for relicensing. Doctors would be required to continue their education to pass the tests.

OPEIU Blasts Phony Raid by Liquor Agents

New York—Pres. Howard Coughlin of the Office & Professional Employes told a news conference here that California state liquor agents and the Hayward, Calif., police staged a raid on a union organizing meeting in Hayward. Coughlin demanded a "full personal investigation" by Gov. Ronald Reagan and the mayor of Hayward.

Coughlin said he was informed that six agents from the California Alcoholic Beverage Control Board and the Hayward Police Dept. interrupted a union-called conference at the Doric Motel in Hayward.

The uninvited guests said they were acting on an anonymous telephoned complaint that liquor was to be served at the meeting to minors, Coughlin said. He reported that the raiders went from table to table, checking identifications and ages against a list of union members and "sniffing every glass on the tables."

"Finding no shred of evidence to support the alleged complaint, the officers apologized and left," Coughlin told newsmen.

The raid, he said, highlighted a management-inspired anti-union campaign that continued until the day of a National Labor Relations Board election among employes of Associated Films, a film distributing agency. The union won, 13-5, Coughlin reported.

THE TRADE UNION situation in Israel is the topic under discussion between Aharon Becker, secretary-general of Histadrut, the Israeli Federation of Labor (right), AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Israeli Ambassador Avraham Harman at a luncheon given by the AFL-CIO for Becker during his visit to the U.S.

'First Priority':

Labor Pledges Help To Copper Strikers

from suffering." (Text of Statement, Page 4.)

The conferees announced that simultaneous support rallies will be held Nov. 29 in Butte, Mont., Tucson, Ariz., Cleveland, O., Perth Amboy, N. J., Waterbury, Conn., El Paso, Tex., and Nov. 30 in Salt Lake City, Utah.

"The copper strikers need and deserve the wages, hours and conditions for which they are on strike," the conference participants said. "The labor movement is determined that they shall have the victory they so rightly deserve."

Meany called the meeting after federal mediators reported no progress in several efforts to get management and labor back into meaningful negotiations.

Since July 15, he told the conference, members of unions in the nonferrous metals industry have been on strike "for a fair costract, providing reasonable wages and working conditions."

The strike was "provoked and perpetuated by major employers whose aims have little to do with the terms of the labor contract," Meany said. The conferees charged in their statement that the employers want to:

- Exhaust surplus copper supplies in order to create an artificial crisis and bring governmental action "adverse to the interests of the strikers."
- Create a "sellers' market" that will "permit substantial copper price increases when production is resumed."
- Destroy the effectiveness of collective bargaining in the industry by refusing to bargain "on any terms but their own."
- Starve the strikers into submission on the cynical pretext of "fighting inflation" and "curbing union power."

The employer campaign is having extreme economic dislocation in a dozen states, the statement reported. American consumers of copper have been compelled to buy foreign copper at more than 60 cents a pound—22 cents above the U.S. price. The future of the industry, the conferees said, has been endangered by accelerated efforts to find substitutes for copper and brass.

The union representatives declared that the "most obvious evidence that this strike was provoked for ulterior motives is the profit position of the companies." Few if any industries, the statement observed, can match their record in profits per employe, yet "the industry for years has held to 19th Century bargaining policies and a 19th Century outlook" on wages and other worker benefits.

"The labor movement will not allow the campaign of these companies to succeed," the conferees said. "We will not permit the strikers to be starved out. We are determined to expose the facts and bring this struggle to a swift and successful conclusion."

The conference urged all union members to join copper strikers at the rallies set for Nov. 29 and 30 "to demonstrate labor's solidarity and support."

Signing the statement, besides Meany, were Pres. I. W. Abel, Sec.-Treas. Walter J. Burke, Vice Pres. Joseph P. Molony, A. C. Skinner, Orville Larson, Bernard Greenberg, Irving Dichter and Otis Brubaker of the Steelworkers; Pres. Gordon M. Freeman and Russ Williams of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers; Pres. Peter T. Schoemann of the Plumbers; Pres. John H. Lyons and John McKean of the Iron Workers; Pres. Hunter P. Wharton of the Operating Engineers; Pres. H. E. Gilbert and Vice Pres. E. J. Brehaney of the Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen; Pres. P. L. Siemiller, and Bob Lease of the Machinists; Pres. Howard Coughlin, Office & Professional Employes; Sec.-Treas. Emil Mazey and S. E. Monti of the Auto Workers; Sec.-Treas. George Collins, Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers.

Also Bryce P. Holcomb of the Painters, James DeBella of the Mechanics Educational Society, Harold G. Buoy of the Boilermakers, Organizational Dir. Lou Rhodes, Carpenters; Vice Pres. Irwin L. Barney, Railway Carmen; Vice Pres. S. S. Soros, Chemical Workers; Pres. John Frankevich, IUE Local 404; Jack T. Conway and Richard T. Leonard, AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.

Other affiliates involved in the strike include the Laborers, Sheet Metal Workers, Bricklayers, Molders, Blacksmiths, and Railroad Trainmen.

Industry Steps Up Border Jumping To Exploit Low Wages in Mexico

Most runaways go into Mexico under the Mexican government's National Frontier program, set up in 1961 but activated only two years ago, which gives them tariff-free privileges on imports (machinery, raw materials and semi-finished goods) provided they export their finished product.

The product is then shipped back into the U.S. under a tariff code that requires the producer to pay duty only on what is termed "value added," meaning the low-cost Mexican labor.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council, urging Congress to amend the code to eliminate this advantage, warned that it is helping to destroy jobs of U.S. workers with no clear long-run benefits to Mexico's economy.

The program is tailor-made for a company to install only a part of its manufacturing process in Mexico—one that calls for hand work, unskilled or semi-skilled labor. Electronics, apparel, wood and furniture companies have been quick to take advantage.

Vision Letter, a publication widely circulated throughout Latin America, has noted that U.S. food processors also are crossing the border. It lists Heinz, Campbell's, Del Monte and Green Giant as "some major brand names with interests in Mexico."

The newsletter reported that U.S. plants in Mexico so far "represent an investment of about $8 million," with the figure steadily climbing. It cited as an example Transitron Electronic Corp. of Wakefield, Mass., which it said is about to open a new $1.5 million plant in Nuevo Laredo.

Among other U.S. firms known to have set up plants in Mexico are Litton Industries Inc., Fairchild Camera & Instrument Corp., Raytheon Co., Hughes Aircraft Co., Kayser-Roth Corp., Sarkes Tarzian Inc. and A. C. Nielsen Co., the TV-rating and marketing services company.

The Wall Street Journal reported that Nielsen has opened a plant in Nuevo Laredo to sort "cents off" coupons redeemed by large U.S. grocery chains. A Nielsen executive admitted that low wages are the company's reason for going there. The area's minimum wage is 23.50 pesos, or $1.88, a day.

The AFL-CIO Dept. of Research said that in no instance has a runaway firm passed on lower costs to U.S. consumers in the form of lower prices. And they have shown no concern for severe unemployment on the U.S. side of the border.

The New York Times described how Alberti Food Products of Harlingen, Tex. has shifted part of its operation 25 miles south to Matamoros, Mexico. Women handling shrimp in Harlingen earn only about $1.40 an hour, but Alberti pays its women employes in Mexico just $2.08 a day.

A Meat Cutters official in Harlingen, Dagoberti Barrera, stated that the move has brought cutbacks in the Harlingen operations and that other food processors are using the runaway threat against the union in negotiations.

Although most attention has been given to runaways across the border from Texas, a number of firms are moving to locations adjacent to Arizona and California, as well.

The Mexican government's program is aimed at attracting U.S. companies to develop a 12.5-mile-wide border strip extending 1,600 miles from Texas to California, plus the state of Baja California.

Most of the runaway firms attempt to conceal their moves, and the U.S. government is aware only of those that seek its help or get publicity. The AFL-CIO has urged the U.S. to require registration by all of the runaways and has called on affiliates to collect information.

The secretiveness that the runaways engage in was underscored by a Wall Street Journal report that a California concern, Cal-Pacificao of Newport Beach, now negotiates with Mexico for U.S. firms "that would be embarrassed" to have their moves exposed.

California Judge Enjoins Reagan From Using Convicts for Harvest

San Francisco—Superior Court Judge Robert J. Drewes issued a preliminary injunction barring the assignment of convict labor by the state to harvest the crops of private growers.

The judge's action was hailed by State AFL-CIO Executive Sec.-Treas. Thomas L. Pitts as a victory for both the state central labor body, which had brought suit for the injunction, and for California's "grossly underpaid farm workers."

The suit charged Gov. Ronald Reagan (R) with violating the state constitution when he authorized the use of some 300 state prison convicts to harvest figs and grapes in Merced and San Bernardino Counties.

Judge Drewes agreed with the AFL-CIO's contention that Reagan's authorization of the use of convicts to harvest private crops did not follow the rules of the work furlough program.

"It does not resemble a rehabilitation program in any important respect," the judge said.

Noting that the work furlough program is one that allows an inmate to work individually and "to enjoy his freedom during regular hours of work," Judge Drewes pointed out that the state's farm program for convicts "requires that the prisoner work as a member of a gang or crew . . . under guard and isolated" from other employes.

Moreover, the judge said: "The legislature has provided that prisoners may be required to perform labor on public works and ways and in the suppression of forest fires. They may also be required to work on parks and grounds under the control of park commissioners. These activities concern the public interest. Here the state owned neither the crops harvested nor the land upon which the work in question was performed, nor did it pay the workers. The interests of the growers are private, not public, and the work performed, therefore, was not done within the meaning of" the state constitution.

Commenting on the decision, Pitts said that in view of the express language of the constitution and the "blatant irregularities" in the Reagan administration's assignment of convict labor, "I don't see how the judge could have reached any other decision."

He added that, "hopefully . . . the court's decision may help awaken California's taxpayers to the realization that any time the state or federal government abets industry or agriculture in obtaining a cheap labor force—whether they are convicts, welfare recipients or aliens—the effect is to deny jobs at decent wages to thousands of other workers, with the upshot that many of those so disemployed wind up on the welfare rolls."

Although the ruling will have no immediate effect since the grape harvest is already concluded, Pitts said that a permanent injunction will be sought to prevent the use of state prison labor in all fields.

IUD Convention Set for Mar. 12-13

The AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. will hold its seventh convention Mar. 12-13, 1968, at the Statler-Hilton Hotel in Washington, IUD Executive Dir. Jack T. Conway announced.

Originally scheduled for Nov. 15-16, 1967, the convention was postponed because Auto Workers Pres. Walter P. Reuther, also IUD president, was involved in contract negotiations in the auto industry.

The IUD executive board, which approved the change in convention dates, will meet Mar. 11, 1968.

AFL-CIO Gift Buys Medicine For Congolese

Kinshasha, Congo — America's citizens and its labor movement received tributes here in ceremonies marking the acceptance of medical supplies made available by a $1,000 AFL-CIO grant.

The supplies — including drugs, vaccines and antibiotics—were later sent to Bukavu to aid residents who suffered mistreatment from mercenaries. They recently invaded the town and held it for several weeks before being forced out.

The AFL-CIO made the grant through the African-American Labor Center, which seeks to aid African free trade unions, and the medical supplies were distributed through the National Union of Congolese Labor (UNTC).

UNTC Sec. Gen. Andre Boboliko described the gift as an example of the "generosity" of the American people "and their concern" for the establishment of a stable, representative government in the Congo.

On hand for the presentation ceremony were top officials of the Congolese government and U.S. Ambassador Herbert H. McBride.

Copper Strike Support

SINCE MID-JULY, 60,000 members of 22 AFL-CIO unions in the non-ferrous metals industry have been on strike for a fair contract, providing reasonable wages and working conditions.

This is a strike provoked and perpetuated by major employers whose aims have little to do with the terms of the labor contract.

They are seeking to:

- Exhaust surplus copper supplies in order to create an artificial crisis and bring governmental action adverse to the interests of the strikers.
- Create a "seller's market" that will permit substantial copper price increases when production is resumed.
- Destroy the effectiveness of collective bargaining in the industry by refusing to bargain on any terms but their own.
- Starve the strikers into submission on the cynical pretext of "fighting inflation" and "curbing union power."

This employer campaign is having repercussions far beyond the hardships forced upon the workers.

Extreme economic dislocation has been caused in a dozen states where copper and brass production is an important segment of the total economy.

American consumers of copper have been compelled to buy the metal overseas at more than 60 cents a pound.

Industrial research has been accelerated to find substitutes for copper and brass, threatening the future of the industry.

The most obvious evidence that this strike was provoked for ulterior motives is the profit position of the companies. Few if any industries in America can match their record in profits per employe. Yet the industry for years has held to 19th Century bargaining policies and a 19th Century outlook with respect to wages and other worker benefits.

The labor movement will not allow the campaign of these companies to succeed. We will not permit the strikers to be starved out. We are determined to expose the facts and bring this struggle to a swift and successful conclusion.

Therefore the undersigned representatives of the unions involved, with the complete backing of the AFL-CIO, join in the following declaration:

1. We call upon the National Labor Relations Board to speed up action to end the intransigent refusal of these companies to bargain in good faith with our unions.

2. We call upon the Dept. of Justice to launch an immediate investigation of the domestic and international manipulations of these companies that are the root cause of their refusal to bargain.

3. We solicit the generous financial support of other affiliated unions of the AFL-CIO to a fund, established in the headquarters of the AFL-CIO, to insure the continued protection of the 60,000 strikers and their families from suffering. This campaign will be a matter of first priority at the AFL-CIO Executive Council meeting on Dec. 6, 1967.

4. We will give impetus to these objectives and formulate such further steps as may be appropriate at simultaneous rallies on Nov. 29 in these cities: Butte, Mont.; Tucson, Ariz.; Cleveland, O.; Perth Amboy, N. J.; Waterbury, Conn.; El Paso, Tex.; and on Nov. 30, in Salt Lake City, Utah.

We urge all the union members in these areas to join the strikers at these rallies to demonstrate labor's solidarity and support.

The copper strikers need and deserve the wages, hours and conditions for which they are on strike. The labor movement is determined that they shall have the victory they so rightly deserve.

—Statement signed by unions representing copper workers in the fifth month of a strike in the non-ferrous metals industry.

Cites Dictatorial Controls:

Meany Assails New Contacts With Soviet State-Run 'Unions'

The following is excerpted from an address by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany to the Jewish Labor Committee in New York.

WITHIN THE LAST FEW MONTHS, our West European trade union friends, who call themselves democratic socialists and who are associated with us in the international trade union movement, have succumbed to a tremendous propaganda campaign, and they've now adopted a policy of what they call rapprochement with the so-called unions of the Soviet bloc.

These people consider themselves Social Democrats and trade unionists—but they've gone to Moscow to celebrate the 50th anniversary of the death of social democracy and the free trade union movement in Russia.

Our position is that we don't want any contacts with these state-controlled "unions," or any other so-called unions that are not controlled by the workers.

Let's look at this thing they call the All-Union Central Council of Soviet Trade Unions. Like all so-called unions in dictatorial countries, it is an instrument of the state. It's exactly the same in its makeup as was the German Labor Front set up by Hitler after he destroyed the free trade unions of Germany. They exercise rigid control over every phase of workers' lives, for the sole purpose of increasing production for the state.

The official duties listed by the so-called Soviet trade unions state that they are charged with insuring application of centrally fixed work norms and in carrying out industrial regulations. That's their job.

What does this mean? It means to speed up production, but the so-called union has nothing to do with setting the work norm; that's done for them by the CPSU—the Communist Party of the Soviet Union.

Then there is the State Planning Commission controlled by the Communist Party, which controls the national wage fund. So the unions have no problems about setting wages—that, too, is done for them by the Communist Party. But they do supervise the application of the wage arrangements that already have been made for them. Then they are assigned the task of administering certain public social services, and allocating the distribution of certain social benefits. This, of course, gives the government a very powerful weapon for securing what they call "workers' cooperation."

Elections, too, are very much simplified for the workers in the Soviet Union. Here's a report from a woman who worked in one of the plants: "When we finished our shift, guards were posted at the exits to prevent the workers from going home. The name of the candidates to the committee presidium were hasitly read to us. Then followed the formality of the election. Two men, one after another, read from a prepared list the names of candidates to the committee. There was no discussion of the candidates, and each worker on his way out received a previously printed bulletin announcing the results of the election." (Sovetskaya Rossiya, Apr. 18, 1965.)

ON THE QUESTION of leadership, too, matters are very simple. Just a short time ago, the so-called unions got a new leader. He is a man by the name of Alexander Shelepin. He was appointed to the post by the political committee of the Soviet Communist Party; his name was presented to the "Soviet Council of Trade Unions," and he thus became their leader! They didn't have to worry about finding a leader—the leader was given to them by the party.

His qualifications? He was political officer in the Red Army during the war against Finland in 1939-40. His most recent job, from which he moved over to the trade union post, was the head of the KGB, the Soviet secret police. And it was only about 2.5 years ago that he led a delegation of 12 top military and espionage officers to Cairo, to prepare Nasser for the big aggressive military mobilization by the Arab rulers against Israel. And you know how the Israelis answered all that.

After 50 years of Soviet rule—and they've had some improvements in that time—the official allotment for housing in urban areas is limited to 70 square feet per person, which means that a man and wife and two children must confine their living space to a 20 by 15 room; or if they are a childless couple, there are two couples in that same sized room.

As to the purchasing power of the people there today: they spend 60 percent of their wages for food, compared with 30 to 35 percent in the West.

What about the program and principles of this so-called trade union movement? This, too, is very simple: they don't have any principles, they don't have any program. The CPSU takes care of all that, too. It lays down the orders and the program, and the "union" carries them out.

Nation's Destiny at Stake:

Negro, Liberal, Labor Alliance Seen Crucial to 1968 Election

The following is excerpted from "The Liberal Coalition and the 1968 Elections" by Bayard Rustin which appears in the November 1967 issue of the AFL-CIO American Federationist.

THE ELECTIONS OF 1968 may prove to be as crucial for the national destiny as the elections of 1860, 1876 and 1932. For the Negro, 1968 threatens the repetition of the fateful election of 1876 and the infamous Compromise of the following year—when the federal government removed its remaining troops from the South and the nation turned its back on the Negro.

The parallels are disconcerting. As in 1876, there is today among many whites a weariness and disillusionment with the cause of the Negro. As in 1876, when the conservatives exploited alleged excesses of Negro politicians in the Reconstruction governments, so today the riots are used to deny the Negro an equal place in American society.

I do not mean that a victory of the rightwing in 1968 would lead to the reimposition of legal segregation and discrimination, or the disfranchisement of Negro voters. But it can bring the kind of social and economic stagnation in which the existing problems will fester and multiply. After all, although the Eisenhower Administration did not consciously legislate the slums into existence, the priorities and policies it followed encouraged the spread of, and further deterioration in, the slums of the nation.

The nation simply cannot afford—and the Negro and labor least of all—a return to conservative rule, even in its cleaned-up, well-dressed, broad-grinned Madison Avenue varieties. We cannot afford four years of substituting cliches about the genius of private enterprise for intelligent and vigorous public policy. We cannot afford four years of rhetoric about states' rights—North and South—in place of massive federal action.

This prospect can—and must—be averted. Just as we possess enormous technological resources for social progress, so do we possess potentially overwhelming political resources for advancement. We have a powerful labor movement, the largest organized social force in the country. It has acquired increasing experience and sophistication in political and economic action in the past generation. It is on the verge of even greater growth, particularly in the South.

We have in the 10 percent of the population represented by the Negro people another consistent force for social reform. In the urban centers, the Negro vote has proven decisive in important contests. And in the South, where Negro voting is on the rise and dramatic political shifts have taken place, the power of the Dixiecrats can now be undermined at its source.

We have seen a resurgence of liberalism in the middle classes among professional, technical and academic people. Many religious groups have displayed an awareness of social problems and the need for solving them such as we have not seen in a very long time.

But as powerful as the liberal forces can be, a number of factors have contributed to delaying or weakening the union among them that is indispensable for a sure—and even easy—victory for all of us.

The first factor is the Viet Nam war. The tragedy here is not that there are disagreements over the purposes and conduct of the war, for such disagreements are inevitable in so complex a war. It is, rather, that the disagreements threaten to weaken the liberal coalition in its struggle for domestic progress. Thus, instead of resisting conservative efforts to use the war as an excuse for cutting back the war on poverty, many liberals are fighting among themselves and with the labor movement.

THE SECOND FACTOR WEAKENING our coalition grows out of the riots, the disunity within the civil rights movement and the white backlash.

The divisions within the civil rights movement are irreconcilable. They cannot, should not and must not be glossed over, patched up or concealed in the interest of preserving the facade of unity. Some important disagreements existed all along, but they did not challenge the fundamental principles on which the movement was based—democracy, integration, opposition to racism in all its form. These principles are today rejected and their advocates reviled by a fresh crop of adventurist demagogues and apostles of violence who claim to speak for the black masses but consistently demonstrate their inability to attract or organize mass support. For such support they substitute intimidation, sensationalism and authoritarian political styles. And, in making this substitution, they have the full cooperation of the mass media.

Throughout the Negro's struggle, the labor and liberal forces have been obvious and natural allies: the enemies of one have traditionally been the enemies of the other. Now that the Negro's struggle for legal and constitutional rights has largely been won, and his attention has turned toward social and economic equality, his alliance with the labor movement becomes more crucial. For while he finds that many groups in society are prepared to support his constitutional right, the labor and liberal movements are preeminent among those who believe that he has a right to a job, good pay, a decent home, quality education and the other good things in life.

And so the nation moves toward 1968, a year of historic importance, in a mood of confusion, unrest and uncertainty. Exploiting Viet Nam and the Negro's agony, the rightwing prepares to launch a comeback. If successful, it will profoundly alter the direction of American politics and most grievously set back the Negro. What it has neither talent nor power to do is to resolve the fundamental problems in American society. It can only prolong and exacerbate them; it can only twist the country out of shape.

Civil Action Unit Set Up:

Education In Democratic Way Major Task Facing Viet Labor

LEADERS OF THE South Vietnamese labor movement are fully supporting the newly-elected Saigon government but fear that unless the people are brought to a better understanding of democracy the next election will go Communist, a top American trade unionist reported on a network radio interview.

Pres. James A. Suffridge of the Retail Clerks, a member of the delegation which accompanied Vice Pres. Humphrey to the Saigon inauguration, said the trip made him "more keenly aware" of the stakes in Viet Nam and of the country's needs.

Appearing on Labor News Conference on the Mutual Radio Network, Suffridge said that his several meetings with Tran Quoc Buu, president of the Confederation of Vietnamese Trade Unions, convinced him "that this war can't be just filed away and forgotten." While the South Vietnamese feel they have made "great progress," he found, there is general agreement that education and participation in the democratic process is of more immediate importance than economic gains.

"In other words, to practice the art of sublimation," he explained, "so that the people will choose their government and occupy themselves with the operations of their government and their unions, and therefore, not be such easy prey to communism."

Suffridge said the CVT has set up a Dept. for Civil Action to aid that effort, and recognize it as "the biggest job they have in the next year or two, far beyond that of organizing the unorganized and negotiating contracts."

HE SAID that the strong backing Pres. Johnson has from the labor movement in this country stems from "an understanding that this Administration has done more for the working people—organized and unorganized alike—than any other Administration we have ever known." And, he added, that support applies to foreign as well as domestic policies.

Reporters questioning Suffridge on the public affairs program, broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EST, were William Eaton of the Chicago Daily News and Alexander Uhl, editor of Press Associates, Inc.

WHAT WITH THE RIOTS last summer, disputes over foreign policy, predictions about inflation, the unrest among college students, there are moments when the average American must wonder if the whole country isn't going to the dogs at a monumental rate. But, is it really?

Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz is one who doesn't think so. In fact he took strong exception to the doom and gloom boys in a recent speech before the Eleventh Annual Honor Awards Ceremony of the U.S. Information Agency.

At a time when pessimism about almost everything fills the newspapers, Wirtz made a number of valid points in his "oh-come-now-things-aren't-half-as-bad-as-they-seem" address.

He spoke mostly about developments in the job and economic fields as they have taken place since the beginning of the Kennedy-Johnson Administration in 1961—a year when the country was not exactly flourishing.

● There are 9 million more jobs today than there were 80 months ago—this means more than 5,000 "more people going to work every working day than went to work the day before."

● A reduction in the seasonally adjusted national unemployment rate from almost 7 percent to about 4 percent.

● A reduction in the number of long-term unemployed. In 1961 there were 750,000 workers who had been jobless for 27 weeks or more. Now the number is down to 155,000.

● Ninety-eight out of every 100 married men, heads of families, are employed today. For the two who still have trouble finding a job, there were five in 1961.

● Average cash weekly earnings of manufacturing workers have increased from $89 to $117 and while prices have gone up cutting into buying power, "real" earnings are up 17 percent as compared with 1961. Purchasing power of all Americans is up 28 percent, almost three times as large as it was in the previous 80-month period.

● Minimum wages have gone up from $1 an hour to $1.40 and will go to $1.60 next February. More than 10 million additional workers have been brought under coverage.

WIRTZ COULD, of course, have gone on with the multitude of other accomplishments of the past six years, but he stuck pretty closely to his own bailiwick. He might have mentioned, for example, passage of medicare and medicaid which have revolutionized the medical care for the aged; improvements in social security which also are greatly helping this same group; the start on consumer protection with passage of the truth in packaging bill; the war on poverty which, whatever its shortcomings, has dramatized American concern for the poverty-stricken; a considerable tax reduction which even the proposed 10 percent surtax won't wipe out.

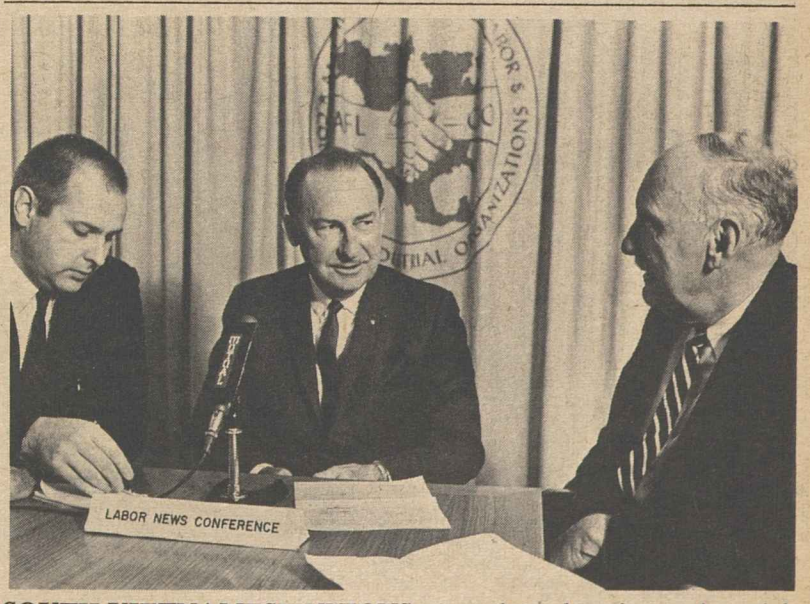
Wirtz admitted that his concept of what has gone on during the past six years might be considered too "glorified." He conceded that it left out riots and slums and draft card burnings and drugs and the "other 5 percent facts that get 95 percent of the publicity." Nevertheless, he contended that the goals ahead were more than worth fighting and struggling for.

It may well be said that the past year has been pretty much of a political bust as compared with what took place during the 89th Congress and even before it. And the chances are strong that next year will be no bargain in achievements as compared with the 89th.

But next year, too, carries with it a cure for its own problems—the 1968 elections which will give the American people a chance to determine whether they want to pick up once again the record of the 89th Congress and really put it into effect.

Wirtz called his speech: "Will the Real America Please Stand Up."

It will have that chance to stand up when it goes to the polls a year from now.



SOUTH VIETNAMESE UNIONS agree that education and participation in democratic processes has more immediate importance than economic gains, AFL-CIO Vice Pres. James A. Suffridge (center) said on Labor News Conference. Reporters William Eaton of the Chicago Daily News (left) and Alexander Uhl of Press Associates, Inc., questioned him on the public affairs radio program aired Tuesdays on the Mutual Network.

Rollcall on Cutting Poverty Program

Before passing the anti-poverty bill, the House on Nov. 15 voted 221-190 to cut $460 million from the budget for the program. As the AFL-CIO sees it, every congressman voting for the budget slash "was voting against an effective program to eradicate poverty."

Wrong votes (W) for the cut were cast by 148 Republicans and 73 Democrats. Right votes (R) against the cut were cast by 162 Democrats and 28 Republicans. Other symbols: PR—paired right; PW—paired wrong; A—absent and not paired. Numerals show districts; AL—at large.

Worker Delegates Win:

ILO to Consider Wage Floor Issue

Geneva—Worker delegates won a major victory when the Intl. Labor Organization's Governing Body voted to place the questions of paid vacations and minimum wage-fixing machinery before the 1969 ILO conference.

Meeting at the UN specialized agency's headquarters here, the executive committee formed by worker, employer and government representatives voted 23-21, with two abstentions, to include the two points on the 1969 agenda.

The employers attempted to sidetrack the worker-proposed items, arguing that preparatory work on them would overload the ILO staff.

But a strong appeal by Jean Moeri, veteran Swiss leader of the workers' group, swung enough government delegates to carry the issue.

Other technical items to be examined by the 1969 conference when it meets in Geneva are labor inspection in agriculture, sickness insurance, youth employment and training programs geared to meeting the needs of the developing countries.

Strong endorsement of a report on automation and advanced technological change was voiced by U.S. Worker Delegate Rudolph Faupl on behalf of the worker group.

Faupl, Machinists' international representative, praised the report for containing a "coordinated set of proposals for meeting the manpower, human and social problems arising out of automation and technology."

But the American worker recalled that some reservations on the report had been expressed by Al Hayes, retired IAM president, who was one of the experts called on by the ILO to prepare it.

Hayes, Faupl said, felt that the report failed in its recommendations "to underscore sufficiently the urgency of measures which must be taken" to eliminate unemployment caused by automation.

"We either share jointly the fruits of automation and jointly also its adversities, or else workers will be left to carry the burden alone," Faupl commented. "We are not prepared to accept this as a just policy in society today," he cautioned.

On the proposal of its committee on discrimination, the executive group also called for intensification of ILO efforts to promote equality of treatment and opportunity in employment irrespective of race, sex, religious convictions or related questions.

During the Governing Body sessions, a three-story annex to the ILO headquarters was formally inaugurated to replace one gutted by fire exactly a year ago. The event was hailed by worker, government and employer spokesmen as testifying to the ILO's ability to overcome adversity rapidly.

NABET Unit Set to Vote On ABC Pact

New York—The Broadcast Employes reached agreement with the American Broadcasting Co. on a new four-year contract and submitted it to membership referendum with a recommendation by union negotiators for acceptance.

Some 1,500 union members, on strike since Sept. 22, will return to their posts at 12:01 a.m. Nov. 25 if a majority votes to ratify. Union engineers and 20 other groups of workers started their walkout after rejecting as insufficient a company proposal covering employes of five ABC stations in Chicago, Los Angeles, New York, San Francisco and Washington, D.C.

The second tentative settlement, reached with the aid of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service, provides a first half-year wage increase of $14 for Group 2 engineers—the largest group of covered employes—and a wage scale ranging from $232 as of last Apr. 1 to $275 on Oct. 1, 1970, after successive wage hikes every six months.

Wage improvements for some 200 non-technicians will be applied on a percentage basis equivalent to the wage schedules of the engineers. They include film editors, writers, record librarians, traffic employes, telephone operators, makeup artists and other workers.

Other gains call for "locked in" schedules posted 24 hours in advance now, 48 hours in advance in 1970; Memorial Day as a new holiday in 1970 for a new total of eight; working hours reduced from 40 to 37.5 on Apr. 1, 1969, and to 36.25 a year later; and guaranteed sick leave in the third contract year.

A major union objective was guaranteed lunch time. ABC management agreed to let employes set their own lunch period—the outgrowth of a dispute at the last Bing Crosby golf tournament at Pebble Beach, Calif., where ABC members had to stage a walkout during an equipment breakdown to get their lunch, according to NABET.

During the strike, the union said, no NABET member dropped out or crossed the picket line.

The workshop has produced "From the Ashes," an anthology of poems, plays and prose by ghetto writers. Left to right, James T. Jackson, a workshop member; CLPA Sec.-Treas. Open Housing Termed Labor Goal In Congress, Legislatures and Cities

Milwaukee, Wis.—Federal legislation that will halt discrimination in the sale and rental of housing "everywhere in America" is a key element in the AFL-CIO program, Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller declared here.

But, until that goal is achieved, Biemiller emphasized, "we are for open housing anywhere we can get it and by whatever means we can get it—by state law or by local ordinance."

He spoke at an Equal Opportunity Day Luncheon, sponsored by the Milwaukee Urban League and attended by representatives of labor, management, education, religion and civic groups.

The Milwaukee luncheon had its counterparts in observances across the nation of Equal Opportunity Day, sponsored annually by the Urban League to mark the anniversary of Pres. Lincoln's Gettysburg Address, Nov. 19, 1861.

Biemiller noted that he still thinks of Milwaukee "as home." He once represented a district in Congress that includes a part of the city. Milwaukee recently has been the center of efforts to enact an open housing law.

Biemiller said he was speaking on the open housing issue "not only because it is so important, but because the position of the AFL-CIO often has been misunderstood and misrepresented."

He quoted from the housing resolution adopted by the 1965 AFL-CIO convention which stated that equal housing opportunity is "a key feature of labor's housing program."

The resolution also declared that "equal access, without regard to race, creed, color or national origin, to every residential neighborhood . . . should be assured to every family in America."

Biemiller also described labor's efforts to secure equal opportunity for all citizens in other areas, particularly in guaranteeing the right to vote and attaining fair employment practices.

He said it is labor's "profound conviction that equal employment, in the fullest sense of the words, is an absolute prerequisite to the achievement of fully equal rights and opportunities in every other phase of American life."

This is a position that the AFL-CIO has restated "time after time and year after year," he added.

In another area, Biemiller pointed to AFL-CIO's efforts, in cooperation with the government and civil rights groups, to make apprenticeship programs available to Negroes and members of other minority groups.

There are "positive programs" in nearly all major cities to recruit Negro apprentices for skilled trades, he said, adding: "This is not just a matter of opening doors, it is a community effort to find applicants who will come through these doors."

At the same time, Biemiller stressed that Negroes cannot be placed in apprentice programs unless they make themselves available for this training and are willing to devote themselves to "hard learning" so they may gain necessary skills.

Improve Schools, Spur Integration, U.S. Education Commissioner Asks

Schools in large cities, particularly those in slums, must be improved in quality and desegregated simultaneously, U.S. Education Commissioner Harold Howe II told a national conference in Washington.

By contrast, Kenneth B. Clark, a Negro psychologist, recommended in a paper submitted to the three-day meeting that the emphasis be placed on improving the quality of segregated schools.

The conference, on race and education in the cities, was sponsored by the U.S. Civil Rights Commission and attended by 500 representatives of school boards, civic groups, teachers, civil rights organizations, labor and management.

Included were delegates favoring giving integration top priority, those putting "compensatory programs" to improve slum schools first and those for pushing equally in both areas.

With such diverse attendance, the conference did not attempt to enact resolutions. However, it received numerous papers from urban specialists, educators and sociologists; held panel discussions and heard spirited floor debate.

AFL-CIO Education Dir. Walter Davis served as co-chairman of a panel that discussed procedures and aims in setting up regional programs for school desegregation and equal educational opportunity.

He enumerated positive results achieved in school desegregation since the 1954 U.S. Supreme Court decision but added, "The fact that it is necessary to hold this conference proves the pace of integration has been too slow."

David Selden, assistant to the president of the American Federation of Teachers and Pres. Albert Shanker of Teachers Local 2, New York, were among those serving on panels.

Selden took part in a discussion of the teacher's role in an educational system and in improving educational equality. Shanker was on a panel that probed the school administrator's role in striving for the same objective.

Two recent government reports —"Equality of Educational Opportunity" published by the Health, Education & Welfare Dept. and "Racial Isolation in the Public Schools" issued by the Civil Rights Commission—were a basis for the conference in that both dealt extensively with race-school problems.

Howe told the delegates, "I do not think that we have two alternatives. We must pursue both compensatory education and desegregated schools at the same time."

He cited four cities with double-barrelled programs — Pittsburgh, White Plains, N. Y., Evanston, Ill. and Berkeley, Calif. Each program is being helped by federal funds without being forced by any federal requirements, he pointed out.

Howe called upon local school boards and state education departments to provide desegregation leadership. He said the U.S. Education Office now has a division of equal educational opportunities, with 70 staff members, to help them.

While advocating "first emphasis" on quality education in slum areas, Clark said this effort "should be coordinated with a strategy and program for massive and realistic desegregation of entire school systems."

He also warned that anyone makes a mistake "to espouse either of these courses to the exclusion of the other."

Another conference speaker, Bayard Rustin, executive director of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, told a luncheon session, "We've got to stop the debate between quality education and integration." He stressed everyone should be for both.

He called for a coalition between minority groups, unions, students and educators to concentrate on getting badly-needed funds from Congress to improve schools in ghetto areas.

Valentine Reuther Dies at Age 86

Wheeling, W.Va. — Valentine Reuther, veteran trade union leader, died here at 86 after hospiltalization. He was the father of Auto Workers' Pres. Walter P. Reuther. Two other sons, Victor and Roy, also are UAW officials. Other survivors include his wife, Anna; a son, Theodore, and a daughter, Mrs. Christine Richey.

Born in Germany, the elder Reuther came here as a youth and, after working in steel mills and coal mines, got a job in a Wheeling brewery and became active in the Brewery Workers. At 23 he was elected president of the Ohio Valley Trades & Labor Assembly of the former AFL.

When his sons were ready to work, Reuther advised them to "get in the labor movement" and help "build a better tomorrow for your fellow man," the UAW recalled in a message of sympathy.

Senate Passes 15% Social Security Hike

Meany Hails Gains As 'Down Payment'

"We urge the conference committee to move speedily to an agreement that will give America's social security beneficiaries the protection they need and the entire American social welfare structure the strong base that our nation should have.

"While the AFL-CIO applauds the Senate action," Meany stressed, "we must insist that it is only a down payment on the kind of social security protection America should have. We will not cease fighting for improvement until we have reached that goal."

The House bill provided a 12.5 percent general increase and only a token improvement in minimum benefits. It also set a ceiling on the federal program of aid to dependent children and required mothers of small children to take jobs or job training or lose all welfare payments.

A House-Senate conference committee will have the assignment of reconciling the major differences between the two bills and both the House and the Senate will have to approve the final version before it becomes law.

Raises Wage Base

The Senate bill would pay for the social security improvements by raising the wage base on which employers and workers pay social security taxes. It would mean higher payments from higher-paid workers, but it would also mean that on retirement their social security benefits would be considerably higher than under present law.

Starting in 1968, the Senate bill would tax up to $8,000 of a worker's wage, as compared with $6,600 under present law and $7,600 in the House bill. While the House proposes to keep the wage base at $7,600, the Senate provides a two-step increase to $10,800 by 1972.

The Senate voted to allow persons over 65 to earn up to $2,400 a year without loss of social security benefits. This compares with $1,500 under present law and $1,680, effective in 1969, in the House bill. It also voted to let men have the privilege now limited to women of retiring at age 60 with a reduced benefit.

It eased the welfare restrictions by exempting from the compulsory work provisions mothers of pre-school children and specifying that mothers of children in school could only be required to take training or jobs during school hours.

The Senate also voted to require all 50 states and the District of Columbia to provide welfare assistance for dependent children, even when there is an unemployed father in the home. Twenty-three states and Washington, D.C., now prohibit aid to children when there is a "man in the house" and this rule has been blamed for encouraging desertions of families so that children can obtain welfare.

The fiercest Senate battle came over an amendment by Sen. Russell B. Long (D-La.) to encourage prescription of drugs by less costly generic rather than brand names under the medicaid program.

Medicaid is the joint federal-state program which provides a broad range of medical services for low-income persons of all ages.

Long's amendment, bitterly fought by lobbyists for the drug industry, would instruct the goverment to test and grade all drugs and determine whether a lower-priced drug is as safe and effective as a higher-priced brand-name product.

If it is, government payments for drugs prescribed under the medicaid program would be limited to the price of the generic product. The list of drugs would be issued in 1970.

The proposal carried, 43-37, but faces a battle in the House-Senate conference.

Although the social security bill covers a number of welfare and medical assistance programs, only direct social security benefits are financed from the trust fund in which social security payroll taxes are deposited. The welfare programs are financed by general appropriations from the treasury.

In other developments, Pres. Johnson's proposed boost in the federal income tax—considered dead not long ago because of apparent firm opposition in the House Ways & Means Committee—moved back into the news following the devaluation of the British pound.

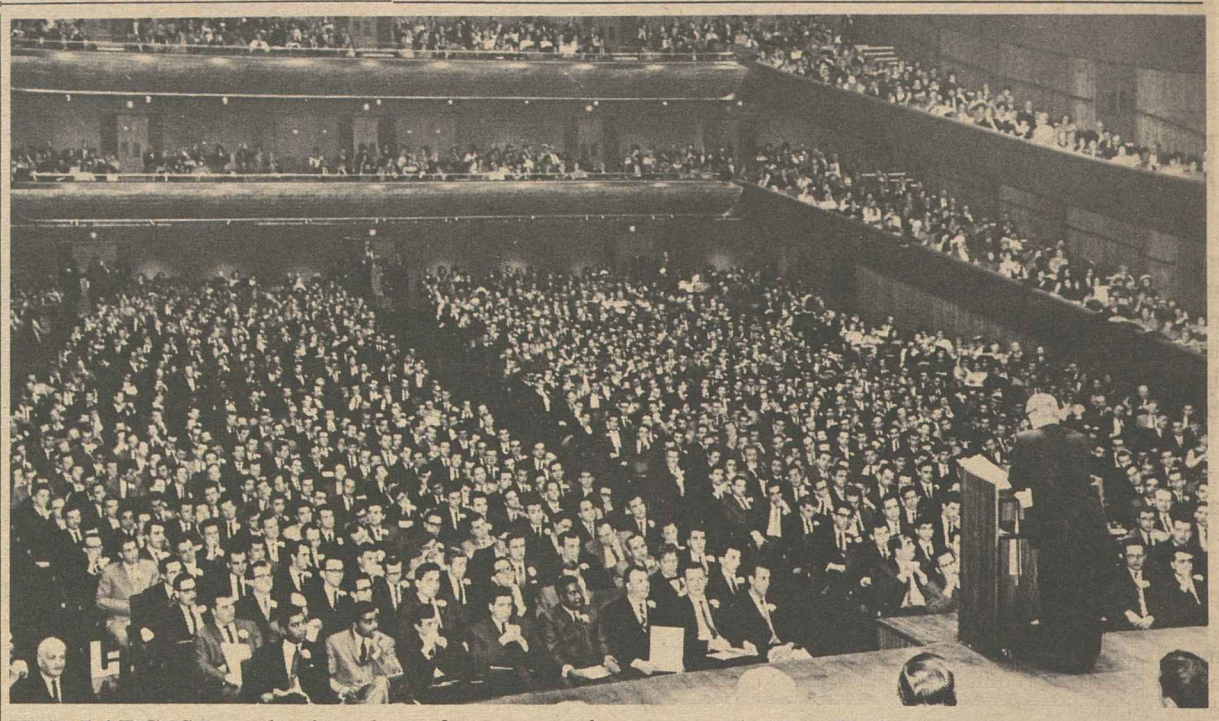
Ways & Means Committee Chairman Wilbur D. Mills summoned the committee into session Nov. 29 to hear top Administration officials argue the case for higher taxes and disclose plans for spending cuts.

Mills, along with most Republicans, had said earlier that government spending would have to be cut sharply before the House would consider a tax increase. He told newsmen that Treasury Sec. Henry H. Fowler had told him the Administration has a new proposal on spending cuts to present to the committee.

In a rare departure from its budget-cutting mood of recent months, the House voted down, 203-141, a motion to cut the authorization for the Peace Corps from $116 million to last year's ceiling of $105 million. The bill was then sent to the White House.

The House also approved a $589 million public health bill which includes $40 million for a rat control program over the next two years. A conference report clearing the bill for the White House, was adopted 347-3, without a trace of the heavy-handed mockery heard earlier this year when the House refused to even take up a rat control bill.

The economy bloc was in full control, however, when the House disregarded Pres. Johnson's warning that it was making a "serious mistake" and voted to trim foreign aid spending to $2.2 billion—the lowest figure in 20 years.



THE LARGEST graduating class of an apprentice program in New York State since formal apprentice training was established there in 1937 hears an address by Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., president of the New York City AFL-CIO and business manager of Local 3 of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers. The apprentices, 694 in all, are graduates of the program of the Joint Industry Board of the Electrical Industry of New York City.

First Grants Announced for Model Cities

Sixty-three cities have been chosen for the first federal grants under the model cities program and will draw up blueprints for rehabilitation of entire neighborhoods through an arsenal of federally-assisted programs.

One hundred and thirty other cities had their applications for planning grants rejected—largely because the $300 million Congress appropriated for the program was less than half the amount Pres. Johnson had requested.

They may have another chance next year, if the money is available.

The neighborhoods selected by the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development for the first round of the program are in cities ranging in population from Pikeville, Ky., with 5,000 people, to New York with its 8 million.

HUD Sec. Robert C. Weaver said these neighborhoods "have an incredible diversity and complexity of problems."

He said nearly a third of the families in the neighborhoods selected have incomes under $3,000 a year. "A fourth live in substandard housing, and many more are overcrowded in deteriorating buildings. Unemployment is double the national level."

694 in Largest Class Of IBEW Apprentices

New York—Labor and management in this city's electrical industry pioneered in recruiting new workers regardless of race, creed or color, State Industrial Commissioner Martin P. Catherwood told the largest class of electrical union apprentices in history at the 28th annual graduation here.

"Long before" the present nondiscrimination laws were enacted, the Joint Apprenticeship Committee representing Local 3 of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and 618 contractors agreed in 1962 that "apprentices shall be hired without any direct or indirect limitations, specifications or discriminations," Catherwood told the graduating class of 694 journeymen and the 295 fifth year apprentices.

"Your class, the class of 1967, is the end result," he said. "You are a credit to the late Dean Harry Carmen of Columbia University," who supervised the selection process, "as well as to Local 3 and all employers."

Other speakers who joined in congratulating the graduates included IBEW Sec. Joseph D. Keenan; Pres. Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., of the New York City AFL-CIO, business manager of IBEW Local 3; and AFL-CIO Civil Rights Dir. Donald Slaiman.

Keenan said the program demonstrated that recruitment problems can be settled through the cooperation of management and the IBEW, and that through training, apprentices can learn new skills and benefit themselves, their union, employer and the nation.

Van Arsdale stressed the responsibility of the graduates in establishing and maintaining good standards of workmanship and urged them to become active members of the union.

Local 3 Pres. Edward J. Cleary presented Joint Industry Board awards at the exercises in Philharmonic Hall of the Lincoln Center for the Performing Arts. Winners were Gerald Freel, Joseph Loturco and William Davis of the graduating class, Warren Coughlin, Clifford Edwards, Jr., and Joseph V. Baker of the new senior class. Freel was valedictorian.

The five-year program for apprentices provides on-the-job training and related trade instruction by the vocational high school division of the city Board of Education.

The union-management board was formed as an employment bureau in 1939 and developed into its present form in 1941, when a broad pension program was launched. Since then the board has developed a $20 million housing development at Southampton, Long Island; a health and welfare program and a college scholarship fund for the children of members.

LBJ Prods Congress To Pass Consumer Bills

House signing ceremony to call also for early congressional passage of the gas pipeline safety bill, a ban on flammable fabrics, a crackdown on land sale frauds and new social security benefits.

"It doesn't make any difference how powerful the meat lobby is," the President declared. "Nobody in this country ought ever to take a chance on eating filthy meat from filthy packing houses."

Consumers need the truth-in-lending bill more than ever, Johnson said, because interest rates are soaring as a result of the devaluation of the British pound.

On the bill to set federal standards for gas pipelines—passed by the Senate but not by the House—Johnson said: "We don't want gas-filled pipes bursting in our homes and our streets, causing a major tragedy, before we wake up."

He called for land legislation "to crack down on the con man, the gyp who preys on the aged. . . . Some of our parents save up all of their lives to buy a little home for retirement. Then some swindler comes along. . . . They wind up in a useless swamp."

Johnson urged that after Senate passage of the social security bill the House-Senate conferees start meeting promptly and let no holidays interfere with their work. "Millions of old people are sitting around waiting and wondering what's going to happen," he said.

Of the National Commission on Product Safety set up in the legislation he signed, the President stressed that he wanted it to come up with "solid solutions," not just studies. He said it would pinpoint products that are dangerous and recommend new steps needed to protect children and families from unsafe products.

NAACP Hits Oklahoma 'R-T-W' Drive

Enid, Okla. — Delegates to the Oklahoma state convention of the NAACP voted unanimously to oppose a "right-to-work" campaign aimed at placing on the ballot a proposal to outlaw the union shop.

Sponsors of the "right-to-work" petitions had mounted a major campaign to woo Negro voters and split the alliance which defeated a union shop ban in a 1964 statewide referendum.

The 300 NAACP delegates gave their answer in a resolution which termed the attack on the union shop an "economy-wrecking" proposal.

Speakers at the state NAACP conference included two national AFL-CIO staff officials, Earl Davis of COPE and Robert McGlotten of the federation's Dept. of Civil Rights.

Davis stressed that labor and the NAACP had "fought side by side" for civil rights legislation while the leading sponsors of "right-to-work" were battling against it.

Senate Passes Government Pay Raise

2 Million Assured of Increases

Two million federal civilian employes and 3.4 million servicemen were assured of retroactive pay raises as the Senate passed a legislative package differing only in fringe areas from action taken by the House.

Pay raises for civilian employes were combined with higher postage rates in a bill which the Senate approved, 85-2.

Both the Senate and House bills provide:

- Pay raises of 6 percent for more than 700,000 postal workers and 4.5 percent for 1.2 million other salaried federal employes, all retroactive to Oct. 1, 1967.
- An additional 5 percent raise for postal workers next July 1. On the same date, classified employes would receive increases sufficient to close half the "comparability gap" between their pay and private industry rates—with a guarantee of at least a 3 percent increase. The average raise would be considerably higher.
- On July 1, 1969, in the Senate bill—moved back from the April 1 date in the House bill—the balance of the comparability gap would be closed with a third round of increases. The comparability determinations would be based on Bureau of Labor Statistics surveys.

The government's hourly-paid blue collar workers are not affected by the salary legislation since their wages are based on prevailing rates in the areas where they work. However they would share with classified and postal employes in improved life insurance benefits which the Senate added to the House bill.

The Senate also knocked out a punitive House provision which denied any salary increases to employes of the anti-poverty agency, the Office of Economic Opportunity.

Most of the two-day Senate debate was devoted to the postage rate increases in the bill, designed to bring postal revenue closer to the cost of postal services. One of the few changes made on the Senate floor was a reduction in the sharp 60 percent increase for non-profit publications, including labor papers, to 20 percent over three years.

Immediately after acting on the civilian pay raise, the Senate approved without debate a raise for

Meany Strongly Opposes Blanket Slashes in Budget

Pure Meat Bill Voted By Senate

America's consumers won an 89-2 victory in the Senate with passage of a meat inspection bill designed to halt the sale of spoiled, diseased and adulterated meat and meat products.

The one-sided Senate vote put strong pressure on the House to back down from its previous rejection of federal inspection standards for the 9 billion pounds of meat sold each year without crossing state lines.

The House refused, however, to accept the stronger Senate bill intact. It defeated, 207-166, a motion to instruct its conferees to agree to all the changes made by the Senate.

Despite this setback, the final version of the legislation is considered certain to be much stronger than the original House-passed bill, which the AFL-CIO had branded "a hoax on the American cousumer."

Both the House and Senate bills offer matching federal funds to states that set up meat inspection programs meeting federal standards. But there the similarity ends.

The Senate bill extends federal meat inspection to any state which doesn't set up and properly enforce an effective inspection program within two years.

It allows the federal government

CWA's ANNUAL "HI-MOM" program gets underway as the holiday season approaches. Fair Tax Hike Urged For Needs

The AFL-CIO is "firmly opposed" to a "meat-ax" slash in funds for federal programs, Federation Pres. George Meany declared.

Meany said the nation's wars against aggression abroad and poverty at home can be financed through a "fair and equitable" tax increase, based on ability to pay and equality of sacrifice.

The answer to the nation's fiscal problems, he stressed, is not an across-the-board cutback in "the already meager funds" for such necessary programs as education, welfare and hospital-building.

Meany's statement was issued as the House Ways & Means Committee met to consider the Administration's latest tax increase proposal—tied this time to a pledge of federal spending cuts demanded by Committee Chairman Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.).

Treasury Sec. Henry H. Fowler promised the committee that the Administration will cut federal payrolls 2 percent and will reduce other "controllable" federal spending by 10 percent.

This, he said, will result in a $2.6 billion reduction—on top of $1.5 billion which Congress has already hacked from the President's budget. It would add up to a $4.1 billion spending slash for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1968.

He said the tax surcharge sought by the Administration would bring in $7.4 billion in new revenue. The draft bill Fowler submitted to the committee would give the spending

Haggerty Sees Training Role:

Building Crafts Spur Model Cities Effort

Bal Harbour, Fla.—America's 3.5 million building tradesmen will give their "full cooperation, know-how, resources and manpower" to the task that offers the greatest opportunity of their careers—the job of rebuilding American cities under new federal housing programs, Pres. C. J. Haggerty of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. pledged here.

"This will be a vast program unprecedented in the history of the world," Haggerty told delegates at the opening session of the department's 54th convention. "This is not a job for amateurs. The rebuilding of America will require the best talent the B&CTD and its 18 unions can mobilize," he declared.

Haggerty noted that employment of disadvantaged persons and training of youth from each affected area are "both major considerations" in the demonstration cities program. He advised local unions to "consider accepting into membership" area residents who are qualified as journeymen craftsmen, and who want to work in that capacity. He urged, too, that locals "institute learner or trainee programs for those area youths who show an interest and an aptitude."

As practical men, Haggerty said, building tradesmen have "long warned that the innumerable and complex problems facing our cities would, if unattended, explode into an urban crisis. This now has happened."

To help solve the urban crisis, "we enthusiastically supported the legislation" which helped create the new federal Dept. of Housing & Urban Development, Haggerty re-

Metal Trades Focus On Organizing Goals

By Eugene A. Kelly

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Delegates to the 53rd convention of the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept. voted new four-year terms for their 11 top officers and set new objectives for the department's 22 affiliated unions in the fields of organization, bargaining and legislation.

Pres. B. A. Gritta set the tone of the convention by reporting that unions affiliated with the department made sizable gains in the last two years, notably in the federal wage board or "blue collar" field, but warned that the biggest job of organizing lies ahead.

Metal Trades unions have won exclusive recognition agreements from 38 major federal installations—up 14 since the 1965 convention. But there are 400,000 still unorganized blue collar workers in the federal service, Gritta said.

He reported that the Metal Trades Dept. and its unions "established a fine record" of collective bargaining achievements, in grievance handling and in conducting leadership training programs for more than 2,000 stewards—a record achieved with the aid of AFL-CIO unions and the federation's Departments of Organization and Education.

The convention adopted a program calling for stepped-up organizing efforts not only in the federal service but also in private industry. It emphasized that the program is capable of achievement only with the assignment of money and manpower to the job, since the department itself has no independent organizing staff.

AFL-CIO Convention Speaker Schedule Set

Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey and several Cabinet members have accepted invitations to address the AFL-CIO's 7th biennial convention opening Dec. 7 at the Americana Hotel in Bal Harbour, Fla., Federation Pres. George Meany announced.

The date of Humphrey's address has not yet been determined, Meany said.

Meany also announced that the AFL-CIO Executive Council will hold a one-day meeting Dec. 6, preceding the convention.

The convention will recess over the weekend of Dec. 9-10 for meetings of convention committees.

The AFL-CIO General Board, made up of 29 Executive Council members and a chief executive officer of each affiliated union and trade and industrial department, will meet Dec. 9.

Major speakers on the opening day of the convention include Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz, Sec. of Health, Education & Welfare John W. Gardner, Sec. of Transportation Alan S. Boyd and American Legion Cmdr. William E. Galbraith.

Among the speakers scheduled for the second day are Sec. of State

Southern Area School Draws 40 Unionists

Biloxi, Miss.—Latest techniques in organizing and bargaining, labor and political education and civil rights were among key subjects covered at the Advanced Southern Labor School here.

The week-long school is held each year in a different city in the South. Attending this year's classes were more than 40 full-time union representatives and officials of 12 international unions as well as state AFL-CIO organizations.

Instructors included Dir. Walter G. Davis of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education, Dir. Donald Slaiman of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights and Stanton Smith, AFL-CIO coordinator of state and city central bodies.

Other Instructors

Other courses were directed by Daniel Powell, Wilbur Hobby and Fannie Neal of the National COPE staff; Oliver Singleton and Robert Starnes, AFL-CIO regional organizers in the South, and Henry Munoz, equal opportunity director of the Texas AFL-CIO.

Prof. Ray Marshall of the University of Kentucky lectured on "status and prospects" for labor in the South and Steve Gordon and John Fenton, associate general counsels of the National Labor Relations Board, explained NLRB operations and policies.

Alabama AFL-CIO Pres. Barney Weeks is president of the school; Arkansas AFL-CIO Pres. J. Bill Becker is its secretary-treasurer, and George T. Guernsey, assistant director, AFL-CIO Dept. of Education, is school coordinator.

The need for substantial wage increases was cited as a "high priority" issue by the Steelworkers as the union opened negotiations for 32,600 workers at three of the nation's major can companies.

Bargaining got under way in Washington with Continental Can Co., American Can Co. and National Can Corp. Contracts with the first two expire Jan. 31, 1968. The National pact runs out Feb. 29, 1968.

Another can industry agreement with the Crown, Cork & Seal Co. also expires next Feb. 29 but no date has yet been set for the start of negotiations.

The Continental contract covers 15,000 workers in 80 locals. The agreement at American covers the same number of employes in 42 locals. Some 2,600 workers in 17 locals are under the National contract.

Bargaining goals were set forth by a USWA can industry conference in October. It listed wage increases and improvements in the wage structure to adjust for changes in skill requirements as the first item in a bargaining policy statement.

The conference also called for improvements in pension and insurance programs, vacations, holidays, overtime and shift premiums, severance pay and other benefits.

USWA Pres. I. W. Abel said bargaining objectives reflect "problems of concern to the workers and it is our hope that the industry will give serious consideration to them in the interest of speedily concluding a settlement."

"Profits and productivity in the industry have continued to rise and these must be shared equitably with the industry's employes in the new contracts," Abel declared.

Bargaining in the can industry will follow a new procedure set by USWA's 1966 convention, which provides for industry conferences to conduct negotiations in steel, can, aluminum and nonferrous metal industries.

Each conference has authority to reject or ratify contracts, recommend strike deadlines subject to membership approval, and approve contract settlements.

USWA's District 9 Dir. William Moran is chairman of the can industry conference and will head negotiations at American. District 7 Dir. Hugh P. Carcella and District 8 Dir. Albert Atallah will head bargaining committees at Continental and National, respectively.

GM Bargaining Pushed Following Chrysler Pact

Detroit—The Auto Workers pressed negotiations at General Motors, the giant of the auto industry, after reaching an accord on a national pact for 8,000 white-collar workers at Chrysler Corp.

The union's executive board met as the AFL-CIO News went to press to set strike deadlines on national and local contract demands for its 400,000 GM members.

The board's deadlines were to be acted upon by the union's GM council, composed of 400 delegates from bargaining units throughout the nation.

National bargaining at GM began in July, but was largely interrupted during UAW's seven-week strike at Ford Motor Co. and its subsequent negotiations at Chrysler.

While the union at GM seeks to negotiate the wage-benefits package established in the national agreements at Ford and Chrysler, it also has stressed that other key issues are at stake.

UAW Vice Pres. Leonard Woodcock, who heads the negotiating committee at GM, said the union seeks changes in its present national contract that will give members more representation and new grievance procedures.

The union also has accused GM of continuously trying to remove jobs from UAW jurisdiction by putting them into computerized fields with non-union workers.

Woodcock warned that a strike or strikes could occur at GM if these issues and local contracts are not resolved.

UAW reached agreement on a three-year contract covering Chrysler's salaried workers on Nov. 26 as a strike deadline was delayed a few hours to put finishing touches on the settlement.

The union said the salaried workers' agreement, which is subject to membership ratification, provides raises ranging from $8 to $20 a week, fully retroactive to Oct. 16, new safeguards against bargaining unit "erosion" and improvements in promotion, training and stock-purchase programs.

Pay For Skills

The UAW said a "substantial number" of salaried workers—office, clerical and technical employes—got the $20 increase, which is equivalent to the increase gained by skilled classifications in the earlier agreement covering hourly production workers.

Meanwhile, the union was still on strike at eight plants of Deere & Co., struck Nov. 17 when management refused to match the pattern won by UAW at Caterpillar Tractor Co. Most of the 20,000 strikers are in the Peoria, Ill. area.

Still to be settled are contracts with Allis-Chalmers, Massey-Ferguson, Oliver, Intl. Harvester and other farm equipment firms.

A UAW local representing 5,500 workers also remained on strike against 54 tool and die shops represented by the Detroit Tooling Association. That walkout began Nov. 20.

UFT Names Hy Peck As Managing Editor

New York—Hy Peck, formerly of the staff of Textile Labor, monthly publication of the Textile Workers Union of America, has taken a newly created post as managing editor of the United Teacher, published by the United Federation of Teachers, Local 2 of the American Federation of Teachers. Ted Bleecker remains as editor of the UFT publication.

URW Local Wins Gains At Tire Proving Ground

Pecos, Tex. — Rubber Workers Local 683 won contract improvements totaling 43.8 cents in a three-year agreement with Automotive Proving Grounds, Inc. Union Pres. Y. L. Dominguez said gains include a 33 percent increase in hospitalization benefits, and two additional paid holidays.

Wage hikes of 20, 10 and 10 cents in successive yearly boosts were agreed to for truck drivers, tire technicians and mechanics. Car drivers and others will get annual increases of 10 cents each year, the union said.

Strike Averted:

N.Y. Taxi Drivers Win 3-Year Pact

New York—AFL-CIO Taxi Drivers Local 3036 won a new three-year contract that will provide higher earnings, improved vacations and other new benefits for 29,000 members, averting a city-wide strike.

The agreement was given a strong vote of approval by drivers and garage workers at a meeting at Manhattan Center, Nov. 27. It was reached with the Metropolitan Taxicab Board of Trade, representing 75 taxi-fleet owners, in negotiations that extended around the clock at the final stage.

Mayor John V. Lindsay and Chairman Vincent D. McDonnell of the State Mediation Board assisted in the talks that brought the final agreement.

Although the old contract expired Nov. 16, the local remained in negotiations on a day-by-day basis. Some drivers halted their cabs and staged protest picketing, but returned to work the next day at the urging of union leaders.

Local 3036 Pres. Harry Van Arsdale, Jr. described the new contract as "a great achievement, a great step forward." He predicted it would strengthen the taxi union and result in better taxi service for the city.

Benefit improvements in the contract are to become effective with the approval of a taxi fare increase by the city council. Lindsay said he will seek an increase and individual council members voiced support. The last taxi rate increase was granted in 1964.

The new contract would give all drivers, whose earnings are based on commissions and tips, an immediate increase in the basic commission rate from the present 47 percent to 48 percent. The rate would go to 49 percent after 18 months.

Full-time drivers of 10 years, with the last three at one garage, would receive 49 percent immediately and 50 percent in the final 18 months of the contract.

The union said that drivers now average about $100 a week for a 50-hour week. The exact dollar amount of their increase will depend on how much the fare is raised, it pointed out.

The contract contains a "breakthrough" on the three-week paid vacation for taxi drivers. It goes to those who have worked full-time for 15 years, with the last three at the same company. The qualification for a two-week vacation is reduced from four to three full-time work years.

New Benefits

The requirement that a driver must work 240 full-time days a year to be considered a full-time driver is reduced to 230 days. Compensatory pay for drivers whose taxis break down on the road is increased from $1.50 to $2 an hour.

Garage workers, known as "inside men," will receive a 5 percent a year wage increase, or 15 percent over three years, under the new contract, the local announced.

These employes, about 1,200 in all, also gained improvements in vacations, holidays and industry-wide seniority.

The pact also provides for joint administration of the health and welfare fund, previously administered solely by employers. A new severance pay provision of one day for each year worked is "a beginning that we expect to improve upon," the local declared.

Court Bars Union Cards As Proof of Majority

The 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals has denied enforcement of a National Labor Relations Board order to bargain on the basis of a card check, holding that union authorization cards are "unreliable" indicators of workers' sentiment and need not be accepted by employers as proof of a union's majority status.

The position, set forth in a case involving S. S. Logan Packing Co., Huntington, W. Va., drew a strong dissent from Circuit Judge Simon E. Sobeloff.

Sobeloff did not participate in the deciding case but was on the three-judge panel in a second case, involving the NLRB and Sehon Stevenson & Co., also of Huntington. In that case the majority amplified on the Logan decision.

Bargaining Sought

In both cases the board had petitioned for orders requiring the firms to bargain with Meat Cutters Local 347 because the union showed sufficient cards to represent "a clear majority" of employes.

In the Logan case the court denied the board's petition. It upheld the bargaining order at Stevenson on the ground that an employer "poll" there confirmed the union's claim to majority representation and left no basis for good faith doubt.

In Logan, the majority held that it is possible to obtain signed authorization cards by misrepresentation or coercion, that sometimes they are obtained before "all sides" are heard, and that except in "extraordinary" circumstances the Taft-Hartley Act requires an election as proof of a union majority.

Sobeloff charged the Logan decision "smacks of policy-making by stereotype." He added, "Cards are not inherently unreliable, and it cannot be laid down as a flat rule of law they are unreliable regardless of circumstances."

He cited "almost thirty years" of previous decisions by "this circuit" in which cards were held to be "ample proof of majority representation."

Further, he cited two decisions by the U.S. Supreme Court—one made before passage of Taft-Hartley and the other later—which "sanctioned the card count" as one means of a union achieving representative status.

Decision Studied

An NLRB spokesman also pointed to "many court decisions upholding the use of cards." He said the board would wait to see if the decision carries "any prevailing weight" before considering an appeal.

The Logan decision was written by Chief Judge Clement F. Haynesworth for himself and Judge Herbert S. Boreman. Judge J. Spencer Bell was on the panel but died before the case was decided. Haynesworth, Boreman and Sobeloff were the panel in the Stevenson case.

53rd Convention:

Metal Trades Focus On Organizing Goals

a major speech, announced that a presidential committee which heard testimony recently on proposed changes in Executive Order 10988, governing organization and bargaining rights of federal employes is now "summing up" in preparation for submitting its recommendations to the President.

Consultation Lacking

Commenting on a convention resolution charging that the Dept. of Labor has proposed "restrictive" regulations on the years-old system of apprenticeship training sponsored by labor and management, Wirtz said "I read your resolution" and "I agree it is wrong that your committee on apprenticeship was not consulted" before the regulations were published.

"I believe in the apprenticeship system," the secretary declared. "It's a solid achievement." Assuring the delegates that "we're going to protect the standards, the tradition and proven principles of trade unionism and of apprenticeship systems," Wirtz announced that he will meet with presidents of major unions Jan. 6 to discuss union objections to the proposed changes.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William J. Schnitzler reported that the federation has added more than 1.5 million new dues-paying members to its roster in the last three years —an increase of almost 11 percent. Nearly 30 percent of the increase was accounted for by unions in the Metal Trades Dept., he said.

Schnitzler said he has found a "higher degree of cooperation" in the labor movement today. He credited Article XXI of the AFL-CIO Constitution with "creating an atmosphere where officers of our international unions can work together on some of the problems" experienced in the past.

The convention voted full support for its Hanford, Wash., Atomic Council in a strike of 300 members. The walkout started Sept. 1 against an Atomic Energy Commission reactor operation run under contract by the Douglas United Nuclear Co. The convention blamed the walkout on "arbitrary increases in radiation levels" beyond a safe margin. It called on AEC to instruct the company to withdraw a $2.6 million damage suit against the Hanford MTC and to "stop interfering with the negotiation" of a mutually acceptable agreement.

Seapower Stressed

Delegates adopted a series of resolutions calling for revitalization of the U.S. Merchant Marine and continuation of the U.S. as "the world's leading naval power."

They endorsed a 35-hour workweek for all members without any loss in weekly pay, recommended that steps be taken to discourage members from "moonlighting" on extra jobs when a shorter workweek is won, and urged premium pay for all work performed on Saturdays, Sundays and holidays.

The convention called for federal regulation of the auto insurance industry to prevent abuses such as those ascribed to some "80 high-rate, high-risk insurance companies which went bankrupt in recent years."

The delegates urged federal income tax reform and called for restoration of tax equity by "eliminating all tax favors" to oil firms, including some which build ships abroad and thus avoid U.S. taxes and labor regulations.

Chairman John W. Macy of the U.S. Civil Service Commission announced that "it is only a matter of days until the basic policies for a new coordinated federal wage system" covering 700,000 government blue collar employes will be made public.

"You can take tremendous pride and pleasure — because you have been of tremendous help in developing this new arrangement," Macy said. The new system will insure that the government "not only pays prevailing rates, but that each department of the government pays the same rate for the same kind of work in each local wage area —equal pay for substantially equal work, and pay distinctions in keeping with work distinctions."

Gritta said he was a member of a committee that has been meeting since January 1966 to seek uniform wage board pay rates and procedures for federal employes. Another was William H. Ryan of the Machinists, he reported.

Gritta told delegates the department now has 100 active Metal Trades councils—30 in the federal establishment and 70 in private industry. It helped achieve two "historic" agreements, he said —one for joint bargaining procedures by West Coast shipyard unions, the other a similar agreement by Vancouver and Victoria, B.C., unions which resulted in one of the largest wage increases ever negotiated for Canadian shipyard workers.

Pres.-Emeritus Lawrence Raftery of the Painters swore in department officers for the new term. Besides Gritta, they are Sec.-Treas. Clayton W. Bilderback and Vice Presidents Gordon M. Freeman, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers; Gunnar Hallstrom, Pattern Makers; William A. Lazzerini, Molders; John H. Lyons, Iron Workers; Russell K. Berg, Boiler Makers; Hunter P. Wharton, Operating Engineers; P. L. Siemiller, Machinists; William E. Fredenberger, Firemen & Oilers; S. Frank Raftery, Painters, all presidents of their unions.

INTER-UNION COOPERATION, including coordinated bargaining, can help labor meet the challenge of corporate expansion, Pres. Paul Jennings told the Economics & Collective Bargaining Conference of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers. The three-day conference in Chicago drew 300 IUE delegates.

Role of Building Crafts Stressed In Huge Task of Reviving Cities

called. Noting that HUD Sec. Robert C. Weaver would be a convention speaker, Haggerty promised the full cooperation of the building trades in the "vast program of rebuilding our cities."

A few days earlier, he noted, Weaver announced that plans for rebuilding will begin soon in 63 demonstration cities under the model cities and housing acts. Of this Haggerty said:

"I suggest our local unions and councils make every effort to be represented on all planning committees for all phases of the program in their area.

The entire field of urban renewal and rehabilitation "will for years continue to grow . . . and the time is right now for us to get into every phase of the work as it expands." The program, Haggerty declared, "means not only a better way of life for millions of Americans" but also continued employment for present and future union members.

On the subject of situs picketing, Haggerty said the failure of Congress to permit on-site picketing by a building trade against an unfair contractor "represents one of the sorriest demonstrations" of the failure of Congress to permit a vote on a pending bill. "I can assure you," he told the delegates, "that this department has not and will not abandon the fight."

On the subject of the war in Southeast Asia Haggerty said that building trades delegates, as practical men, "clearly recognize our commitment in Viet Nam. They realize we are dedicated to the principle that the destructive forces of communism shall not be permitted to crush helpless people in any part of the free world."

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz told the delegates in an address, that he would discuss union charges that the government failed to consult labor adequately on new federal programs when he meets with union presidents early in January.

Pres. Johnson sent a message to the convention saying that building tradesmen can "take great pride in a long and honorable history of service to this country" and concluding "I know the nation can count on your sustained help in ensuring that the high goals we share for America are fully realized."

The convention was scheduled to elect officers Dec. 1 after three days of business sessions and talks by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, Pres. Paul Hall of the Seafarers and the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept., and Weaver.

Areas of Controversy

Wirtz singled out three areas of controversy which he said required further discussion—enforcement of an executive order involving equal employment opportunity on government contracts; the proposed revision of the Labor Dept.'s apprenticeship regulations, and the Model Cities Act, which provides for approval of a city rebuilding program only if it permits "widespread citizen participation in the program, maximum opportunities for employing residents of the area in all phases of the program, and enlarged opportunities for work and training."

Wirtz said "there are no simple answers" to disputes over how to eliminate any suspicion of discriminatory practices. But he added, "to be specific, I count any general rule . . . wrong if it specifies a number, one or more, of Negroes or whites to be at work in every craft on every job."

Agreeing that "affirmative action" by the government is necessary, Wirtz said, "we know we don't have the right answers yet." But he favored a section of a convention resolution asking "due regard for the institution of apprenticeship" and calling on the Administration to "explore more seriously with the Building Trades Dept. constructive methods by which Negroes might be helped to enter" the apprenticeship system.

The pending resolution on apprenticeship charges that the proposed regulations "appear effectively to abolish the Bureau of Apprenticeship & Training, and to transfer its historic functions to the manpower administrator" and also that it questions "the validity of the standards of every apprenticeship program that ever has been approved by BAT or a recognized state apprenticeship agency."

Federal Court Fines Shoe Company For Persisting in Refusal to Bargain

Cumberland Shoe Corp. of Chapel Hill, Tenn., ordered by the National Labor Relations Board in 1963 to bargain with the Boot & Shoe Workers, has been found guilty of contempt of court in still refusing to do so.

The 6th Circuit Court of Appeals, which in 1965 directed the firm to comply with the NLRB order, has found it to be in "civil contempt of this court" in failing to obey its decree.

The NLRB's order also specified that Cumberland cease and desist "interrogating employes unlawfully regarding union activities, threatening them with reprisal, or promising them benefits" to reject the union.

The court ordered Cumberland "to purge itself" of contempt by immediately accepting any request by the union to bargain or face a fine of $5,000 with additional fines of $500 a day for every day it remains in noncompliance.

The Boot & Shoe Workers awaited an answer to a written call for negotiations sent from its Boston office, Nov. 27. The union said it will seek to have the fines imposed if there is further delay.

The court instructed the firm to notify the NLRB within 10 days "what steps have been taken to comply" with the order and to make "further returns" to the board each 30 days on "the course and nature of bargaining."

Further, the court told Cumberland to post for at least 60 consecutive days "in a conspicuous place" a notice, signed by a company official, that informs workers that the employer has been found in "disobedience" of the court.

The order, which also assessed the firm for all court costs in connection with the contempt proceedings was issued by Judges Clifford O'Sullivan, Harry Phillips and George C. Edwards.

The union, in describing its long battle with Cumberland, said it believed "that the company knew it couldn't win" but was determined to stall negotiations "to the bitter end."

After the board issued its 1963 order, which upheld the union's majority status by card check to give it bargaining rights, the company closed its Chapel Hill plant in April 1964 on grounds it was losing money.

In Feb. 1965, NLRB Trial Examiner Eugene F. Frey, after hearing charges filed by the union, ruled that the firm had illegally shut down to avoid bargaining.

He ordered it to reimburse 100 workers for back pay lost from the time the plant closed and to rehire them at its plant in Franklin, Tenn., which had taken over some of the Chapel Hill operations.

At the time, he pointed out that Cumberland's history was marked by "antiunion animus and long-continued unlawful resistance to recognition of the union."

After the firm later reopened its Chapel Hill plant, the board overruled Frey, finding that the closing had been for economic reasons. But it again found the employer guilty of unfair labor practices in failing to notify the union of its reopening, and by again refusing to bargain upon request.

Since the 1963 order to bargain had been enforced by the 6th Circuit Court, the board declared, management had a "clear and continuing obligation to recognize and deal with the union as the representative of its employes."

It once more ordered Cumberland to bargain and when it still refused the board initiated contempt proceedings.

The Money Squeeze

THE MOST IMMEDIATE and direct effect of the devaluation of the British pound in the United States has been to increase interest rates and touch off a new round of tight money.

The decision of the Federal Reserve Board to hike the discount rate from 4 to 4.5 percent in reaction to the British action in raising their discount rate to 8 percent will not only slow up the American economy but could trigger a worldwide interest rate war.

The effect of higher interest rates is to increase the price of money, making it more difficult and expensive to finance the vast unmet needs not only of the American economy but of the economies of all the free and newly developing nations of the world.

The jargon and the special mystique that surrounds international monetary matters diverts attention and obscures understanding of the basic issue of how manipulation of interest rates and money reserves affects the economic wellbeing of the free peoples of the world.

It obscures also the fact that most of the decisions are taken by a small group of men representing the central banks of the world and their private banking colleagues. If this group of men and banks determines, for example, that the balance of payments problem in the United States has to be corrected, it may attempt under the present international monetary system to exert pressure on the American government to shift its economic policies despite the resulting rise in unemployment and other deflationary effects.

THE AFL-CIO has a clear and unequivocal position on this question of who shall call the shots on economic policy in the U.S. It said at its last convention that "interest rates in the United States should be determined by the needs of the American economy for sustained full employment and increasing buying power—not by the monetary decision of foreign central banks."

The British devaluation has focused attention anew on the strength in the world monetary system of the American dollar, and experts are being quoted by the handful to the effect that the dollar's position has been weakened and that the U.S. balance of payments deficit calls for correction.

This is more of the fiction of the international monetary world. The U.S. dollar is not a mysterious symbol in international accounts balances; it is the strength and vigor and growth of the American economy. It is the same dollar that financed the recovery of the free world after World War II, that made it possible for these nations to chalk up tremendous gains and bring up the standard of living of their peoples.

It made possible the strong central banking systems that are now concerned about converting their American dollars into gold—a move that, in combination with higher interest rates, could result in further slowing of the economy.

It is time to sweep away the mystery and jargon of international finance and establish the fact that a country's economic policies and goals will be determined by that country through political decisions, not by a small group dedicated to an arbitrary monetary stability whatever the cost.

Warns Against Weakening:

Mondale Calls Senate Meat Bill 'Bare Minimum' of Protection

The following is excerpted from a speech on the Senate floor by Sen. Walter F. Mondale (D-Minn.), co-sponsor of the meat inspection bill passed by the Senate.

IT WAS the overriding concern of the committee that the consumer be protected against filthy and diseased meat, against meats adulterated by poisonous or dangerous additives, and against mislabeled products, or meat stuffed with cheap fillers such as water, cereals, nonfat dry milk, or the like.

As things now stand, the consumer simply cannot protect himself. He can be confident in a supermarket that the meat he is buying was slaughtered and processed under federal standards or the equivalent only if he can find the USDA "inspected and passed" label. He does not have even that possibility in a restaurant.

We learned during the Senate hearings that the normal rules of consumer self-help are of no value whatsoever in the absence of the federal stamp of approval. First, modern chemicals and drugs completely nullify the usual tests of sight and smell with respect to meat. Injections of antibiotics, sulfites and nitrites, and ascorbate—which I call a sort of healthy formaldehyde—cancel out the smell and appearance of decaying or unhealthy meat.

Second, it is no guarantee that meat is federally inspected to shop only in large, nationally known retail chain stores. A 1967 USDA survey of intrastate meat products purchased in regular grocery stores and supermarkets—including such national chains as Kroger, Safeway, and A. & P.—showed that only 39 of 162 meat products tested met all federal meat inspection requirements. The remaining 123 samples showed a total of 259 violations of federal standards is due to excessive water, excess nonmeat fillers and use of various additives such as ascorbate, phosphates and nitrites in products where they are prohibited by federal standards.

Third, brand names and labels provide no protection. The largest meat packing companies in the nation have established plants doing business only within a state and therefore escape the stringent requirements of federal meat inspection which products from their other operations must undergo. For example, the meat industry's big three—Swift & Co., Wilson & Co., and Armour & Co.—have admitted operating more than 100 intrastate meat plants which slaughter, process, and prepare millions of pounds of meat each year without federal inspection.

Further, USDA officials testified before the Senate Agriculture committee that the same brand names and labels are used for meat products processed in an intrastate plant as are used for the same item emanating from a federally inspected plant. Thus, even with nationally advertised brand name items, the consumer must look for a federal inspection stamp.

I think we must ask why major packing companies establish intrastate operations and why intrastate operators are so opposed to federal inspection and go to such lengths to preserve their intrastate status as to ignore large segments of their national markets.

It was made clear during the hearings that this practice is supported by economic advantage. The intrastate meat operator has a distinct economic advantage over his interstate competitor who must meet federal standards regarding ante mortem and post mortem inspection, plant sanitation, use of additives or cheap fillers, and false or deceptive labeling, because the intrastate operator can buy inferior animals, dress up bad meat with chemicals, and use cheap fillers with impunity.

THE ECONOMIC ADVANTAGE which makes "bad meat good business" was created by Congress in 1907 when it passed the Meat Inspection Act requiring compliance with federal standards for all meat sold across state lines.

The consumers of America are now demanding that Congress eliminate this economic advantage by requiring that all meat sold in this country is safe and clean.

While I believe this bill is very strong and substantial, it is in an important sense a bare minimum. As it stands before the Senate now, it can be weakened only at the risk of jeopardizing the public health. We must stand firm and insist that there be no compromise on the issue of the public health.

The very worst thing the Congress can do in meat inspection is to pass a nominal or "showpiece" bill, which will mislead the consumer into believing that his health and that of his family is protected. It would be quite as wrong to pass a good bill, and then fail to appropriate the funds necessary to carry it out. If by failing to insist upon effective legislation and adequate funds we induce an unjustified sense of complacency in the consumer, it would be far better to have no legislation at all so that the consumer would be on guard.

Report on the 90th Congress

By Andrew J. Biemiller
Director, AFL-CIO Department of Legislation

The conservative coalition is back in business.

Republicans have teamed up with Southern Democrats to form a power bloc that has effectively stopped progress in Congress.

AFL-CIO members should have no illusions about the situation. It's tough.

We are on the defensive. We have not been able to plow the ground in all the new legislative areas where we wanted to move. We have been using our strength to keep intact the landmark achievements of the 89th Congress.

Most of the Republicans who moved into the seats lost by more than 40 Democrats in the House of Representatives in the 1966 elections were—and are—conservatives. They have renewed their coalition with their Dixiecrat playmates.

The conservative coalition has backed the AFL-CIO into a position where we have had to protect Medicare, aid to education, improved social security benefits, civil rights and anti-poverty measures from being weakened or destroyed.

And we have found ourselves on the losing side on several important votes.

The conservatives chant "economy" each time they vote to mutilate a program.

They pointed to the Johnson Administration's fiscal 1968 budget of $141 billion and demanded that it be cut. What they did not say was that $120 billion was budgeted for items that are untouchable even for the conservatives—national defense, veterans' benefits, interest payments on the national debt.

So they trained their guns on the $21 billion that was earmarked for programs that help people—education, housing, conservation, anti-poverty and other laws which help to provide for the general welfare of all Americans.

The conservative coalition flashed its strength early. A motion to deny funds for rent supplements for the poor found 163 Republicans and 58 Southern Democrats out-voting liberals and moderates who were trying to save the program. Only after the proposed appropriation for rent supplements was slashed from $40 million to $10 million were we able to salvage the measure.

The same conservative teamwork resulted in a "states' rights" proposal being added to the aid-to-education bill, seriously weakening it.

A mild measure to provide funds for a program to eliminate rats brought the true nature of the conservative coalition to the attention of Americans.

Conservatives demonstrated their sick humor by calling it "a civil rats law," adding comments about "pouring money down a rat hole." With the votes of 148 Republicans and 52 Southern Democrats, the conservative coalition prevented the proposal from even being brought to the floor for consideration.

Their cynicism backfired. The press and the public condemned those who found humor in obstructing a program to stop rats from biting—and often killing—helpless children. The rat control bill was later passed, but still 110 Republicans and 60 Southern Democrats voted against it.

While the conservative coalition has its greatest strength in the House of Representatives, it has a counterpart in the Senate as well.

The Senate group defeated a key labor proposal sponsored by Sen. Ralph Yarborough, liberal Texas Democrat. The senator called upon the government to tie up railroad profits while Pres. Johnson's panel arbitrated a contract settlement between several rail unions and managements.

A coalition of 32 Republicans and 14 Dixiecrats defeated the bill.

The AFL-CIO is fighting several conservative proposals in the Senate that would establish "labor courts." One has been sponsored by Sen. George Smathers, Florida Democrat. Another has been offered by Republican Robert P. Griffin of Michigan.

Labor and its friends managed to kill a bill which would have prohibited contributions of voluntary COPE dollars in election campaigns. Fortunately, this anti-labor action was beaten by a healthy 49-19 margin. We found that 18 of those anti-labor votes were cast by Republicans, with the 19th coming from a Southern Democrat.

We will still be on the defensive in 1968. The conservative coalition will again be waging its campaign of obstruction.

Our job will be to stop them from succeeding.

By Alexander E. Barkan
Director, AFL-CIO COPE

Why is it that the Congress of the United States, which only two years ago was attacking the nation's problems with such vigor, imagination and courage, now moves forward so reluctantly, and on some matters is moving back?

What accounts for the drastic change from the 89th to the 90th Congress, considering that the 1966 elections, although disappointing, produced no violent overturn?

The answer is important to all of us, since it goes to the very heart of the COPE program. The key fact to remember is that the character of Congress changed completely between 1965 and 1967 as result of a change of less than 10 percent of its membership. As few as 50,000 votes, divided judiciously among those districts where liberal incumbents lost by small margins could have saved enough of them to preserve the liberal character of Congress.

The thousands of union members who worked hard in the 1966 elections can be proud that their work, more than any other single factor, prevented a worse disaster.

These figures illustrate the opportunities and the perils of 1968. The loss of even a small number of liberal congressmen will almost certainly mean further dismantling of the important social program already under siege.

The number of bills aimed directly at unions is quietly growing in the 90th Congress. The addition of only a few more conservatives in 1968 will make it possible for them to be enacted into law.

There was nothing new about liberal off-year losses in 1966 which wiped out 47 liberal members in the House and two liberal senators. Coming as they did after an extraordinary number of new liberal congressmen were swept into office in the lop-sided 1964 election, the 1966 liberal losses were widely regarded as "normal." The off-year drop in the total vote in many areas, with by far the greatest drop occurring on the liberal side, was also "normal."

This voting record is more than a report card on the intelligence, skill and deportment of 535 Senators and Representatives. It is a detailed and exact accounting of the cost of that kind of "normalcy."

There is nothing new about congressional inactivity and uncertainty. There is nothing new about a bi-partisan conservative coalition in Congress. This partial history of the 90th Congress, represented by key votes in the first session, appears extraordinarily bad because it stands in the shadow of the 89th Congress which immediately preceded it.

The answer in 1968 must be intensified political education through existing national and state AFL-CIO machinery and international and national unions, with special emphasis on reaching the younger workers and members.

This effort must be supported by the development of local COPEs on a community basis in order to "go where our members live," increasingly in the suburbs.

Through these efforts, we can carry the fight next year to restore a liberal majority in Congress, to pick up where the 89th Congress left off and continue the progress and momentum generated by that Congress.

The next three pages carry labor's report card on the first 11 months of the 90th Congress.

Congressmen and senators have been judged on 12 key issues—"R-right" or "W-wrong" on the basis of the position the AFL-CIO took on the legislation.

Alongside the voting records are brief descriptions of the issues—what the vote was about and why it was important to the labor movement and the nation.

A congressman or senator may claim he supported labor's position because he voted for final passage of a bill. But in most cases, the key vote was on an amendment that would have seriously weakened or greatly improved the bill. The votes used here are those considered most significant.

How Your Repre

1. House Rules

The proposal—Motion by Rep. Albert (D-Okla.) to keep liberalized House rules adopted by 89th Congress.

Background—The House Rules Committee's ability to stall legislation indefinitely was curbed by the 89th Congress. On opening day of the 90th Congress Albert made an unsuccessful parliamentary move to assure the liberalized House rules would continue in effect.

The vote—On motion to save liberalized rules. Rejected, 196-225, January 10, 1967. Yea—right. Nay—wrong.

2. Rent Supplements

The proposal—Amendment by Rep. Davis (R-Wis.) to cut $10 million from rent supplements program.

Background—The 89th Congress enacted a rent supplement program to help poor families live in decent housing. Funding the program has been a constant battle although it is the first housing subsidy program ever endorsed by all segments of the real estate industry. Despite this, House conservatives voted to cut the rent supplements plan.

The vote—On the amendment. Approved, 233-171, May 17, 1967. Yea—wrong. Nay—right.

3. Model Cities

The proposal—Motion by Rep. Michel (R-Ill.) to strip model cities program of $225 million in project funds.

Background—Enacted in 1966, the model cities program was designed to renovate slums and blighted neighborhoods. It provides federal financial and technical aid to cities. It was intended to develop means for a comprehensive attack on social economic and physical problems that beset the slums and the poor who live in them.

The vote—On motion to cripple model cities program. Rejected, 193-213, May 17, 1967. Yea—wrong. Nay—right.

4. Elementary and Secondary Education

The proposal—Amendment by Rep. Green (D-Ore.) that would in effect undermine key parts of the aid to education program under the guise of "states rights."

Background—one of the great and hopeful breakthroughs of the 89th Congress was passage of the first major federal aid program to elementary and secondary schools. The law has helped school children in 90 percent of the nation's school districts, but its main achievement has been to aid children from low-income families. This "states rights" amendment transferred control of funds for fresh-idea programs to state boards of education, most of which work with outmoded distribution formulas weighted in favor of rural systems and against the deep-need core city school systems.

The vote—On the amendment. Approved, 230-185, May 24, 1967. Yea—wrong. Nay—right.

5. Food Stamp Program

The proposal—Agriculture Committee amendment to destroy the food stamp program.

Background—The food stamp program helps millions of poor persons eat better at minimum cost. They pay, for example, $3 for government stamps worth three or four times that amount when exchanged for food. It is one of the most humane of all federal programs. The committee amendment called for passing 20 percent of the program's cost to the states. Its effect would have been that most of the 41 states now paricipating would have withdrawn, according to their own governors and welfare directors.

The vote—On the amendment. Rejected, 173-191, June 8, 1967. Yea—wrong. Nay—right.

6. Teachers Corps

The proposal—Motion by Rep. Gurney (R-Fla.) to kill the Teachers Corps.

Background—The Teachers Corps was established to give deprived children an extra boost in education. It sends specially-trained teachers into the slums. Since its inception, it has been a target of reactionaries despite its modest cost.

The vote—On the motion to kill the Teachers Corps. Rejected, 146-257, June 27, 1967. Yea—wrong. Nay—right.

7. Compulsory Arbitration

The proposal—A motion by Rep. Friedel (D-Md.) to accept Senate-passed compulsory arbitration legislation, forcing striking rail shopcraft workers back to work.

Background—The first nationwide rail strike in more than 20 years began July 15, 1967. It ended two days later when Congress forced workers back to their jobs to await a settlement by a presidential panel. Compulsory arbitration was vigorously opposed by the labor movement as a dangerous federal intervention in labor-management affairs and an infringement of basic collective bargaining rights of both labor and management.

The vote—On accepting Senate-passed legislation to force strikers back to work. Approved, 244-148, July 17, 1967. Yea—wrong. Nay—right.

8. Rat Control

The proposal—A proposal to bring to the floor for consideration the Rat Extermination Act.

Background—Rats are disease-spreaders. They bite 14,000 Americans each year, mostly children and mostly in city slums. They cause $1 billion loss damage in food and goods annually. The proposal was greeted with jests and frivolity by some representatives.

The vote—On the proposal to consider the President's rat control program. Rejected, 176-207, July 20, 1967. Yea—right. Nay—wrong.

9. Public Power

The proposal—Amendment by Rep. Giaimo (D-Conn.) to the public work approporiations bill, to cut the $1.6 million in planning funds for Dickey-Lincoln power project in Maine.

Background—The Dickey-Lincoln power project has been the center of a public vs. private power battle. The project was designed to bring abundant power at low cost to a depressed region where power rates are among the highest in the country.

The vote—On the proposal to knock out planning funds for Dickey Lincoln. Approved, 233-169, July 25, 1967. Yea—wrong. Nay—right.

10. Postal and Federal Pay Raise

The proposal—A motion by Rep. Gross (R-Iowa) to reduce salary increases for postal workers and other federal civilian employes.

Background—Federal salaries do not match salaries for equivalent jobs in private industry. An effort was made to bring postal workers and other federal civilian employes in line with private industry salaries by a multi-step salary increase over three years. The proposal by Gross would have killed all but the first-step increase.

The vote—On the motion to delete all but the first step of salary increases. Rejected, 199-211, Oct. 11, 1967. Yea—wrong. Nay—right.

11. Appropriations

The proposal—An amendment by Rep. Whitten (D-Miss.) to force an $8.5 billion cut in the administration's budget for fiscal 1968.

Background—Seeking to embarrass the President, conservatives tried a series of maneuvers to slash and to stall appropriations bills throughout the first session of the 90th Congress. Their main target, apart from harassment, was to force starvation of new Great Society programs through cuts in appropriations for labor, education, health, housing, welfare and the war on poverty.

The vote—On the amendment. Approved, 238-164, Oct. 18, 1967. Yea—wrong. Nay—right.

12. War on Poverty

The proposal—Motion by Rep. Ayres (R-Ohio) to slash $460 million from the Office of Economic Opportunity (command post for the war on poverty) authorization.

Background—Conservatives waged war on the war on poverty throughout the first session of the 90th Congress. Their objective was to dismantle the OEO and "spin off" poverty program to other federal agencies where the programs would lose impact and effectiveness. While dismantling efforts were defeated, the deep slash in funds from a proposed $2.06 billion to $1.6 billion would severly limit OEO operations, and would curtail or kill useful anti-poverty programs in many areas.

The vote—On the motion. Approved, 221-190, Nov. 15, 1967. Yea—wrong. Nay—right.

How Your Senators Voted

1. Filibuster Rule

The Senate's Rule 22 requires a two-thirds vote to stop a filibuster. Because of this, the Senate has been unable to act on repeal of Taft-Hartley's Sec. 14(b) and major civil rights bills. The filibuster has also been used to block any change in the rule. On Jan. 24, 1967, the Senate voted 53-46 for Majority Leader Mansfield's motion to close debate on the rules change, but it was defeated for lack of a two-thirds margin. Yea—right. Nay—wrong.

2. Compulsory Arbitration

Sen. Ralph Yarborough sought to balance the compulsory arbitration bill by an amendment impounding 10 percent of the railroads' profits during the period in which rail workers were prohibited from striking—thus creating an incentive for a voluntary settlement of the dispute. The amendment was rejected, 23-59, on June 7, 1967. Yea—right. Nay—wrong.

3. Congressional Redistricting

A House-passed bill would have allowed states to evade one man-one vote standards for congressional districts until 1972. An amendment by Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) strengthened the bill by limiting the population variation to no more than 10 percent, beginning with 1968 elections, and barring gerrymandering. It was adopted, 44-39, on June 8, 1967. Yea—right. Nay—wrong.

4. Teachers Corps

The Teachers Corps sends trained teaching teams to poverty areas where educational needs are greatest. An amendment by Sen. Morse (D-Ore.) to raise its appropriations from $18 million to the $33 million asked by Pres. Johnson was rejected, 43-45, on Aug. 2, 1967. Yea—right. Nay—wrong.

5. Alliance for Progress

An amendment by Sen. Robert Kennedy (D-N.Y.) to authorize an additional $72 million for the Alliance for Progress would have helped the growth of democratic trade unions in Latin America through additional support for the programs of the American Institute for Free Labor Development. It was rejected, 38-53, on Aug. 17, 1967. Yea—right. Nay—wrong.

6. Foreign Aid

A 21-nation agreement was jeopardized when Sen. Lausche (D-Ohio) sought to cut $150 million from increased special project funds for the Inter-American Bank, designed to raise living standards and strengthen Latin American economies. The Lausche amendment was rejected, 38-41, on Aug. 24, 1967. Yea—wrong. Nay—right.

7. Election Reform

An amendment by Sen. Williams (R-Del.) to an election reform bill was aimed at the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education. It would have prevented COPE from giving dollars voluntarily contributed by union members to endorsed candidates for Congress. The amendment was rejected, 19-46, on Sept. 11, 1967. Yea—wrong. Nay—right.

8. Rent Supplements

Funds for rent supplements, to help poor families live in decent housing, would have been cut in half under an amendment proposed by Sen. Lausche (D-Ohio). It was rejected, 34-55, on Sept. 20, 1967. Yea—wrong. Nay—right.

9. War on Poverty-Jobs

A labor-supported proposal by Sen. Prouty (R-Vt.) would have set up a one-year, $925 million emergency job program—a step in the direction of the large-scale job program urged by the AFL-CIO and the Urban Coalition. It was rejected, 42-47, on Oct. 4, 1967. Yea—right. Nay—wrong.

10. Poverty—Farm Workers

Big California growers wanted Gov. Reagan to be able to veto community anti-poverty programs assisting migrant workers which might aid farm workers' organizing efforts. An amendment by Sen. Murphy (R-Calif.) to accomplish this was rejected, 41-45, on Oct. 4, 1967. Yea—wrong. Nay—right.

11. War on Poverty—Funding

Sen. Williams (R-Del.) sought to cut $198 million from the anti-poverty bill in the Senate. His amendment was rejected, 36-50, on Oct. 5, 1967. Yea—wrong. Nay—right.

12. Social Security

The Senate social security bill was greatly superior to the House-passed bill. An amendment by Sen. Curtis (R-Neb.) would have reduced benefits to the level of the House bill. It was rejected, 22-58, on Nov. 21, 1967. Yea—wrong. Nay—right.

Civil Rights Commission Reports:

Despair as Well as Poverty Marks Life in Nation's Ghettos

The following is excerpted from the conclusion of a report by the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights "A Time to Listen . . . A Time to Act," on urban racial problems.

ALTHOUGH FEW white Americans have had first hand contact with Negro slums or Mexican American "barrios," in recent months they have become generally familiar with the tangible facts of ghetto life. They have read all about or been made aware of the meanness of the surroundings and the poverty—the deteriorated housing, rats, unemployment, the vice and crime.

What is not visible to the eye and what apparently is not generally understood is the feeling of many Negro ghetto residents that they live in a "trap" from which they cannot escape.

The life of the slum dweller—physically bare—is characterized by frustration, despair and hopelessness. He has a sense of powerlessness and a feeling of inability to communicate his own problems, control his own destiny or influence persons in positions of authority.

For many ghetto residents, the symbol of white authority is the policeman, who, in their view, has often not provided protection for citizens within the ghetto, does not treat them with dignity and respect and views his role as that of keeping Negroes "in line" on behalf of the white community.

In the view of ghetto residents the attitude of local government is exemplified by the inadequacy of sanitation services, and by the absence of needed health and recreational facilities and the transportation services that would make them accessible. The symbols of the white business community are the merchant who sells inferior merchandise or who exploits the economic dependence of Negroes by providing credit at exhorbitant rates, and the absentee landlord who reduces services and allows property to deteriorate once Negroes become tenants.

It would be reassuring to conclude that the situation of Negroes in the slums is not dissimilar to that of past generations of American immigrants who lived in ghettos but were able to leave. Many white Americans have drawn this conclusion and have expressed the belief that Negroes themselves are responsible for their condition and that all that is required to escape is personal effort.

But the analogy is misleading and dangerous. Negroes are not recent immigrants to our shores but Americans of long standing. They were oppressed not by foreign governments but by a system of slavery supported by this government and its people. The legacy of slavery continues in the form of racial segregation (de facto if no longer legal), discrimination and prejudice.

Escape from the ghetto for any group is much more difficult in the America of the 1960's than it was one or two generations ago. Society has become more complex, and unskilled employment or small business enterprises no longer are meaningful first steps up the ladder.

These factors—the demands of a technological society, and discrimination and prejudice, facilitated by the visibility of the Negroes' skin color—have been translated into barriers far more formidable than those which were faced by the Irish, the Italians, the Poles or the Jews in this country.

The response of government to deprivation and discrimination has raised expectations, but has too often been characterized by an inadequate commitment of resources and by acquiescence in, or failure to deal effectively with, practices of segregation and confinement.

Thus, for example, most Negro citizens would welcome welfare programs which offered not a "dole," but assistance which would achieve the program's stated purpose—to promote economic independence and family stability.

Critical decisions are often made by officials far removed from the scene and the persons most intimately involved are generally not permitted to participate in planning their own affairs and futures.

Underlying these private and public actions have been attitudes within the white majority—attitudes based on fear, on racial prejudice, and on a desire for status.

IT IS IN THE CONTEXT of great frustrations, of laws and programs which promise but do not deliver, of continued deprivation, discrimination and prejudice in a society increasingly prosperous, that the increasing alienation and the disorders of recent months must be viewed. Despite the great destructiveness of recent urban riots, mainly to people and property in the ghetto itself, relatively few people have been involved. But the general public should come to understand that the riots are only the violent manifestations of feelings of anger and despair . . .

Reacting to continued rejection and to doors which do not open even after years of patient waiting, increasing numbers of Negro citizens are rejecting white America. The failure of state, local and federal governments to respond to the efforts of moderate Negro leaders is causing increasing numbers of Negroes to despair of moderate methods and of moderate leadership and to favor a separatist course.

The problems of our cities and the people who live in them will not be resolved by a search for culprits or conspirators, or for solutions which do not cost money or effort.

Nor can it justly be argued that remedies for the discrimination suffered by the millions of Americans who live in slum ghettos should be deferred on the ground that to do otherwise would be to reward violence. Violators of the law must be punished. But it would be a cruel paradox if after years of failing to reward patience or redress injustice, we were to use such violations by a few as an excuse for continued inaction on the problems which affect so many, and involve us all.

The problems of race and poverty which we face today cannot be resolved unless their solutions are made the nation's first priority.

Hallbeck Renews Call:

Government Employes Urge Federal Service Labor Board

THE CHAIRMAN of the AFL-CIO Government Employes Council renewed labor's call for a Federal Service Labor-Management Relations Board to administer an improved executive order governing collective bargaining for federal Pres. E. C. Hallbeck of the Postal Clerks reported there is often an "absolute unwillingness on the part of lower echelons" of federal management to accept and comply with the principles of the order. He made the statements on Labor News Conference, a public affairs interview broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EST, on the Mutual Radio Network.

Under the present system, Hallbeck noted, the department or agency charged with a violation determines the merits of the case against it. It is not "reasonable to suppose that the defendant can well and honestly be the judge and jury," he declared.

Hallbeck cited cases of postmasters committing "repeated violations of not only the executive order, but of the agreements negotiated under it." He said that departmental action in such cases is only a "slap on the wrist, in the dark," and the offense is repeated.

HALLBECK TESTIFIED recently before a Cabinet-level task force assigned to recommend improvements in the government's labor relations with its own employes. He said that overall, the 1962 executive order has worked well. New cooperation has developed between employes and management and general working conditions have improved in the federal service, he observed.

But while "a great deal of good" has been accomplished under the order, Hallbeck said, collective bargaining in the federal service "hasn't reached its full potential."

Reporters questioning him on the AFL-CIO produced program were John Cramer of the Washington Daily News and Mike Causey of the Washington Post.

TAKE IT FROM a trade unionist, the only hope for peace in the turbulent Middle East is for both sides to meet face-to-face at the bargaining table.

Aharon Becker, secretary-general of Histadrut, the million-member Israel labor federation, told this to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and other union leaders at a luncheon in Washington given in Becker's honor by Meany.

"If this war has any lesson it is that we cannot go back to the conditions that produced it, but must go forward to peace," Becker declared. "That peace can be achieved only, and who knows this better than we do in the trade union movement, if the parties to the conflict sit down together at the conference table and negotiate directly."

Becker said that his country would "gladly welcome any friendly effort to bringing the two sides together," but added that "nothing can take the place of direct commitments, if peace is to be honest and durable."

He noted that the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions in Brussels, with strong support from the AFL-CIO delegation, passed a resolution saying that only direct negotiations can bring about Middle East peace.

Becker, who arrived in the U.S. directly from Mexico where he attended the convention of the Mexican Confederation of Labor (CTM), reported that Mexican unionists took the same stand.

Shortly after the restoration of East Jerusalem, he said that some representative Arab workers met with Becker and told him that they had heard about the wonderful things that Histadrut has accomplished in making a better life and they wanted to join.

Later the Jerusalem Labor Council met and voted the Arabs in on an equal basis. A total of 1,000 joined and Becker expects that 3,000 to 4,000 more will eventually affiliate.

"When the political questions are settled," he said, "and there is no longer military occupation of some areas we hope to bring free trade unionism to all workers within our borders, Jews and Arabs."

Among the plans for East Jerusalem, the old Arab part of the city, Histadrut plans cooperative enterprises in which the Arabs will be invited to participate. Similar programs will be undertaken for Israeli Arabs in other areas of the nation. At least three new hospitals and 75 clinics will be built and many others enlarged.

"We plan a major medical center and a community center to serve the Arab population of the Old City area of reunited Jerusalem," Becker said. "We also plan a civil service college and a sport center in the New City and a series of youth and cultural centers throughout Jerusalem."

Meany praised Histadrut and called it "the spine of democracy in Israel." He welcomed Israeli Ambassador Avraham Harman who replied that he was happy to be there not only as an ambassador but "as a dues-paying member of Histadrut."

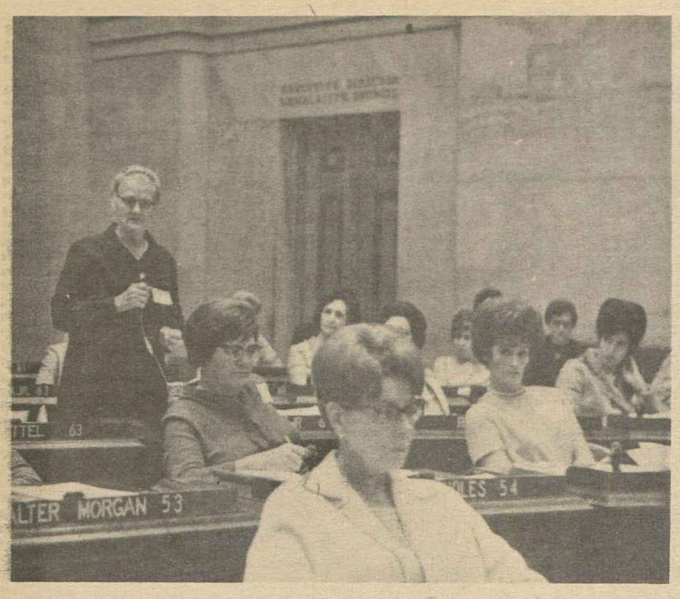
BECKER EXPRESSED his gratitude to the American labor movement for the strong support it has given Histadrut and Israel, particularly during the June war.

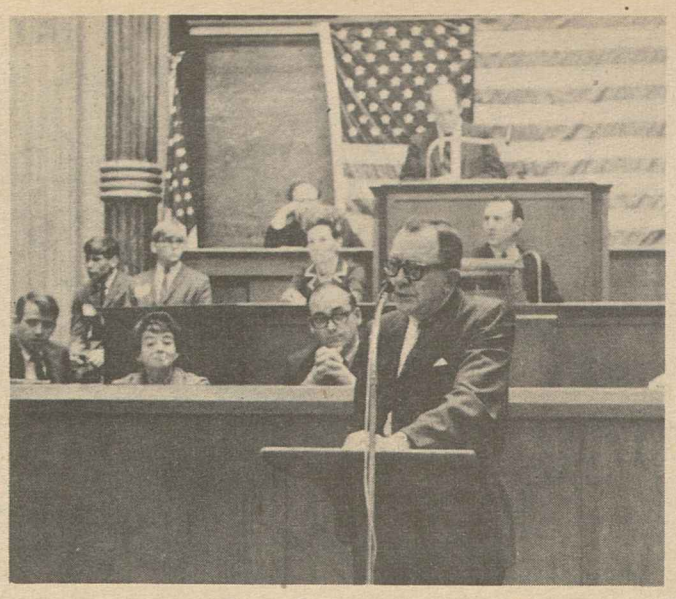
He recalled that the AFL-CIO Executive Council called upon its affiliates to subscribe to an interest-bearing investment loan for the purpose of helping to expand the existing economic enterprises of Histadrut and to set up new ones.

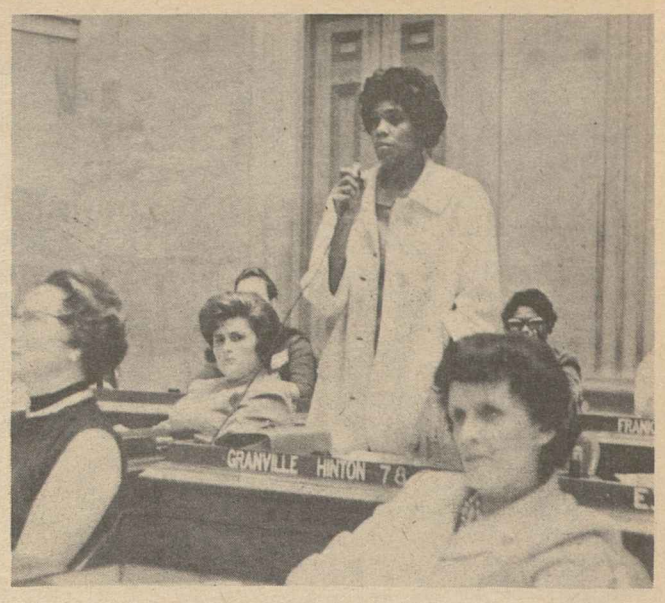
Histadrut's own operations in Israel account for 25 percent of the gross national product and Becker declared, "it must make its contribution to the further development of our national economy."

"That in itself," he added, "would be its own justification, but as a labor movement we are impelled no less by the need to create more employment, more stable and useful jobs for all who seek them, oldtimer and immigrant alike.

A GREAT DEAL of good has been accomplished in five years under the executive order governing collective bargaining for federal employes, Pres. E. C. Hallbeck (center) of the Postal Clerks told reporters John Cramer (left) of the Washington Daily News and Mike Causey of the Washington Post, on Labor News Conference. But Hallbeck, chairman of the AFL-CIO Government Employes Council, added that bargaining in the federal service "hasn't reached its full potential."







MOCK SESSION of the Tennessee legislature in Nashville gave 200 members of Ladies' Garment Workers a better understanding of legislative processes and labor's economic and social goals. In the center picture, COPE Area Dir. Daniel A. Powell speaks. Others identifiable are ILGWU Legislative Rep. Evelyn Dubrow and Dr. Robert Covington of Vanderbilt Law School (seated front), ILGWU Southeast Regional Dir. Martin Morand (behind Powell) and ILGWU Asst. Regional Dir. Ramelle McCoy (presiding). Other pictures show some of the ILGWU members in vigorous debate.

ILG Members Learn How, Show How In Tennessee Legislative 'Session'

Nashville, Tenn.—The state legislature never worked so fast.

In a single afternoon, in the House chamber, bills were passed which:

- Repealed Tennessee's "right-to-work" law.
- Raised unemployment compensation and improved workmen's compensation.
- Barred discrimination in housing.
- Repealed the state sales tax and substituted an income tax.
- Abolished the death penalty.
- Regulated small loan companies.

It was, of course, a mock session and the "legislators" were nearly 200 Tennessee members of the Ladies' Garment Workers sent by their locals to get a first-hand indoctrination into the legislative process.

They first discussed the bills in committee, then took their seats in the House chamber to listen to debate, caucus when necessary, and cast their ballots on the electric rollcall machine.

To assure that both sides of an issue would be presented, "devil's advocates" were assigned where necessary to argue against labor-backed programs.

ILGWU staff members and COPE Area Dir. Daniel Powell were among the legislative experts who helped develop the unique program.

At one point, when the labor caucus didn't have the votes to pass one of its bills, an alliance was formed with a group of Negro legislators pushing for action on an open housing law.

At another stage, delegates mustered the two-thirds majority needed to force a bill out of committee and bring it to the floor for immediate action.

On several of the bills, the session heard "outside witnesses," including a real state legislator, Rep. Charles Galbreath.

Debate on the bills proved an attention-holding method of explaining the working of state programs such as unemployment and workmen's compensation, the difference in impact between sales and income taxes and the pitfalls of small loans.

After the legislative session, the delegates adjourned to a banquet at which Evelyn Dubrow, the ILGWU's Washington legislative representative, was the principal speaker.

She reminded them of major bills in Congress which had failed by a single vote. A union membership that is aware of the nature of government and actively participates in the legislative process is the key to changing a one-vote defeat to a victory, she told the delegates.

They also heard the union's regional director, Martin Morand, point out that there are now only three "working people" in the Tennessee legislature.

The mock session, he said, showed what could happen in a legislature fully representative of the workers of the state.

Fair Housing Leaflet Issued

Fair housing is "absolutely essential" to achieving such accepted goals as desegregated schools and equal opportunity, an AFL-CIO leaflet emphasizes. It is based on testimony given by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany before Congress in August.

Titled "Fair Housing, Exploding the Myths," the bulletin cites a number of in-depth studies to disprove the "ancient superstition" that standards and property values decline when Negroes move into neighborhoods.

The bulletin also describes the "immense backlog of housing needs" for all low income groups. Thus, it concludes, "fair housing" must be developed hand-in-hand with "adequate housing."

"Fair Housing" may be ordered from the AFL-CIO Pamphlet Div., 815 Sixteenth St., N.W., Washington, D. C. 20006. Single copies are free. Rates are three cents per copy in bulk orders up to 100; $2.50 per hundred.

AFL-CIO Sets Schedule for 7th Convention

Dean Rusk; Atty. Gen. Ramsey Clark; Betty Furness, the President's assistant for consumer affairs; Dir. R. Sargent Shriver of the Office of Economic Opportunity; Chairman Harold Russell of the President's Committee on Employment of the Handicapped, and Administrator William Gaud of the Agency for Intl. Development.

Speakers set for Dec. 12 include Dir. William Simkin of the U.S. Mediation & Conciliation Service, NAACP Exec. Dir. Roy Wilkins and Prime Minister Hugh Shearer of Jamaica.

The two fraternal delegates from the British Trades Union Congress, who will address sessions on dates to be announced, are Gen. Sec. Lord Cooper of the National Union of General & Municipal Workers and Assistant Gen. Sec. H. R. Nicholas of the Transport & General Workers Union.

Vice Pres. William Ladyman of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, who also will speak on a date to be set, is the fraternal delegate from the Canadian Labor Congress.

Other AFL-CIO guests scheduled to address the delegates are Sec.-Gen. Aharon Becker of Histadrut, Sec.-Gen. Arturo Jauregui of the Inter-American Regional Organization of Workers (ORIT), Sec.-Gen. Harm Buiter of the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions, and Sec.-Gen. Andre Bergeron of the French Force Ouvriere.

Conventions of the Metal Trades Dept., Nov. 27-28, and the Building & Construction Trades Dept., Nov. 29-Dec. 6, led off a series of meetings by AFL-CIO organizations in addition to the federation's official session.

The schedule also includes conventions of the Union Label & Services Trades Dept., Dec. 4-5, and the Maritime Trades Dept., Dec. 4-6, both of which will meet at the Americana Hotel; the Intl. Labor Press Association, Dec. 3-5, at the Statler-Hilton Hotel in Bal Harbour, and the AFL-CIO Women's Auxiliaries, Dec. 11-13, at the Holiday Inn there.

Oklahoma Crafts Aid Minority Group Youth

Oklahoma City—Minority groups, including Negroes, Indians and Latin-Americans, will be given a helping hand towards apprenticeship opportunities under a program to be launched by the Southwestern Oklahoma Building & Construction Trades Council.

As in similar programs in other sections of the nation, it will be financed in large part by federal funds. It is the latest in a series of "outreach" programs developed cooperatively by building trades unions and civil rights organizations.

Jess Caldwell, former secretary of the Oklahoma State AFL-CIO, will direct the project, with Cecil Williams, Oklahoma director of the NAACP, serving as project co-director.

Working with the local union officials in developing the program were Robert M. McGlotten, representing the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights; Neil MacArthur of the Labor Dept.'s manpower administration, and Charles Mutain of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

The program is aimed at helping youngsters who have met the educational requirements for apprenticeship but who need additional training and guidance to qualify for apprenticeship openings as they come up.

The trades council consists of 52 locals in a 55-county area. Plans are to set up night classes for participants in the program in Oklahoma City and in other locations where there are apprenticeship opportunities.

All of the participating unions currently have non-discriminatory apprenticeship programs. The new program is designed to encourage qualified applicants from minority groups to seek apprenticeship in a skilled trade.

Novik Cited By Education Broadcasters

Denver—M. S. Novik of New York, radio and television consultant to the AFL-CIO was honored here by the National Association of Educational Broadcasters for his contributions to the field of noncommercial radio.

Announcing the presentation of a special plaque to Novik during the NAEB convention, Dir. Jerrold Sandler of National Educational Radio particularly hailed Novik's efforts in helping secure passage of the Public Broadcasting Act of 1967.

Novik was absent when the presentation was made. He left Denver to fly to Washington to attend the White House signing of the new law at the invitation of Pres. Johnson, returning to the NAEB convention following the ceremony.

Marx Toy Strike Begins 7th Month

Erie, Pa.—More than 400 members of the Machinists began their seventh month on the picket line in a strike for better wages against the Marx Toy Co. here.

When the strike started June 1, most workers averaged $1.78 an hour on an incentive plan and the highest hourly-rated worker received $2.32. The company's last offer, 13 weeks after the strike began, was a three-year contract with increases of 5, 6 and 6 cents an hour for incentive workers, 8, 6 and 6 cents for hourly-rated employes.

An injunction limiting picketing enabled the company to bring in strikebreakers and ship out toys made before the strike—in defiance of a company's promise to the union, the IAM said.

The Erie Central Labor Council has backed the strike and urged union families not to buy Marx toys.

Supreme Court Ruling Sought On Rail Award

Three railroad unions have asked the U.S. Supreme Court to reverse a lower court decision holding that the terms of the 1963 compulsory arbitration award continue in effect even though the award expired in 1965.

The District of Columbia U.S. Court of Appeals, in three decisions earlier this year, upheld a District Court ruling that the award created a "new plateau" which can be changed only by bargaining.

The award, issued under a no-strike law passed by Congress, permitted the railroads to eliminate some 20,000 firemen's jobs and provided for special boards that also reduced the size of many train and yard crews.

In their appeals seeking review, the Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen, Railroad Trainmen and Switchmen urged the Supreme Court to rule that with the award's expiration the railroads and unions return to conditions that existed prior to the award.

The Firemen pointed out that if the effect of the award is to continue in its case it will allow the railroads to continuously eliminate firemen through attrition.

The Trainmen and Switchmen, in a joint brief, argued that "both Congress and the arbitration board that rendered the award intended that work rules created by or pursuant to the award were interim rules only."

Labor Editor Tops Sacramento Voting

Sacramento, Calif.—Editor-Manager Richard H. Marriott of the Sacramento Valley Union Labor Bulletin, an AFL-CIO weekly newspaper, is likely to become this city's next mayor.

In the recent election, he topped all candidates for the nine-member city council in winning a fifth term. Traditionally, the council selects its top vote getter as mayor. It will choose on Jan. 2.

'A Time to Act':

U.S. Panel Warns Nation To Listen to Ghetto Voices

Riots in big-city ghettos won't be ended "by a search for culprits or conspirators, or for solutions which do not cost money or effort," the U.S. Civil Rights Commission warns.

"The problems of race and poverty," it emphasizes, "cannot be resolved unless their solutions are made the nation's first priority."

The warning and conclusion are part of an unusual commission report, "A Time to Listen . . . A Time to Act." (Excerpts, Page 9.)

The heart of it—88 of 133 pages—is filled with the bitter voices of those who live in the ghettos. The testimony was taken by the commission and its state affiliates during two years of hearings in 15 cities.

Commission Staff Dir. William L. Taylor said the decision to base the report on testimony from ghetto residents was made because "many white Americans simply do not comprehend" the problems of Negroes, Mexican-Americans and others who live in the slums.

What emerges is an angry, detailed account of "living" where despair, joblessness, hunger, poor housing, sickness, filth and rats are a part of each day's experience.

A Negro resident of a Gary, Ind., slum said her neighborhood was like "a quagmire, a big quicksand. Just like you step in something, you just sink and you can't get out of it."

When a Negro riots, a San Francisco youth declared, he feels that he is "hurting the white man . . . because the white man is the one that is doing everything to you that causes you to have all these problems."

A woman living in a Cleveland slum described a "rat runway" near her apartment building. "They had a recreation center there last year, but after that closed down the rats took over," she testified.

Her son was asked how many rats he thought there were in the "runway." "So many you can't count them," he replied.

Witnesses reported having to trade with "slum merchants" selling shoddy goods at high interest rates. They described "slum landlords" who collect exorbitant rents for unheated, unsanitary dwellings. They told of piled up garbage and lack of public transportation.

There were complaints that education, housing and employment programs have been provided in such a way as to maintain segregation. Ghetto residents felt they were not a part of any local government.

The only symbol of white authority for many was a policeman who was viewed as "keeping Negroes in line on behalf of the white community," the commission said.

A Negro leader in Oakland, Calif., urged white people not to ask "why" disorders occur. "When things blow in the city, people sit back and want to know why, and all the time we're telling you why," he said.

The commission emphasizes that last summer's riots and increasing militancy among Negroes must be viewed in the context of "great frustrations, of laws and programs which promise but do not deliver, of continued deprivation, discrimination and prejudice."

While condemning violence and stressing that law violators "must be punished," the report asserts that the public must begin to understand that the riots "are only the violent manifestations . . . of anger and despair which are widely shared."

It notes that jobs in private industry and in public service are growing rapidly in the suburbs but that these "are often inaccessible to Negroes because of housing practices of government and the housing industry."

It scores the federal government for failing to meet the housing needs of low and moderate income families and for having "often acquiesced in the decisions of local authorities to locate public housing in the tightly restricted areas of the ghetto."

Housing Bias

Discriminatory practices by real estate brokers, builders and mortgage lenders, "unrestrained by any effective government regulation," continue to confine Negroes "of all income levels" to ghetto areas, the report adds.

Comparing the plight of Negroes with early American immigrants who were able to leave the ghettos is "misleading and dangerous," the commission warns.

The educational demands of a technological society and discrimination "facilitated by the visibility of the Negro's skin color" have made his barriers far worse than those faced by the Irish, Italians, Poles or Jews, it concluded.

Boost in Benefits Urged For Dock, Ship Injuries

The AFL-CIO and the Administration urged Congress to improve workmen's compensation protection for the 1 million workers covered by the Longshoremen's & Harbor Workers' Compensation Act.

Affected are longshoremen and ship repair workers injured on board a ship, all non-government employes in the District of Columbia and several other specialized groups, including Post Exchange employes and civilians employed at overseas military bases.

AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. F. Howard McGuigan and Assistant Sec. of Labor Esther Peterson told a Senate Labor subcommittee that the present benefit ceiling of $70, established in 1961, is much too low.

The Administration bill would raise the ceiling to $105 a week and McGuigan urged the subcommittee to consider raising it even further.

To provide the great majority of workers with compensation equal to at least two-thirds of lost wages, the maximum should be raised at least to $115, McGuigan said, and an even higher amount would be justified. McGuigan testified also on behalf of the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept. and the Marine & Shipbuilding Workers.

Both McGuigan and Mrs. Peterson strongly endorsed a feature of the proposed legislation that would provide benefits at 75 percent of lost wages, up to the $105 ceiling, for injured workers with one or more dependents. The rate would remain two-thirds of lost pay for workers without dependents.

The bill also would raise the minimum benefit from $18 to $35 a week and lift some of the present restrictions on total benefits and duration of benefits. It would make other reforms, including a requirement that an employer pay reasonable attorney fees for a worker who has had to go to court to collect a justified claim. The time limit for filing claims would be waived in cases where an injury or occupational illness does not manifest itself immediately—as in the case of radiation exposure.

McGuigan noted that government employes in the District of Columbia are paid under the more generous Federal Employes Compensation Act.

Thus, he pointed out, a printer in the Government Printing Office making $180 a week would receive benefits of $120 if injured on the job, while a printer in a commercial shop a few blocks away would be entitled to only $70 under present law and $105 under the proposed law. "Injured workmen simply cannot understand the reason for this discrepancy," he told the subcommittee.

Mrs. Peterson said the outdated $70 ceiling has meant that about three-fourths of the injured workers covered by the Longshoremen's law receive less than two-thirds of their lost pay.

Senate Votes Pay Hike For Federal Employes

the armed forces. It would increase base pay 5.6 percent, retroactive to Oct. 1. But since subsistence and quarters allowances would remain the same, total compensation would go up only 4.5 percent.

The bill also provides that in the future the armed forces will automatically receive pay raises equal to those provided for civilian government employes.

Both bills now go to House-Senate conference.

In another pay area, Congress passed stopgap legislation to enable the Office of Economic Opportunity and the Agency for Intl. Development to meet payrolls for another week while awaiting appropriations.

The 7,000 employes of the two agencies had received only half-pay for their work because of the funding crisis. Supplementary paychecks were being issued to make up the differences.

Truth-in-Lending

A truth-in-lending bill cleared the House Banking & Currency Committee. But supporters of a strong bill lost their fight to include in the interest disclosure legislation revolving credit accounts commonly used by department stores. The committee voted to let stores use lower-sounding monthly interest rates instead of annual rates for revolving accounts. A similar provision is in the Senate-passed bill.

The revolving credit battle is expected to be resumed on the House floor when the bill is up for a vote. That is not expected to take place until the second session.

Rep. Leonor K. Sullivan (D-Mo.), who led the fight for a strong bill, said she will also urge the House to drop an exemption for transactions in which credit charges are less than $10.

One major change made by the House committee limits garnishment of wages to not more than 10 percent of a worker's pay after excluding the first $30 of his weekly earnings.

This would mean that a worker earning $100 a week could not have more than $7 a week attached to meet a debt.

The House bill is also stronger than the Senate measure in requiring disclosure of interest rates in "true" annual terms in advertisements containing specific references to credit terms.

A merchant could still advertise "low terms" or "easy credit." But he could no longer advertise 1.5 percent a month credit charge. The advertisement would have to translate the figure to 18 percent a year.

Pact Ratified, NABET Ends Network Strike

New York—Members of the Broadcast Employes returned to their jobs with the American Broadcasting Co. after ratifying a new four-year contract ending a strike that began Sept. 22.

The ratification vote, on a settlement reached with aid of federal mediators, was 906 to 260. Balloting was completed in time for NABET members to return to work at 12:01 a.m. Nov. 25 at the five ABC stations involved in the dispute: Chicago, Los Angeles, New York, San Francisco and Washington.

The contract provides for a wage increase in six-month increments totaling $43 a week over the life of the contract for Group 2 engineers, the largest group of covered employes.

Wage improvements for non-technicians, in other groups, will be applied on a percentage basis equivalent to the wage schedules of the engineers.

Other gains include improvements in scheduling of assignments, holidays, and sick leave, plus a two-step reduction in the workweek, cutting it from the present 40 hours to 36.25 in 1969.

Postage Hike Eased For Union Papers

The Senate voted to roll back the sharp 60 percent increase in postage rates imposed by the House on non-profit publications, including union newspapers.

The Intl. Labor Press Association has said the House bill would have priced many publications out of operation or forced them to drastic cutbacks.

Under an amendment by Sen. Frank Carlson (R-Kan.), which the Senate approved 52-38, the increase in the minimum per-piece rate for non-profit publications with less than 10 percent advertising would be 20 percent and achieved in three annual steps. This is approximately the percentage increase set for commercial, profit-making publications.

A House-Senate conference will have to resolve the differences between the two bills.

Court Upholds Union Rights In Universities

Ann Arbor, Mich.—Employes of Michigan's state universities have the right to organize and bargain collectively, Circuit Court Judge William F. Ager, Jr., ruled here.

At issue was whether the state universities are covered by the state's Public Employment Relations Act.

The University of Michigan, Central Michigan University and Eastern Michigan University had challenged the right of the State Labor Mediation Board to act on representation petitions filed by the State, County & Municipal Employes and other unions seeking bargaining rights for university employes.

The three universities contended that the law infringed on the prerogatives of the University of Michigan's Regents and the Boards of Control of the two other universities.

Judge Ager rejected the contention, declaring that the grants of power to the Regents and control boards were not an exemption from all laws passed by the legislature.

He stressed that the law deals with the rights of employes and the only compulsion on the university is to meet with unions representing university employes.

In dismissing the case, he cited a Supreme Court decision declaring that a state university "is not an island."

A. L. Zwerdling, attorney for the State-County union, said the "landmark" decision means that "these public employes have the same rights as all others in Michigan and that there are no second class citizens under this law."

From Planning to Action:

Meany Spurs Labor On Model Cities Role

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany called on organized labor in the 65 communities chosen for federal planning grants under the model cities program to use labor's full resources to translate planning into action.

Planning, Meany noted in a letter to each AFL-CIO central body in the cities affected, is only the first step toward a "vital program designed to develop a total attack on the social, economic and physical problems in slum and blighted areas."

"The main thrust of this program," he observed, "is to link projects and activities designed to develop human resources with those aimed to improve the physical environment. The program places major emphasis on meeting the needs of the families and individuals in slum and blighted neighborhoods for jobs, education and training, health and social services."

He called on the central labor bodies "to enlist the fullest participation of the labor movement in this strategically important program" and to establish "a working and consultative relationship" with local officials responsible for carrying it on.

Meany also urged that central body committees on housing, education and community services "devote their special and urgent attention to this task, with special emphasis on housing and planning, education and training, and social services in their respective fields."

He noted that the AFL-CIO had been active in initiating the model cities program and had helped in its enactment by Congress.

"I am confident that organized labor . . . will do its part . . . in this concentrated and fundamental effort to deal with the basic problems of your city," he declared.

The cities selected for the first federal grants were chosen from nearly 200 which submitted plans to rehabilitate entire neighborhoods through an arsenal of federally-assisted programs.

A much bigger start on the model cities program had been planned by the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development. But the first round of grants had to be sharply curtailed when Congress appropriated less than half the money Pres. Johnson had requested for the program.

HUD Sec. Robert C. Weaver said the cities chosen "have an incredible diversity and complexity of problems."

Doesn't Measure Up

Staff Programs Set Up To Aid Copper Strikers

Two key departments of the AFL-CIO, acting under instructions of Federation Pres. George Meany, are setting up intensive programs to assist the 60,000 strikers in the non-ferrous metals industry.

Twenty-two AFL-CIO unions are involved in the strike, which has been in progress for almost six months.

William L. Kircher, director of the Dept. of Organization, has alerted regional offices in each affected area to step up their support of the strike. The regional heads have been instructed to mobilize the AFL-CIO central bodies in each area so that their members, and community opinion-makers, can be rallied behind the union effort.

"There is no doubt that the struggle of these workers for simple justice will win the sympathy of the community if the facts are made known," Kircher said. "This is a clear-cut case of rich and powerful corporations standing pat on a totally inadequate contract proposal, counting on their wealth to win out.

"As always in the labor movement, our counter-weapon is unity. And we are going to make sure that weapon is fully and effectively used."

CSA Assists

Leo Perlis, director of Community Services Activities for the federation, has instructed his top field staff to tour strike sites, making sure there is full liaison between the unions and the state and local welfare agencies.

"These strikers, like everyone else, are entitled to the services of many community agencies," Perlis noted. "But despite great progress in that direction in recent years, there are still communities in which neither the striker nor the agencies realize this.

"We will see to it that the strikers and their families get all the help they have a right to receive.

"As Mr. Meany said: no striker is going to starve. And you can be sure that Santa Claus will not miss any of their children at Christmas."

Meany had earlier announced the establishment of an AFL-CIO fund-raising campaign to aid the strikers will be a first order of business at the Dec. 6 meeting of the federation's Executive Council.

Buying Power Dips, Prices Continue Rise

The purchasing power of the nation's rank and file workers dropped slightly between September and October and remains a little lower than a year ago, the Labor Dept. has reported.

In a companion report, the Labor Dept. also said the cost of living rose by three-tenths of 1 percent in October, up 2.6 percent from a year ago. Consumer prices rose on many items except for farm products and foods, which declined.

The food price decline caused a drop of one-tenth of 1 percent in the Wholesale Price Index, which is regarded as an advance indicator, the report added. Preliminary data for November show the WPI unchanged from October as farm products and foods dropped an additional six-tenths of 1 percent, the Labor Dept. noted.

The report on earnings showed that take-home pay—gross earnings less social security and federal income tax deductions—averaged $84.74 for the single worker and $92.29 for the worker with a wife and two children.

These October after-tax earnings were down by 13 cents from September for the factory production worker with three dependents. The earnings were $2.20 higher than a year ago.

But when the spendable earnings are reduced by the rise in the cost of living, the worker's "real spendable earnings" or purchasing power shows a slight decline.

"Measured in 1957-59 dollars," said the Labor Dept. report, "the weekly take-home pay of the worker with three dependents was $78.54, 14 cents less than in October 1966.

"Price increases and a decline in the length of the workweek have offset boosts in hourly earnings."

The report on the cost of living showed the Consumer Price Index advancing to 117.5 in October, up from September's 117.2. This means the market basket of goods and services that cost $10 in the 1957-59 base period now costs $11.75.

Prices rose along a wide front, except for foods. New car prices went up with the introduction of 1968 models. Apparel prices advanced strongly, especially on women's and girls' apparel as consumer demand enabled manufacturers and retailers to raise prices, the report observed. Appliance prices were higher.

The actual rise in auto manufacturers' prices averaged $87.54, or three and three-fourths percent, for the 15 domestic makes of new cars listed in the Wholesale Price Index, the Labor Dept. said. After analyzing the major changes in the 1968 models, the Labor Dept. attributed $29.65 of the rise to safety improvements and $11.20 to changes aimed at reducing air pollutants.

Medical Costs Rise

Charges for consumer services continued upward, rising three-tenths of 1 percent. Charges for medical care rose five-tenths of 1 percent.

The rise in the October CPI means cost-of-living increases under union contracts for about 575,000 workers. Some 380,000 electrical workers will receive a 1 percent hike because of the rise from a year ago. For 100,000 auto, aerospace and metalworkers, the rise will be 2 cents an hour and for 75,000 aerospace workers, 3 cents an hour, on the basis of a quarterly adjustment. Other workers will get hikes ranging from 1 to 7 cents an hour.

Meany Firmly Opposes Blanket Budget Slashes

cut plan the force of law by including it in the tax legislation.

Meany said in his statement:

"The AFL-CIO is firmly opposed to a meat-ax approach to budget cutting. We believe each budget item should be considered on its merits and should be adequately funded in order to meet its avowed purpose.

"The AFL-CIO just as firmly believes that America can afford to continue to defend freedom in Viet Nam and solve the problem of its cities and its poverty-stricken citizens. We have repeatedly said that we are prepared to pay our fair share of the costs and we reiterate that pledge.

"What America needs is a total revamping of the nation's tax structure in order to make it fair and equitable and to insure that certain wealthy citizens and highly profitable business interests are no longer provided special tax privileges.

"We have submitted to the Congress an emergency tax proposal that is fair and equitable and will provide the nation with the immediate income it needs to fight both the wars for freedom and against poverty.

"The answer is not to cut the already meager funds for education, welfare, hospital building and all the other necessary public functions that would be adversely hit by an across-the-board budget slash."

Although Fowler and a number of other top government officials termed the need for a tax rise urgent. Mills said before the session got under way that he believed it would be "impossible" to pass a tax bill this year.

House Republican Leader Gerald R. Ford (Mich.), who will have a lot to say about whether the dominant conservative coalition will support a tax rise, expressed doubt that higher taxes will halt inflation. He said a $5 billion spending cut would be "preferable" to the Administration's proposal.

The Administration's present willingness to tie a tax rise to spending cuts was a major victory for the House conservative coalition which succeeded in winning House approval of—but not Senate concurrence in—a resolution instructing the President to cut the budget.

Fowler said Britain's devaluation of the pound and the run on gold by international speculators were "significant" new reasons for higher taxes.

Senate Passes Labor-Backed Pure Meat Bill to obtain a court order shutting down any plant found dangerous to health—without waiting for the two-year deadline.

The section in the Senate bill which the meat industry lobby is most anxious to knock out in conference permits the governor of a state immediately to request full federal inspection of all meat produced in his state.

Senate Republican Leader Everett Dirksen spoke against this provision during the Senate debate, but made no effort to knock it out of the bill.

Only Two Against

The only votes against the bill co-sponsored by Senators Joseph M. Montoya (D-N.M.) and Walter F. Mondale (D-Minn.) came from the two Georgia senators, who held firm to a "states' rights" argument that the wholesomeness of meat sold within a state is no concern of the federal government.

Against this argument, Mondale put into the record the actual reports of trained government representatives who visited plants exempt from federal inspection and found meat from diseased animals being processed in filthy, vermin-ridden surroundings lacking even minimum sanitary facilities.

Not even national brand names are assurance of wholesome meat, he told the Senate, since the industry's biggest packers also operate plants exempt from inspection. The uninspected plant, he noted, has a competitive advantage because it "can buy inferior animals, dress up bad meat with chemicals, and use cheap fillers with impunity."

5 Unionists on Job Training Task Force

Five union officials have been named to a special government task force to study private industry's job training role and recommend ways that the federal government can assist in the development of training programs.

The 17-member task force was named jointly by Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz and Commerce Sec. Alexander B. Trowbridge. Its members were drawn from business, labor, agriculture and academic fields.

Task force members from unions include Carpenters Vice Pres. Finlay Allan; AFL-CIO Education Dir. Walter Davis; Frank Fernbach, assistant to the president of the Steelworkers; West Virginia State AFL-CIO Pres. Miles C. Stanley, and Anthony Weinlein, research director of the Building Service Employes.

Chairman of the task force is Dr. Vivian W. Henderson, president of Clark College, Atlanta, Ga.

Federation Is 'Main Force' For Progress, Meany Says

Executive Council Reports:

Solid Gains Scored, Challenges Persist

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Two solid years of achievement on the trade union front have highlighted the period since 1965, the AFL-CIO Executive Council reported to the federation's seventh constitutional convention.

But on the legislative and political fronts there has been only limited improvement and frustration and basic challenges still confront the nation at home and abroad, the council declared.

The 29-member council reviewed the two-year period in 15 major sections of a 353-page report which includes a highlighting of the major areas of concern by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and a detailed financial and membership report by Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler.

The report covers developments in the labor movement and sections of the national economy, international relations, social security, the worker and the community, housing and urban affairs, civil rights, labor and the law, national and state legislation, political activities and reports by the headquarters departments and trade and industrial union departments.

Meany reported that current conditions require of trade unionists a need for achievement that "is even more crucial" now than when the federation last met. Placing the blame for dimming of the "bright promise of 1965" on the 90th Congress, he declared "we must work in the elections of 1968 to restore to Congress the liberalism, idealism and determination necessary to achieve a better nation and a better world."

More victories are necessary in both the struggle against poverty at

Labor Hails U.S. Wage Board Plan

Unions will have a bigger voice in setting the wages of the federal government's 800,000 blue collar workers under a new procedure announced by the Civil Service Commission with the approval of Pres. Johnson.

The new coordinated federal wage system was developed in close consultation with a special AFL-CIO committee and Federation Pres. George Meany gave it a strong endorsement.

"Most of the inequities that occurred in the past in the establishment of prevailing wage rates for federal wage board workers will be eliminated by the new program," Meany said. "Wider opportunities are provided for genuine, meaningful participation by AFL-CIO affiliates representing these workers."

Salaries of federal white collar, professional and postal employes are set by Congress. But blue collar workers are paid the prevail-

Congress Steps Up Pace:

Meat Bill Approved, Poverty Vote Nears

A speed-up of legislative activity saw Congress clear and send to the White House a strong meat inspection bill and move toward final action on a two-year $4.1 billion continuation of the anti-poverty program.

In other major areas, the Senate pressed debate on the three-year $14.5 billion program of aid to education; House and Senate negotiators were compromising differences on the multi-billion dollar social security package; and the House cleared for the President's signature bills to continue adult education programs and to ban job discrimination based on age.

The meat inspection bill represented a big victory for consumer groups and organized labor. After Senate and House conferees agreed on a strict timetable to wipe out unsanitary conditions and adulterated meat in intra-state operations, Pres. Johnson hailed their action as "another victory for the American consumer."

"This bill will help guarantee to every American family that the meat on their table and in their stores and supermarkets will be safe and fit for human consumption," said the President.

The course of the nation's war on poverty was altered, perhaps significantly, as House and Senate conferees finally reached basic agreement after 11 sessions spanning two weeks.

The conference accepted a House amendment which would permit local officials to take charge of community action programs now run by private agencies and the U.S. Office of Economic Opportunity as of Feb. 1, 1969.

But the conferees agreed on a level of appropriations closer to what the Senate had voted earlier. They approved a two-year extension, authorizing $1.98 billion for

'More Vital, Vigorous Than Ever'

By Saul Miller

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO is "the vital main force of the progressive movement in America" and is better equipped and prepared today to deal with its own and society's problems than ever before.

This was the theme of Federation Pres. George Meany's "state of the union" keynote speech to the AFL-CIO's seventh convention here, a theme that won the resounding approval of the nearly 950 delegates.

Reviewing the history of the labor movement in the U.S. and the specific accomplishments and programs of the AFL-CIO, Meany asserted that "the trade union movement is a more vital, a more vigorous and a more effective force for progress today than ever before in its history."

There never before has been "more real unity of spirit and purpose, in substance as well as form," he declared, and never has the federation been as active "through so many channels in the pursuit of human progress" as today.

The federation president told the applauding delegates that the record will bear out the leading role of the AFL-CIO "in virtually any area of social concern that might be named," adding:

"I am proud of that record. I do not like to see it downgraded or misrepresented."

And again:

"Without the AFL-CIO very little would be done."

Meany took note of critics of the Council Sets Up Fund To Aid Copper Strikers

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO Executive Council rallied the entire labor movement behind 60,000 copper workers on strike for their economic lives and established a special nonferrous metals strike fund with an initial contribution of $50,000 from the AFL-CIO itself.

In a strong statement of support, the council said "we call upon every affiliated national and international union, every state and local central body and every directly affiliated local union to multiply this sum—the AFL-CIO contribution—"by prompt and generous contributions."

Pointing out that "major employers in the nonferrous metals industry have for six months been waging an aggressive war against their workers and the 22 AFL-CIO unions which represent them," council members said:

"This struggle will ultimately be won by the determination of the strikers who are waging it. But it is the obligation of the labor movement as a whole to insure that those who man the picket lines, and their families, are protected from economic catastrophe.

"This is an obligation we will meet. To that end we urge all in the AFL-CIO to respond promptly to this appeal."

The council added: "It is clear that the employers who provoked

Oklahomans Rebuff R-T-W Petition Bid

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Oklahoma voters once again told the National Right to Work Committee they want no part of a proposal to outlaw the union shop—and the news launched the AFL-CIO convention here on what Pres. George Meany termed "a particularly happy note."

It was the second time in less than four years that Oklahomans had rebuffed a massively-financed "right-to-work" campaign.

In 1964, a "right-to-work" proposition was put on a statewide referendum ballot through an initiative petition—and then turned down by the voters after a bitter campaign.

This year, even though paid solicitors were used, the "right-to-work" sponsors were unable to get the 104,000 signatures required within the three-month time limit. They first claimed sufficient signatures, but the Oklahoma secretary of state did a name count and rejected the petitions as insufficient.

The news flashed by word of mouth through the corridors of the AFL-CIO convention hotels here and Meany spoke for the delegates in congratulating the leadership and membership of the Oklahoma

Puerto Rico's Governor Hails Island's Labor Ties

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The government of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico "counts itself among the few in the world that have fully, openly and consistently supported the overall objectives of organized labor," Gov. Roberto Sanchez-Villela told the Maritime Trades convention here.

"You and we have far more in common than common economics," Sanchez said. "We both work for our members—you for trade unionists, we for 2.7 million Puerto Ricans. We share a common aim: our peoples' welfare.

"Among us, as among you, the most important segment, the most important factor is the working class. Like your unions, our heart is with the man trying to get ahead and make a decent living."

After 27 years the Puerto Rican government can, he said, "point with pride to a solid record of pro-labor and social legislation" sponsored by the Popular Democratic Party. To live and prosper, the commonwealth and the maritime unions must cooperate, Sanchez said, in making Puerto Rican - U.S. trade a "two-way street." Island people are the "biggest consumers of U.S. goods" outside the mainland, he declared.

Santiago Polanco-Abreu, resident commissioner from Puerto Rico, reported that Puerto Rico needs and depends on an efficient maritime service and "we are getting it . . . from the great maritime unions of the U.S."

Landrum-Griffin Study Declares It 'Bad Law'

Bal Harbour, Fla.—A committee of 21 experienced lawyers reported after a study that the Landrum-Griffin Act constitutes "bad law" compounded by instances of "administrative abuses" by the Labor Dept. and court interpretations "at odds with the language of the law and the intent of Congress."

The study, titled "A Report after Eight Years of the Landrum-Griffin Act," was made public by the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept. and its president, Paul Hall of the Seafarers. Hall called it a "historic document" which will be followed by other reports on the subject.

The committee was established last February by the department and consists of lawyers representing AFL-CIO unions. Howard Schulman was chairman, with AFL-CIO Gen. Counsel J. Albert Woll and Sol G. Lippman as co-chairmen.

It examined "hundreds of cases of the law's application" to compare the way in which the law has been administered and interpreted with the language of the act and the intent of Congress, the department announced.

Among the committee's findings were these:

While the L-G Act was "intended to provide safeguards" for the constitutional rights of workers, it has the "built-in potential to violate rights guaranteed" by the Fourth Amendment to the Constitution.

The Fourth Amendment provides protection against illegal search and seizure, yet L-G "encourages precisely this illegality by putting both administrative and police powers in the hands of the same agency."

The act permits the Labor Dept. to delegate its investigatory rights to the Justice Dept., which "under the guise of conducting routine investigations of union activity" acquires power to conduct surreptitious searches. This exercise of power "violates basic concepts of fair play and places in jeopardy traditional constitutional safeguards," the lawyers said.

The committee noted that Landrum - Griffin permits prosecution, conviction and imprisonment under both federal and state laws for the same offense. It called this "vindictive and punitive" since it constitutes conduct similar to "double jeopardy."

The report commended the Labor Dept. for good administration of the law in some instances. Also it cited cases where Labor Dept. agents "violated both the letter and spirit of the law by openly soliciting individuals to file charges against unions" under the act—a direct law violation, the lawyers said.

Some courts have held that L-G confers unusual rights on individuals, "permitting them openly to slander and libel other individuals under the guise of freedom of speech." In so doing they abandoned past rules of reason which put restraints on the abuse of free speech, the report said.

Maritime Trades Endorse Plan To Link Transportation Unions

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept. voted an enthusiastic endorsement to a call for a national conference of unions in the transportation industry.

Its purpose: to give labor a single loud, clear voice to speak to both government and management in the increasingly interwoven transportation field.

Delegates to the MTD convention, representing AFL-CIO unions with more than 6 million members, unanimously approved a resolution urging that a meeting be held early in 1968 to set up a permanent organization. The eventual goal, the resolution declared, is a new AFL-CIO department "bringing together all of the unions concerned with transportation."

Initiative for the conference call came from Pres. C. L. Dennis of the Railway & Airline Clerks.

Dennis, MTD Pres. Paul Hall and other union presidents attending the convention spoke for the proposal, stressing that the transportation industry has been the chief target of compulsory arbitration proposals and that the ties linking the shipping and airline industries are tightening.

"The national trend toward corporate bigness is accentuated in transportation, where the goal seems to be corporate giantism," Dennis said. He predicted that railroads, airlines and shipping companies will in the future become "transportation companies," with "mergers on top of mergers" throughout the industry.

Backed by Hall

Hall strongly backed the proposal, noting that different segments of the labor movement deal with the same federal agencies and regulatory bodies.

It would not compete with the Maritime Trades Dept., Hall stressed. "It would make us stronger because it would help each and every one of us."

The MTD convention strongly reaffirmed its dedication to a rebuilding of a modern merchant marine—built in American yards, flying the American flag and capable of carrying a big share of the nation's commerce.

This goal has the vigorous support of the AFL-CIO, Federation Pres. George Meany told the delegates.

Meany termed the decline of the U.S. merchant marine to about one-fifth of its strength after World War II "a national disgrace" stemming from "a stupid policy."

He said "public money could not be spent for a better cause" than rebuilding the merchant marine. And in the long run, Meany added, it would be less costly than "crash programs" every time the nation faces a shipping crisis.

Sen. Warren Magnuson (D-Wash.), chairman of the Senate Commerce Committee, headed a parade of congressmen and senators who came to the convention to pledge their continued support for a labor - backed shipbuilding program and an independent Maritime Administration.

"A massive undertaking to revitalize the American merchant marine should be a matter of utmost priority," Magnuson declared.

Celler Speaks

House Judiciary Committee Chairman Emanuel Celler (D-N.Y.) said Congress is determined "that the United States will be able to take its rightful place among the maritime leaders of the world."

Other speakers—and convention resolutions—hammered at government tolerance of "runaway flag" shipping, criticized proposals to build U.S. ships in foreign yards and urged federal subsidies to develop the world's first nuclear-powered merchant fleet.

The convention dealt with a broad range of issues—from a strong endorsement of the American commitment in Viet Nam, to consumer legislation, the crisis of the cities and the battle against "poverty and intolerance."

Labor's political role was stressed both in convention resolutions and in a major address by Philadelphia's recently re-elected Mayor James H. J. Tate.

Tate said he came to the convention to tell the story of what the labor movement can do politically when it unites, when it is aroused, and when the cause is right.

He told the delegates how he had gone into both the Democratic primary and general election as an underdog, opposed by two-thirds of the old guard Democratic ward leaders.

Labor was in his corner, but the party organization considered labor a "paper tiger" politically.

The election results proved, Tate said, that when political "muscle" is needed, "labor still has it."

Important as was the Philadelphia election, Tate stressed, "the 1968 election will be even more important—for the nation and for the world."

The all-out labor political effort must be duplicated in the congressional and presidential elections, Tate urged, "if organized labor is to continue in its role as champion of the people."

The convention heard also from maritime industry spokesmen who emphasized the common concern of labor and management for the future of the merchant marine and from government officials, including Maritime Administrator James Gulick, Federal Mediation & Conciliation Dir. William E. Simkin and Vice Adm. L. P. Ramage, commander of the Military Sea Transport Service.

Collective bargaining in the United States "is doing a very good job," Simkin told the delegates.

Over the last seven years, he said, statistics show "that the average guy loses a day on strike in over two years in time . . . that is a pretty small price to pay for freedom."

Mediators Praised

Hall responded with praise for federal mediators and a declaration that the maritime industry would have been much better off if more use had been made of this type of third-party assistance to bargaining rather than the "permanent umpire" type of arbitration.

Ramage told the convention that American merchant seamen have "never failed" the armed forces in any emergency.

Just as the nation must have "a Navy adequate to defend all our national interest," the admiral said, so must it have a strong merchant fleet. He added:

"We must have the capacity for carrying a sizable proportion of our international commerce. We must be free of a major reliance on foreign shipping."

The MTD closed its three-day convention with the unanimous re-election of its three top officers: Pres. Paul Hall, Executive Sec.-Treas. Peter M. McGavin, and Vice Pres. Jack McDonald.

PRES. PAUL HALL of the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept. is shown as he introduced Federation Pres. George Meany to the department convention in Bal Harbour, Fla. At left is Department Executive Sec.-Treas. Peter M. McGavin. Meany told delegates the decline of the American merchant marine "springs from a stupid policy" of the government and is a "national disgrace that can't be justified."

Lowering of Standards Barred:

Solid Stand Against Job Bias Adopted by Building Trades

By Eugene A. Kelly

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Delegates from AFL-CIO Building Trades unions voted unanimously here that "we wholeheartedly support apprenticeship programs and selection procedures which are nondiscriminatory, uniform and fair."

Members of 18 unions representing 3.5 million building tradesmen in the U.S. and Canada made it clear that "we oppose and will not tolerate discrimination." The delegates also emphasized that while favoring efforts to encourage the entry of minority-group members into the skilled trades, they will continue to oppose any lowering of the standards each trade has maintained over the years for the admission of new members.

The 54th convention of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. acted on the subject of hiring practices and apprentice training regulations in two resolutions affirming that:

- The department endorses generally the "principle of affirmative action to assist Negroes and other minority group persons in finding suitable employment" and invites Labor Dept. officials to "discuss the matter in depth" with B&CTD representatives "in the hope that sources of conflict may be diminished and a higher degree of cooperation obtained."
- Delegates condemn the use by the Office of Federal Contract Compliance, a Labor Dept. agency, of such a formula as "minority representation in every craft in every phase of the work" on every federal building project. Such formulas are "often impossible of fulfillment and destructive of working conditions and performance standards."
- The construction unions call on contractors to join in opposing such "unrealistic approaches and unsound formulas which could destroy the efficiency and flexibility of an industry which historically has met the needs of the country in war and peace" and "can continue to meet those needs totally and without discrimination."

A convention committee drafted a resolution detailing labor's objections to proposed regulations for federal apprentice training programs which find the unions "guilty before trial" of discriminatory practices, and destroy the voluntary character of training programs supported by Building Trades unions and the contractors who hire their members.

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, a convention speaker, said he had read the resolution on the proposed changes and "while I don't go along with everything" in the department's list of objections, "I think it is an error" to talk in terms of "one or more Negroes or whites or anybody else as being required" on every single construction job.

Wirtz said he will talk further about the apprenticeship rules at a January meeting with a departmental committee of union presidents.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, noting that the federation has a policy against racial discrimination "to which I completely subscribe," said he was "quite sure" the Building Trades Dept. adheres to that policy. In today's world, which is largely non-white, it is "just a matter of good common sense, as well as a matter of decent human relations, to eliminate discrimination," he declared.

He asked the 255 delegates: "How do you get these new members that they say it is desirable to have? How do you get colored boys into these highly skilled trades? Well, you get them in the way you have always gotten" union members.

Meany's Experience

Meany recalled that he had to pass an examination as a journeyman 50 years ago to join his local union of Plumbers in New York City. He added "I don't mind telling you that I failed the first examination. And it was on the level because my father was president of the union."

Meany said that his father was "just as sore as hell—not at the examining board that turned me down, but at me. And I had to wait six months and serve another six months as an apprentice" before taking another exam.

There is "no other way" to meet the problem of screening untrained applicants for membership than by the apprenticeship route, and "no short cut," the AFL-CIO president declared. "And when we bring them in as apprentices," he asked, "do we lower the standards? I say absolutely no. We do not compromise the standards."

The convention received greetings from Pres. Johnson in a message and heard major addresses from two members of his cabinet—Wirtz and Sec. Robert C. Weaver of the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development. Other speakers included Pres. Paul Hall of the Seafarers, Dir. Donald Slaiman of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights and Deputy Dir. Joseph Rourke of the federation's Committee on Political Education.

Officers Elected

New four-year terms in office were voted without contest for Dept. Pres. C. J. Haggerty and Sec.-Treas. Frank Bonadio, and two-year terms for the department's 10 vice presidents, all top officers of affiliated unions.

Bonadio reported that, since the 1965 convention, the department chartered 22 new councils and issued more than one million quarterly membership cards.

In other actions, the convention voted to support the present Administration policy on Viet Nam but strongly condemned the activities of two government departments—that of the comptroller general for assertedly advising the Atomic Energy Commission and other federal agencies that they need not observe prevailing wage rates set by Wirtz for contractors on federal construction jobs, and the office of Federal Contract Compliance, which was accused of trying to force hiring quotas for a specified number of minority-group members.

Weaver praised Haggerty for welcoming the opportunity to provide workers and to train new workers for the model cities program and others designed to rebuild rundown neighborhoods in 63 "demonstration" cities. Weaver also proposed that organized labor help raise $1 billion to match the amount pledged by U.S. insurance companies to "create new and rehabilitated" housing.

Slaiman reported that in the civil rights area "we are making progress." Building Trades councils and local unions are "taking in large numbers of minority group youngsters into apprenticeable trades," Slaiman said. He cited two examples—120 Negroes and Puerto Ricans were in the graduating class recently of 800 journeymen and apprentices sponsored by New York Local 3 of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers; and the Washington, D.C., Bricklayers local has 800 Negro journeymen in its ranks.

Rourke warned of the need for extensive COPE voter registration drives and the collection of badly needed COPE dollars in coming election campaigns. He said "there are at least 10" friendly senators who could "go down to defeat unless we do the job." He added: "If we lose 30 more congressmen—and it can happen—we'll have the book thrown at us" in the form of punitive laws.

Pres. Thomas J. Murray of the Chicago-Cook County Building & Construction Trades Council gave the oath of office to the top officers and the following vice presidents: M. A. Hutcheson, Carpenters; Peter Fosco, Laborers; Gordon M. Freeman, IBEW; Peter T. Schoeman, Plumbers & Pipefitters; Edward J. Leonard, Plasterers; John H. Lyons, Iron Workers; Russell K. Berg, Boilermakers; Hunter P. Wharton, Operating Engineers; Thomas F. Murphy, Bricklayers and L. M. Raftery, Painters.

League Presses Consumer Aid In Minnesota

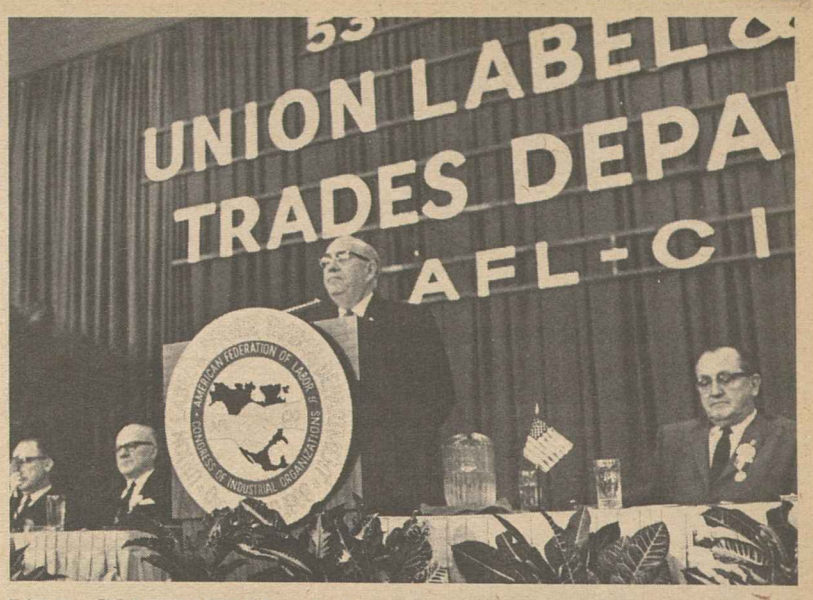
Minneapolis — Delegates to the annual Minnesota Consumers League Congress here voted to press for new consumer protection in the state legislature.

The league urged new laws to cover meat inspection, auto safety, credit practices and curbs on employment agencies — with a new state consumer department to enforce them.

The league also voted to affiliate with the Consumer Federation of America, established by a recent Consumer Assembly in Washington sponsored by 63 national organizations, including the AFL-CIO. Its purpose is to give consumer groups "a single voice" in seeking consumer legislation.

Among speakers at the congress were Betty Furness, the President's assistant for consumer affairs, and Bronson LaFollette, Wisconsin attorney general and chairman of the President's Consumer Advisory Council.

The league re-elected Mrs. Tobey Lapakko, St. Paul, as its president and Neil Sherburne, Minnesota AFL - CIO secretary - treasurer, as vice president.



53RD CONVENTION of the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept. is convened by Pres. Richard J. Walsh, with Department Sec.-Treas. Joseph Lewis at his side, right. The department reported that more than 3 million visitors have seen the annual union-industries show over the decade and that untold millions have received the message on the meaning of the union label, shop card and service button.

Label Trades Mobilize 'Buy Union' Campaign

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The Union Label & Service Trades Dept. of the AFL-CIO called on every segment of organized labor to join in mobilizing the mass purchasing power of union workers behind the union label, shop and store card and service button.

The call came at the 53rd convention of the department. The delegates voted to retain the nine officers who have been at the helm for 10 years and charted a program aimed at uniting all American consumers behind union goods and services and fair employers. Also they voted to intensify Labor's consumer boycott campaign against the Kingsport Press and to continue support for 1,000 strikers in Kingsport, Tenn.

Growth Reported

The convention membership committee reported four new union affiliates since the 1965 convention for a new total of 89, and four new label councils for a new total of 115. The unions are the Railway Clerks, Switchmen, Bricklayers and the Brick & Clay Workers. New label councils are the Connecticut State council and area councils at Watertown, N.Y., Norfolk, Va., and Walla Walla, Wash.

More union labels, shop cards, store cards and service buttons are being used by international unions than ever before, Department Sec.-Treas. Joseph Lewis told the delegates.

There are more union label exhibits of all types in american communities; more conventions have heard the label "gospel" preached by union delegates and more visitors have turned out for the department's annual Union-Industries Show—more than 3 million in the past 10 years, Lewis reported.

The show's reception has been such, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany advised the convention, that department officers might consider the possibility of staging more—two, three or four a year if possible.

Union label promotion "runs to the very beginning of the labor movement," Meany related in congratulating the department on the "tremendous progress" it has made. Labor's founders realized, he said, that the worker's purchasing power could be "used to promote the trade union movement, to promote better wages and working conditions, to use the union label as an indication that the product was produced under decent human working conditions." He added:

"I think it is safe to say that there are more union-made products today than ever. The products are of better quality. The union Label Dept. has made a tremendous contribution."

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler said the department's job "essentially is teaching—a job that unions must step up because of the rapid turnover in new members and the necessity for informing all members of unions' advantages."

Election Held

The convention voted four-year terms for Department Pres. Richard F. Walsh, head of the Stage Employes; Lewis, and these vice presidents: James A. Suffridge, Retail Clerks; John O'Hare, Tobacco Workers; Joseph D. Keenan, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers; Joseph M. McCurdy, United Garment Workers; Arthur P. Gildea, Brewery Workers; Daniel E. Conway, American Bakery & Confectionery Workers, and Anthony J. DeAndrade, Printing Pressmen.

DeAndrade reported that the five unions on strike for more than four years at Kingsport—the Machinists, Stereotypers, Bookbinders, Typographers and Pressmen—have paid out more than $10 million to strikers and their families.

He asked the "entire labor movement to make this fight its fight" and to work through local central body members to convince boards of education not to buy "strikebreaker-made" books.

Convention delegates approved resolutions calling for more widespread participation by union families in union label work, voter registration and election campaigns, and the AFL-CIO National auxiliaries. They expressed appreciation to the labor press and urged all affiliated unions to take an active part in the next Union-Industries Show in Philadelphia, June 21-26.

Nieman Fellows Cite Labor Press Quality

Miami Beach—The labor press was commended for its "consistency in professional excellence" by Nieman Fellows judging the 1967 Journalistic Awards Contest for the Intl. Labor Press Association.

"One reason behind this achievement," the judges said, "is that the labor press is directing attention to major social, economic and political issues. We welcomed this kind of reporting and analysis, plus layout, pictures and other trimmings that made presentations effective."

At the same time, the Nieman Fellows urged the labor press not to overlook "comprehensive reporting of organized labor affairs, of collective bargaining" and union-management relations.

There were 856 entries in the 1967 competition and the top winners in the "editorial excellence" competition were Steel Labor and IUD Agenda for international publications, a tie between Michigan AFL-CIO News and San Francisco Labor for state and local central body publications, and Voice of 770 (Retail Clerks) and Local 1199 Drug & Hospital News for local publications.

The judges this year were Ken Clawson, national labor reporter for the Toledo Blade; Dewey James, editor of the Florence, S.C., Morning News; Remer Tyson, Washington bureau of the Atlanta Constitution, and James Whelan, Caribbean manager, UPI.

The winners:

International Publications: Editorial excellence, newspaper format, Steel Labor; magazine format, IUD Agenda. Best front page, newspaper format, Steel Labor; magazine format, Canadian Labour. Best single editorial, Labor. Best original cartoon, Seafarers Log. Best feature article, International Fire Fighter. Best regular column. The Train Dispatcher. Best original photograph, Justice.

State & Local Central Bodies Publications: Editorial excellence, newspaper format, Michigan AFL-CIO News and San Francisco Labor. Best front page, newspaper format, Michigan AFL-CIO News. Best single editorial, Michigan AFL-CIO News. Best original cartoon, Los Angeles Citizen. Best feature article, Oregon Labor Press. Best regular column, The Labor World, Chattanooga. Best community project, The Chronicle, Cincinnati.

Local Union Publications: Editorial excellence, newspaper format, Voice of 770; magazine format, 1199 Drug & Hospital News. Best front page, newspaper format, The United Teacher; magazine format, No. 1 News (Chicago Building Service Employes). Best single editorial, 32B (New York Building Service Employes). Best original cartoon, 32B. Best feature article, Voice of 770. Best regular column, Overture (Hollywood Musicians). Best original photograph, Southwest Labor (Arkansas Meat Cutters). Best community project, Voice of 770.

EEOC Publishes Document Index

The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission has published a 650-page Document and Reference Text (DART), providing an index to some 5,000 documents dealing with employment of Negroes, Indians, Spanish-Americans, Oriental-Americans, and women.

EEOC Chairman Clifford L. Alexander, Jr. described the volume as "an invaluable source for everyone concerned with equal employment problems and their solutions."

DART may be ordered from Research Division, Institute of Labor & Industrial Relations, University of Michigan-Wayne State University, P.O. Box 1567, Ann Arbor, Mich. 48106. Single copies are $22.50; bulk order prices are less.

Renews Commitment:

Labor Press Girds for Battle To Win '68 Union Objectives

By David L. Perlman

Bal Harbour, Fla. — The nation's union publications will be active participants, not passive bystanders, in labor's 1968 political, legislative and collective bargaining battles.

A renewed commitment to the goals of the trade union movement emerged as the dominant theme of the four-day convention of the Intl. Labor Press Association.

Delegates discussed—among themselves and with experts from within and outside the labor movement—how to do a better job of reaching union members, with special emphasis on younger workers and minority groups.

Giving the sessions a special urgency was the conviction stressed by major speakers, including AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, that the 1968 election campaign is already under way—and its outcome will be decisive to the future of the trade union movement and the nation.

Meany spoke of labor's programs for the cities, for education, for jobs. He spoke of the dangers of a world war from either a reckless escalation of the Viet Nam fighting or an abandonment of America's commitment.

"There's no use trying to delude ourselves," he said, "1968 is going to be a real fight and a real test of the trade union movement . . . The labor movement has quite a job to do and this means that the labor press has a job to do."

Warns of Drift

Gus Tyler, assistant president of the Ladies' Garment Workers, warned the editors of a "drift to the right" in the nation, a "total backlash" in which civil rights is equated with riots, unions with inflation, social legislation with high taxes.

"If we wait until Labor Day of 1968" to counter this drift, Tyler said, it will be "too late."

William L. Kircher, the AFL-CIO's director of organization, said the federation looks to the labor press "to strengthen the belief of every member in his union and make non-members want to join."

He asked labor editors to lend their professional skills to a job for which they are "uniquely qualified," improving means of communicating with white collar, professional and technical employes.

Everyone involved in the labor movement has a responsibility for organizing, Kircher stressed.

A highlight of the convention was a luncheon address by Bayard Rustin, the civil rights leader who organized the 1963 March on Washington and now heads the A. Philip Randolph Institute.

In contrast to the "juvenile leftism" and "politics by emotion" of the new left, Rustin said, are those young people who retain the conviction that society and opportunity can be improved by political action and political programs.

Rustin's Challenge

The "greatest contribution" labor can make, he declared, is to "organize the unorganized and join in an effective coalition with churches, civil rights groups and other liberal segments of society to replace the loss of liberal congressmen defeated in the 1966 elections.

Ray Davidson, winding up his term as ILPA president, told his fellow editors that union members need to be "informed and persuaded, not told dogmatically" of labor's position on issues.

Davidson, who is editor of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Worker's newspaper, was succeeded as ILPA president by Fred Sweet editor of the St. Paul Labor Advocate. Sweet was unopposed, as was Ken Fiester of the AFL-CIO, re-elected secretary-treasurer.

In a field of 20 candidates for vice presidents, all eight incumbents running were re-elected: Ray Dickow, Butcher Workman; Ted Ogar, UAW Solidarity; Ray Pasnick, Steel Labor; Max Steinbock, Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union Record; Don Harris, Los Angeles Citizen; Dave Selvin, San Francisco Labor; Bernard Stern, Toledo Union Journal, and Richard Strunsky, 32B.

New vice presidents are John A. McCarthy, The Railway Clerk; Aldo Vagnozzi, Michigan AFL-CIO News; Henry Lowenstern, The Machinist; J. R. Watkins, Chattanooga Labor World; Burt Beck, ACWA Advance, and E. T. (Buck) Harris, Hollywood Screen Actor.

Two candidates for Canadian vice president ended up in a dead heat — Roy Laberge of Canadian Labour and Ray Poirier of the Sudbury Searcher. A flip of a coin gave the post to Laberge.

Earlier in the convention, delegates heard Edward P. Morgan give the ILPA's A. J. Liebling Memorial Address — established to honor the memory of a trenchant critic of the press.

Morgan's Message

Morgan, long time radio commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO, is now associated with the experimental, non-profit public broadcasting laboratory. He called for more vigorous, more enterprising journalism — in depth reporting and exposes. The public broadcasting laboratory, he indicated, is seeking to fill part of the gap.

A special evening session of the convention was set aside for a give-and-take discussion with Saul Alinsky. He urged an alliance between the labor movement and the poor.

A panel of daily newspaper writers joined with labor editors in a critique of the labor press. AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller gave an off-the-record congressional analysis and experts from other areas of labor concern brief the delegates.

The convention voted to modify its journalistic awards program, reducing the number of categories and matching newspapers and magazines against others in the same circulation bracket.

EDITORS of the nation's trade union publications devoted their four-day convention to the challenge of doing a better job of communicating with union members, young people and minority groups. Ray Davidson, winding up his term as president of the Intl. Labor Press Association, urged his fellow editors to inform and persuade, not preach dogmatically.

AFL-CIO Contribution Voted to Urban Coalition

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO Executive Council voted to contribute $25,000 to the Urban Coalition, an organization of labor, business, church and other community groups organized to launch a counter-attack on the crisis gripping the nation's cities.

The group, formed earlier in the year at a special meeting in Washington, has involved numerous groups in helping formulate programs and win legislation to meet the plight of urban areas. Urban Coalition groups are being organized locally across the country. AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany recently called on all local labor bodies to help form coalitions in their areas.

The council also voted $15,000 for the Joint Council on Economic Education, to help carry on the work of providing educational materials for high school teachers of economics and social studies.

It approved also an additional $50,000 for the Impact Projects program of the American Institute for Free Labor Development in Central and South America. The AIFLD program has registered outstanding success in helping set up cooperatives, libraries, providing ambulances and other medical materials, helping repair flood damage and other low-cost but vitally important projects.

The council approved the appointment of a special four-man committee to study problems caused by U.S.-owned plants setting up runaway operations just over the Mexican border keyed to low wages and exploitation of labor standards. AFL-CIO Vice Presidents Jacob S. Potofsky, chairman, David Dubinsky, Paul Jennings and Joseph D. Keenan will be on the committee.

Meany read the council a letter from Auto Workers Pres. Walter P. Reuther that the UAW's delegates would not be able to attend the 1967 convention and requesting that a resolution submitted by the UAW not be considered during the sessions. Meany said he wrote Reuther that the resolution would be withdrawn per his request.

Hawaii Labor Praised For Consumer Aid

The Hawaii AFL-CIO has been "commended" by Betty Furness, the President's adviser on consumer affairs, for its role in helping secure passage of bills aiding consumers in the last session of the state legislature.

In a letter to Robert C. Knight, executive secretary-treasurer of the Hawaii federation, Miss Furness particularly singled out the establishment of an Office of Consumer Protection under the Hawaii attorney general.

In Copper Dispute:

Six Rallies Reaffirm Strikers' Solid Stand

Six spirited rallies across the nation linked the workers on strike for five months against the major copper companies and renewed labor's solidarity against fresh employer stalling tactics.

Some 13,000 strikers, family members and allies attended rallies on Nov. 29 and 30 in Butte, Mont.; Tucson, Ariz.; El Paso, Tex.; Perth Amboy, N. J.; Waterbury, Conn., and Magna, Utah.

Basic purpose of the gatherings was to inform the strikers of the reasons behind the stalled negotiations and demonstrate labor's unity in the face of an employer-publicized back-to-work movement.

Proposals by Kennecott and Anaconda and other companies that the strikers return to work while talks resume were answered by the most applauded slogan: "No-contract, no work."

In Magna, Steelworkers' Vice Pres. Joseph P. Molony told 3,000 persons who jammed a high school gymnasium that Kennecott had rebuffed a union offer to resume immediate negotiations without returning to work.

Offers Hit

Molony said the company's single economic offers of last June 7 was worth no more than 12 cents an hour. He said this raise of $4.80 per week should be compared with the $200 per week in profit which Kennecott made last year on every one of its employes.

At Magna and at Butte, where more than 3,500 persons braved sub-zero weather, Molony and Steelworkers' Intl. Rep. A. C. Skinner, co-chairmen of the union's Nonferrous Industry Conference, and Machinists' Vice Pres. Charles West stressed the industry's profitability. The copper companies make more profits per man-hour worked than such giants as General Motors, Ford and AT&T, Skinner declared.

At El Paso, some 2,000 people got the union message in two languages. Cesar Chavez, director of the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee, likened the copper workers' struggle with the long strikes carried on by farm workers. Chavez spoke mainly in Spanish.

In Tucson, about 3,000 people crowded the city's Sports Center, with 1,800 persons arriving in car cavalcades from mining areas around the state. The rally, which featured a barbecue dinner, was addressed by Machinists' Vice Pres. Ernie White, Les Thornton of Steelworkers' District 38; Joe Miller of the Operating Engineers and Bernard Greenberg of the Steelworkers' Pension Dept. C. K. Featherston of the Operating Engineers and head of the Tucson Central Labor Council also spoke.

At Perth Amboy, some 1,000 persons heard from Steelworkers' District Dir. William Moran, chairman of the union's Anaconda bargaining committee, and the presidents of three striking Jersey locals: John Infusino, Tom DeFederico and Dick Lewis.

In Waterbury, the gathering of 1,200 cheered announcement of a proposal by congressional leaders for a fact-finding body to stimulate genuine bargaining.

Later, the National Nonferrous Coordinating Committee of the unions announced that its members have agreed to the fact-finding proposal to help resolve the contract stalemate.

Under Sec. of Labor James J. Reynolds asked the unions for a response to the proposal by Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield and Sen. Lee Metcalf, both Montana Democrats, for a board of seven members to get the facts on the strike and make recommendations for settlement to the secretaries of labor, defense and commerce.

Molony said the striking unions are "ready to cooperate fully."

COPPER STRIKE RALLIES in six Cities, Nov. 29 and 30, were attended by 13,000 persons. Here Connecticut AFL-CIO Pres. John J. Driscoll opens a Waterbury, Conn., meeting attended by 1,200. Speakers included Auto Workers Sec.-Treas. Emil Mazey, IUE Local 404 Pres. John Frankevitch, Sid Monti, UAW representative, and Arthur Stuart, Steelworkers research associate. Frankevitch is on the union seven-man national strike coordinating committee.

Cardinal's Death Saddens Labor

Bal Harbour, Fla. — AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, on behalf of the members and officers of the federation extended "deepest sympathies to the clergy and the people of the archdiocese of New York on the tragic loss they have just suffered" through the death of Francis Cardinal Spellman.

The Cardinal, Meany said in a telegram to Bishop Terrence Cooke, "was a great leader of his church but he was as well a great leader of our nation. His patriotism, humanitarianism and courage were admired by his fellow citizens of all beliefs."

He recalled that he had worked closely with the cardinal on many occasions "and it was he who first asked God's blessing on this organization at its founding convention 12 years ago.

Meany said AFL-CIO Vice Pres. David Sullivan would express to you in person the great loss we feel."

Basic Steel Arbitration Proposal 'Lacks Approval,' Union Reports

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The Steelworkers announced here they are pledged to "continue our search for new and better methods of bargaining" after exploratory talks with the basic steel industry on a proposed arbitration plan resulted in a lack of approval by both sides.

USWA Pres. I. W. Abel told a press conference that "contrary to any published rumors or reports, there is no agreement to change our union's traditional approach to bargaining with basic steel."

All discussions connected with arbitration and "other approaches to bargaining have been only exploratory in nature," Abel said, adding that no agreement has been reached or is contemplated.

The union said in a statement that USWA officers and general counsel met with a four-man group representing the coordinated committee of the steel companies to discuss "possible supplementary steps that might be taken during the 1968 negotiations."

These "informal discussions" grew out of the provision in the 1965 agreement with steel employers that required union and company study of issues not resolved in negotiations, such as apprenticeship, testing, training, job classifications and other topics, the statement related.

After full discussion, the union said, "it became evident that there were certain safeguards and guarantees which any such proposal should contain" before presentation to the union's policy-making bodies. The industry was "not prepared to agree" to features the USWA considered necessary "for the development of a completely sound program," the statement continued. It summed up:

"On the basis of the reaction of the union executive board and the position of the steel industry" presented publicly by an industry representative Nov. 13 in Pittsburgh, the present status of the arbitration proposal is that "it lacks approval by both sides."

'Profound Reasons'

The USWA said it has "even more profund reasons" for seeking ways to make collective bargaining work more effectively. It cited the management practice of stockpiling as a hedge against a possible strike "with the resulting decline in employment" when bargaining is concluded, government intervention in negotiations, and job losses because of foreign imports which are "heightened by the pressures of build-ups and shutdowns."

The union statement said the USWA approaches contract negotiations in the can, aluminum and basic steel industries "with much optimism" and the hope that bargaining will be concluded "fairly, peacefully and promptly."

The basic steel agreement has an expiration date of Aug. 1, 1968. Abel said the USWA executive board voted to drop the arbitration subject for upcoming negotiations and also voted to hold a special convention of union delegates before March 31 to consider "the entire financial picture."

The union has had extraordinary expenses in connection with the strike of 50,000 members that began July 15 against the "big four" of the copper industry and four smaller firms. Abel told the press conference that the industry "continues to refuse to bargain" on realistic terms for settlement of a new contract. USWA Vice Pres. Joseph Molony reported that, at a meeting with Kennecott Copper Corp. in Salt Lake City recently, management proposed that the strikers return to their jobs, accept the last company offer and continue negotiations. The offer was rejected, he said.

Council Sets Up Fund To Aid Copper Strikers

this strike believe they can starve the strikers into submission. The AFL-CIO will never permit this to happen. These strikers will not be starved out."

The statement related that the "big four" of the copper industry, which with four smaller firms produce 90 percent of the nation's copper supply, "forced the workers to strike by refusing to negotiate contracts providing reasonable wages and working conditions."

The employers, the council continued, are "waging a determined campaign to destroy effective collective bargaining in this industry" and increase its "already fabulous profit margin."

In pursuing this campaign "these companies have inflicted serious hardship on consumers of copper and other nonferrous metals, and have created grave economic problems in a dozen states," the council declared, "but the chief sufferers are the 60,000 strikers whose only goal is justice for themselves and their families."

Pledge Implemented

The council action implemented a pledge of support given earlier by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany to strike leaders at a meeting in Washington, D.C. Council members directed that the special strike fund be established at AFL-CIO headquarters, and they named a special committee of the Executive Council to head the drive for further contributions.

The Steelworkers and other unions representing copper workers formed a coordinated front early this year to meet the united front of the big employers with their smaller colleagues. Each union met the same response from management representatives — an inferior offer well below prevailing wages and conditions in the rest of industry, and a refusal to budge from that offer.

They walked out July 15, and have maintained stable and solid lines ever since in a dozen states from coast to coast.

At the Washington meeting, Meany summed up the reports of union strike committees: the strike was "provoked and perpetuated by major employers whose aims have little to do with the terms of the labor contract."

The conferees charged in a statement that the employers want to:

- Exhaust surplus copper supplies to create an artificial crisis and bring governmental action "adverse to the interests of the strikers."
- Create a "sellers' market" that will "permit substantial price increases when production is resumed."
- Bargain on no terms but their own.
- Starve the strikers into surrender on the cynical pretext of "fighting inflation" and "curbing union powers."

Strikers' unions are, besides USWA, the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Plumbers, Iron Workers, Operating Engineers, Machinists, Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen, Office & Professional Employes, Auto Workers; Electric, al, Radio & Machine Workers, Painters, Laborers, Mechanics Educational Society, Boilermakers, Carpenters, Chemical Workers, Railway Carmen, Sheet Metal Workers, Bricklayers, Molders, Blacksmiths and Railroad Trainmen.

Teachers Union Wins Long Island Election

Plainedge, N. Y.—Teachers in this Long Island community have chosen the AFL-CIO American Federation of Teachers as their bargaining agent, turning away from their previous representation by Classroom Teachers Association, a National Education Association affiliate.. The vote in a representation election was 203 for the Teachers to 158 for the Association.

TWUA Elects Stetin to Fill Chupka's Post

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The Textile Workers Union of America announced that Sol Stetin, veteran union organizer, will serve the remainder of the term of office being vacated Dec. 31 by John Chupka, union secretary-treasurer since 1953.

The TWUA executive council voted unanimously for Stetin, 57, who has been a union vice president since 1944 and currently is serving as TWUA director for five states—Delaware, Michigan, Ohio, New Jersey and Pennsylvania.

The 22-member council, at a quarterly meeting called by union Pres. William Pollock, elected William Davis of Lewistown, Pa., to the office to be relinquished by Stetin. Davis is director of the union's synthetic fibers division.

Chupka's constitutional term expires in June 1968 but he is retiring now for health reasons. He is 63 and a resident of East Douglas, Mass. Chupka's union career included jobs as local union president, state director, head of the synthetic fibers, woolen and worsted divisions, as a member of the TWUA executive council since 1942, and for the past 14 years as the union's number two officer.

Stetin was active in organizing New Jersey textile dyeing and finishing workers in the early thirties, and has been a full-time union official since 1933.

SAN FRANCISCO OPERA performance of the Barber of Seville was recently sponsored by Retail Clerks Local 1100 to do something a "little different" for the members. Left to right, Local 1100 Pres. Richard Williams, San Francisco Opera Gen. Dir. Kurt Herbert Adler, Local Sec.-Treas. Walter Johnson, Carol Kirkpatrick as "Rosina," Allan James Monk as "Figaro," San Francisco AFL-CIO Pres. Joseph Belardi and John Crowley, assistant secretary of the central body.

Local Sponsors Opera, 'Something Different'

San Francisco—Retail Clerks Local 1100 "wanted to do something a little different" for its department store members so it sponsored a performance of Rossini's opera, the Barber of Seville.

The performance by Western Opera Theater, a San Francisco Opera subsidiary, was pronounced a "happy success" by an Examiner reviewer and praised editorially by both the Examiner and the Chronicle.

After deciding to sponsor the opera, the local set a price of $1 a ticket and voted to underwrite the rest of the cost. Complimentary tickets were sent to more than 50 servicemen and senior citizens.

Union leaders admitted some apprehension as to "what kind of attendance" the opera would get. They set a goal of a turnout of 500. Publicity was delayed over problems in finding a proper hall. But on the night of the performance more than 850 persons, mostly members and friends, were in the audience at Nourse Auditorium.

Examiner reviewer Alexander Fried described the "Barber" performance as "full of fun and success." He hailed the singing of a "lively, professional cast." Most of the performers were top stars in the San Francisco Opera.

Fried reported that the opera, a comedy, was greeted with good laughs and enthusiastic applause.

While noting that the performance couldn't be given with orchestra—not at the $1 ticket scale—Fried said the substitute two-piano support was "bright, expert and satisfying."

The stage setting, he added, "made up in intimate charm what it didn't pretend to have in grandeur."

He expressed hope that the "agreeable results" would intensify labor sponsorship of opera, symphony and other fine music. He also proposed that the city provide adequate facilities for such events.

To Meet a Need

Local 1100 Sec.-Treas. Walter Johnson, asked why the union decided to sponsor the opera, said, "We've been wanting to do something a little different for our members.

"With more leisure time and higher salaries brought about by unions," he continued, "people need more interests for a fuller life—something to get them out more, away from the TV set."

Kurt Herbert Adler, general director of the San Francisco Opera, praised the event as "an important breakthrough for the arts in the community." He told how arrangements were made with cooperation from other unions, including the Musicians and Theatrical Stage Employes.

Adler added, "After all, unions are an important part of community life. All of us in Western Opera Theater are union members, too. I? Oh yes, I belong to the Musicians."

Bella Hess Unit Of 1,200 Picks Office Union

Kansas City, Mo.—Workers at the Kansas City office of Bella Hess, a Midwest mail order house, have chosen the Office & Professional Employes over the ousted Teamsters as their bargaining agent in a union representation election.

OPEIU Pres. Howard Coughlin reported that the vote in a National Labor Relations Board election was OPEIU 596, Teamsters 222, and 21 for no-union. The unit to be represented includes 1200 employes.

Coughlin described the victory as "an eloquent demonstration of the desire of Bella Hess employes to be part of the main family of the American labor movement."

The election's outcome, he added, "shows how deep and widespread the yearning for collective bargaining is among American workers, including those in hard-to-organize fields."

Coughlin said the election also proved the value "of the AFL-CIO team concept in organizing," with OPEIU leaders working "in tandem" with AFL-CIO regional staff representatives all during a five-month organizing drive.

The union's campaign was headed by Vice Pres. George Furth, Local 320 Business Agent Jerry Smith and Wayne McCool and Eugene Dwyer, union representatives.

The AFL-CIO assistance came from Regional Dir. Delmond Garst, William E. Dowell, assistant regional director, and William Lewis, Wayne King, Fred George and Joseph Lynch, of the AFL-CIO regional staff.

Ousted IUE Officials Lose Injunction Bid

The U.S. District Court in Washington, D.C. has denied a motion for a temporary injunction to reverse the ouster of Milton Weihrauch as president of District 3 of the Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers.

Weihrauch, charged by IUE with misusing more than $141,000 in union funds, was removed along with District 3 Treasurer Joseph Iozzi in a recall vote Sept. 25. The tally was 83,000 to 936.

Federal Judge Matthew P. McGuire handed down the ruling, telling Weihrauch that "one who seeks equity must do equity and not be guilty of inequity himself." He also ordered Weihrauch to submit to questioning on the charges of misappropriation of funds.

Weihrauch sought the injunction through Atty. Edward Bennett Williams on grounds that his recall was contrary to the constitutions of both IUE and District 3.

Toronto Steel Union Opens Art Gallery

Toronto — The Toronto Area Council of the Steelworkers' union is officially opening an art center at its headquarters here.

Called the 33 Cecil Street Gallery, the opening was set for Dec. 8 with an exhibition of work by members of the union.

Present plan is to establish the gallery as a permanent cultural landmark in Metro Toronto, according to Leopoldo Bertacchi of the Steelworkers' staff.

Director of the gallery will be Mary Shane, secretary to District 6 Dir. Larry Sefton.

Reverses Illinois Ruling:

High Court Upholds Union Legal Aid Plan

By Duane Emme

The U.S. Supreme Court has reversed a 1966 Illinois Supreme Court decision which denied the United Mine Workers' District 12 the right to hire attorneys to aid members in asserting legal rights.

The AFL-CIO had warned in a brief urging the reversal that the Illinois ruling, if allowed to stand, would "seriously undermine the efforts of working men to provide themselves with effective legal assistance."

In two other major cases, the Supreme Court:

- Left in effect a National Labor Relations Board order requiring Lincoln Mfg. Co., Ft. Wayne, Ind., to bargain with Sheet Metal Workers Local 503 on the basis of a card check.
- Ruled in a Florida case that a state may not deny unemployment benefits to workers because they have unfair labor practice charges pending against employers.
- Announced that it will consider whether the constitution bars large suburban housing developments from refusing to sell to Negroes or members of other minority groups. The case which is expected to be decided next spring, is an appeal brought by Joseph Lee Jones, a Negro who said he was rejected in an attempt to buy a house in a subdivision near St. Louis in 1965.
- Affirmed the decision of a special three judge federal court in Montgomery, Ala., last March which requires the state to carry out a school desegregation plan.
- Struck down Ohio's 1964 congressional redistricting law, which permitted population variations between districts as high as 30 percent. Labor was among organizations opposing the law.

Plans Upheld

The issue of an organization's right to maintain a legal service plan at members' expense has been attacked by various bar associations for many years. In the UMW case it was the Illinois Bar Association that brought the challenge.

But such plans have twice been upheld by the Supreme Court. In 1963, it upheld a legal plan of the NAACP to finance cases aimed at ending segregation, and a year later sustained a Railroad Trainmen's plan to aid members in accident litigation cases.

The AFL-CIO charged in its brief supporting the UMW that the Illinois Supreme Court's conclusions that the plan was a "threat to the attorney-client relationship" was "untenable" in line with these two decisions.

The brief recalled that in both cases the court had found the NAACP and Trainmen's plans legal under the First and Fourteenth Amendments and declared that these safeguards applied in UMW case as well.

An 8-to-1 decision, written by Justice Hugo L. Black, agreed. "We think that both . . . cases are controlling here," it emphasized.

The amendments' guarantees of freedom of speech, assembly and petition give the union "the right to assist its members in assertion of their legal rights," the majority opinion added.

Protects Rights

The First Amendment, it continued, would be "a hollow promise if it left government free to destroy or erode its guarantees by indirect restraints so long as no law is passed that prohibits free speech, press, petition or assembly as such.

"We have therefore repeatedly held that laws which actually affect the exercise of these vital rights cannot be sustained merely because they were enacted for the purpose of dealing with some evil within the state's legislative competence. . . ."

Justice John M. Harlan dissented on grounds the decision cuts into the "most traditional of state concerns" — that of maintaining standards for the legal profession.

In the Lincoln case, the court denied review of a 7th Circuit Court of Appeals decision which had upheld an NLRB bargaining order issued in 1965 based on determination that the Sheet Metal Workers represented a majority of employes.

The board and the lower court sustained cards that authorized Local 503 "to represent me for purposes of collective bargaining." They also found that the union's letter requesting recognition was not defective because it did not expressly claim majority status.

In the Florida case, the court said that a state may not deny jobless benefits because a worker has filed unfair labor practice charges. Involved was a claim by Minnie E. Nash, an employe of Stanley Building Specialties Co., Miami.

The Steelworkers had filed unfair labor practice charges with the National Labor Relations Board on grounds she was fired for union activities. She was later rehired but Florida had denied her unemployment compensation for the period of her layoff.

Auto Workers Weigh GM Offer, Push Talks on Non-Wage Issues

Detroit—The Auto Workers and General Motors joined in pledging a "major effort" to reach agreement on national contract terms by Dec. 14—a "target" date set by the union.

A joint statement agreed to a "news blackout" on the talks and stressed that the two sides will concentrate "on noneconomic contract matters as they relate to production and skilled trades workers."

The statement said UAW is studying an economic offer from GM that "in its broad outlines conforms to the economic settlements reached at the Ford Motor Co. and Chrysler Corp."

The Dec. 14 date, previously set by the union as a deadline for settlement, but not a strike deadline, will be treated "with comparable weight and importance" as though it were a strike deadline, GM said.

UAW said that if it has a national agreement by Dec. 14, a strike deadline for local issues will be put off until after Jan. 1. If there is no national contract by that date, a strike deadline for both national and local issues will be set after the first of the year. Some 400,000 GM workers are involved.

Meanwhile, the union pushed for settlements of local issues at Chrysler plants, continued negotiations with American Motors Corp. and farm equipment makers and sought to resolve several strikes.

As the AFL-CIO News went to press, the union announced strike deadlines at Chrysler plants as follows: Dec. 7, Belvedere, Ill., Dec. 8, Indianapolis Foundry and Los Angeles assembly plant, and Dec. 10, Hamtramck, Mich.

UAW also set a Dec. 8 deadline for 600 truck drivers and mechanics at its Chrysler interplant transportation unit here.

Negotiations were on in an effort to get a settlement at Chrysler electrical parts plant in Indianapolis, where a strike by 3,000 members of UAW Local 1226 began after a deadline passed without an agreement.

Talks also were in progress at Chrysler's key stamping plant in Twinsburg, Ohio, where the union agreed to an indefinite extension of a strike deadline.

Federal Blue Collar System:

Wage Board Plan Widens Union Role

ing rates for their craft in the localities where they work.

Under the present wage board system, each agency determines the prevailing rate on the basis of local wage surveys and its own job grading system—sometimes resulting in different pay scales for employes of different agencies doing similar work in the same city.

The new plan establishes uniformity of wage board pay grades, with appeal rights for any worker dissatisfied with the grade assigned to his job. No worker will have his pay cut as a result of the grade designations.

Here's how unions will participate in the wage-setting procedures:

● At the top level, to advise the Civil Service Commisison on overall policy and procedures, there will be an 11-member National Wage Policy Committee.

Five of its members will be drawn from management of agencies having large numbers of wage board employes. The president of the AFL-CIO will name four of the five union members and one member will be chosen on a rotating basis from among unaffiliated federal employe organizations. The chairman will be designated by the Civil Service Commission.

● In each locality, the agency with the largest number of wage board employes is designated as the "lead agency" to set the wage rates for that area. In each such agency, there will be an Agency Wage Committee which plans and schedules wage surveys, analyzes data and actually sets the rates. Two of the five members will be named by the union having exclusive bargaining rights for the largest number of employes of the agency.

● In every locality where there are more than 400 wage board employes and at least 10 percent of those employed at the lead agency are represented by unions, there will be a three-member local wage survey committee, one representing the principal union. It trains and supervises data collectors, holds hearings, and submits its recommendations.

The new system does not affect those agencies which set wages through collective bargaining, such as the Government Printing Office.

Meany termed the new wage system "real progress . . . in providing full union participation in determining federal wage rates." He said it demonstrates "the Administration's determination to establish equitable and realistic working conditions for federal employes."

AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller headed the special federation committee whose recommendations formed the basis for the new program.

Other members were John F. Griner, president of the American Federation of Government Employes; B. A. Gritta, president of the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept.; George Knaly, government relations director of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers; John A. McCart, director of the AFL-CIO Government Employes Council; William H. Ryan, national federal employes coordinator of the Machinists, and Anthony Weinlein, research director of the Building Service Employes.

The Civil Service Commission said it will start putting the new system into effect next July, completing the changeover during a two-year period.

Oklahomans Rebuff R-T-W Petition Bid

state AFL-CIO for their "forceful and steadfast" battle against "right-to-work" over the years.

Oklahoma labor successfully defeated proposals to ban the union shop in every session of the legislature for the past 20 years, Meany noted.

"They defeated it in a statewide referendum in 1964," he added. "And now the right-to-work forces can't even scrape together the minimum number of signatures even though they tried to buy their way onto the ballot by offering as much as 25 cents per name and recruiting" professional petition circulators.

Meany said the experience in Oklahoma—for years the key target state of the National Right to Work Committee—"proves that so-called 'right-to-work' is a dead issue in this country."

He suggested that "the responsible business community" take a sharp look at "the sorry record" of the "work" committee — "and then read it out of business."

Employers 'Milked'

Meany charged that the committee "is kept pasted together by a group of professional fund-raisers who milk gullible businessmen and then use these funds to pay handsome salaries to themselves and their fellow promoters so they can raise more money to repeat the cycle indefinitely."

Meany added:

"It has been a very profitable game for them and for the advertising agency representatives . . . who draw handsome commissions. In fact, the National Better Business Bureau reports that in one year total fund-raising expenses amounted to 42.2 percent of income.

"Now that the National Right to Work committee has fallen flat on its face in Oklahoma, it is interesting to recall that it hailed the 1966 election results as a 'mandate for right-to-work' and promised vigorous campaigns for this compulsory open shop law in all 31 states which do not have it."

Meany pointed out that "right-to-work" was soundly beaten in every state legislature where it was proposed this year — including a 210-0 defeat in the Massachusetts House, where even the sponsor of the bill didn't vote for it.

In Oklahoma, State AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Henry Likes hailed the rejection of the petitions as "a great day" for the people of the state.

He said "nobody here in Oklahoma wanted a petition campaign but the National Right to Work Committee insisted on it."

CAB to Probe Airline Pact On Strike Aid

The Civil Aeronautics Board has ordered an investigation of the mutual aid pact under which seven airlines provide financial assistance to any pact member whose operations are shut down by a strike.

The investigation was called for by six unions—Air Line Pilots, Airline Dispatchers, Railway & Airline Clerks, Flight Engineers, Transport Workers and Machinists.

The seven airlines linked in the pact are American Airlines, Braniff Airways, Eastern Air Lines, Northwest Airlines, Pan American World Airways, Trans World Airlines and United Air Lines.

The strike aid agreement, first formed in 1959, included six airlines. It was expanded to 10 companies in 1960. However, since then Capitol was absorbed by a merger and National and Continental have dropped out of the pact.

It has been periodically approved by CAB over the years with the last definite approval given for a three-year period which ended in July 1967. Since then it has been extended on a temporary basis. In May, the companies applied for an "indefinite" approval.

Unions have frequently objected to the pact in the past, contending that it was illegal, against public policy, an "open declaration of war against unions in the industry" and an instrument that serves to prolong strikes.

Area Seminars Slated On Community Services

Seven on-the-job training seminars for more than 170 full-time AFL-CIO Community Services representatives from 110 industrial communities are scheduled for next January and February.

Leo Perlis, director of Community Service Activities for the federation, announced that the seminars will be coordinated by William A. Davies, AFL-CIO-CSA national representative with United Community Funds & Councils of America. They will be held in cooperation with seven universities

The schedule:

Jan. 3-5, University of Connecticut, Northeastern.

Jan. 9-11, University of Miami, Southern.

Jan. 16-18, Pennsylvania State University, Middle Atlantic.

Jan. 22-24, University of Indiana, Midwestern.

Jan. 30-31, Feb. 1, University of Minnesota, Midwestern.

Feb. 12-14, Michigan State University, Midwestern.

Feb. 19-21, University of California, Western.

"Emphasis at these seminars will be placed on community organization and community leadership," Perlis said. "This is the major function of full-time AFL-CIO-CSA staff representatives if they are to serve their unions and their communities effectively."

Subsidiary topics will include new approaches to union health and welfare counselling and the development of consumer counselling specialists.

Western Urban Parley Spurs Local Coalitions

San Francisco—"The fate of our country rests on what happens in our cities in the next five or six years."

With this challenge, Mayor John F. Shelley of San Francisco welcomed some two hundred leaders in business, government, organized labor, civil rights, and religion to a daylong conference here aimed at forming local coalitions to attack big-city ghetto problems.

The meeting was convened by the national Urban Coalition whose emergency convocation last summer in Washington, D.C. set the goals for a new, broad-front assault on urban problems.

Recalling the violence that swept across the nation's cities at the time, Mayor Shelley told the audience how he had been shown a demonstration of anti-riot weapons —tanks, guns, gas.

"But dogs and tanks and guns and clubs will not solve the problems of violence in the cities."

Bayard Rustin, executive director of the A. Philip Randolph Institute of New York City who presided at the meeting, noted that there had been many kinds of coalitions before in American life.

But there are new elements in the Urban Coalition—the participation of business and state and city government leaders, along with labor, liberal and civil rights groups.

"If this combination cannot meet the problems of the cities, nobody can," he said.

He challenged the notion that the nation cannot fight the war against poverty and in Viet Nam at the same time.

The forces that have lined up to cut back the attack on urban problems opposed these programs before the war in Viet Nam, Rustin said, and they will oppose them when the war is over.

They are simply taking advantage of the war, he warned, to continue their opposition.

Rustin also underscored the importance of returning a Congress to Washington next year that will put its weight behind the coalition program.

Kenneth Wright, vice president and chief economist of the Life Insurance Associations of America, described the life insurance companies' proposed billion-dollar investment in core city housing and jobs.

He reminded listeners that the initiative for projects to improve urban housing or create jobs would have to come from private and government sources.

The Insurance companies' program is intended, he pointed out, to provide financing at the going rate for projects which capital ordinarily would shun.

Morning and afternoon workshops were devoted to methods of organizing local coalitions and to the development of local task forces to work together with national level task groups set in motion by the national coalition.

A number of cities have already organized local coalitions, including New York, Minneapolis, Detroit and Atlanta. Last month the League of California Cities called for the formation of urban coalitions in all of the cities of the state.

Apprentice Openings Proposed for Veterans

Learning new job skills through apprenticeship can be "the key to a highly productive career" for veterans of military service, Administrator Hugh C. Murphy of the Bureau of Apprenticeship & Training pointed out.

In a message urging employers and unions to bring veterans into apprentice programs, Murphy emphasized that they are "amenable" to job training because of financial aid allowed by the Veterans' Pension & Adjustment Act of 1967.

Freedom Budget Urged To Wipe Out Poverty

Minneapolis—Poverty in America can be eliminated only by an "all-out war, not just a skirmish," a noted Negro educator told participants in the 11th annual AFL-CIO Institute on Human Relations here.

Dr. Vivian W. Henderson, president of Clark College in Atlanta, Ga., spoke on the theme of this year's institute: "The Freedom Budget—A Challenge to All Americans."

The proposed budget, drawn up last year by the A. Philip Randolph Institute, is geared to a 10-year timetable to provide jobs for all who can work, adequate income for those who cannot, along with decent homes, health care and good education for all Americans.

It would pay for itself in the prosperity and growth in the national product it would generate, Henderson said.

Urging that the massive government action needed be started immediately, Henderson warned that "the gap between the 'haves' and 'have-nots' has widened instead of narrowing."

Sponsors of the institute were the Minneapolis AFL-CIO, the Minnesota Labor Committee for Human Rights and the Jewish Labor Committee.

Three panel discussions preceded the luncheon session at which Henderson spoke. The panel themes were:

"Handouts or jobs? Can full employment be achieved for all those able to work?"

"More effective schools. Can programs be initiated to combat environmental disadvantages?"

"Ghettos or decent housing? Can we move faster?"

The AFL-CIO Today

THE AFL-CIO ENTERED its 13th year vigorous and growing, leading the struggle for economic and social justice, concerned with its task of building a liberal coalition for continued progress.

The critics who had either predicted or willed its demise in almost annual obituaries are stilled, but others have risen to take their place to catalogue its faults and failures and pronounce it complacent and dully middle class—neither turned on nor tuned in.

There are the other critics, also, who find the AFL-CIO a fearsome conspiracy that tramples profits and dividends underfoot and who find labor's concern with protecting the public interest somehow a bit unpatriotic.

And while the critics turn out their empty and banal and uninformed strictures the realities brush them aside:

In Congress, the final days of the session find the AFL-CIO leading the traditional fight for the liberal cause—funds for the poverty program, higher social security benefits and a civilized welfare program, meat subjected to honest inspection standards.

Across the nation, AFL-CIO unions are waging a desperate struggle against the arrogant copper industry, determined to hold out for decent wages and conditions, united in a strike that says loud and clear "the labor movement is for real."

In the vineyards of California, the courageous farm workers continue their battle for human dignity and decency, the exploited turning on their exploiters under the banner of the AFL-CIO.

And in thousands of offices and plants and shops men and women are voting union, signing cards, negotiating contracts, adding their names to the list that has produced a growth of 1.5 million members in the AFL-CIO in the past few years.

This is the AFL-CIO 12 years after merger.

Oklahoma Yawns

THE SCRIPT was the same, and maybe that's why Oklahoma voters wanted no part of a rerun.

Less than four years ago, in a statewide referendum, they turned down a proposition to outlaw the union shop.

This time, the National Right to Work Committee and its Oklahoma affiliate couldn't even get enough signatures to get it on the ballot.

The committee, a self-perpetuating organization whose main function seems to be raising money from anti-union businessmen, had again made Oklahoma its number one target. After all, the state is no union stronghold and it is an enclave of free collective bargaining almost surrounded by "right-to-work' states.

The "right-to-work" promoters hired paid solicitors to seek signatures on petitions. They beat the drums with advertising and publicity. The response of the voters, however, was a tired yawn.

Most Oklahomans are not union members. But they don't see anything wrong with a free collective bargaining system under which workers and their employers can negotiate union security as well as higher wages and better working conditions.

Neither, it seems, do the people in the 30 other "free states."

Despite big talk by the "work" committee at fund-raising time, the industrial states which know unions and the collective bargaining process best continue to turn the coldest of shoulders to union-busting laws.

Perhaps it's time for some of the people who for more than 20 years have been trying to divide the nation on the union shop issue to consider what they might do to unite the country.

Scores 'Dismal Record' of Congress:

Meany Cites Labor's Gains, 'Longer, Harder' Road Ahead

The following is excerpted from AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany's report to the Seventh Convention.

THIS IS THE REPORT of the Executive Council on the record of these last two years. It is at the same time a report of solid trade union achievement, of limited improvement in legislation and of great frustration and trial.

The bright promise of 1965 has been dimmed; the great surge of social progress, which we rightly hailed then, has been wrongly stemmed; the stern warnings we issued of the grave dangers ahead, especially for urban America, were ignored.

So, the road to the achievement of the world we seek is today longer and harder than we foresaw two years ago; the need for its achievement is even more crucial and our resolve can be no less firm now than it was then.

While we must in no way deny the problems that we face, we cannot obscure the progress that has actually been made.

American society is immeasurably better than it has ever been before. The historic advances of 1965-66 are still in being. Their full effectiveness has been hampered by false economies, but they are still having a continuing impact for good. The gains made by the affiliates of the AFL-CIO in organizing and in negotiations are without parallel in recent history.

But all this is not good enough for us.

Millions of our fellow Americans do not share in the continuing affluence of most in our land.

Freedom is still denied to millions through the world, who yearn for the political self-determination we in this nation accept as a matter of course.

First-class citizenship, the only kind worthy of democracy, remains only a dream to millions in our country.

The slums which disgrace our cities and breed disease, crime and exploitation, are worse than ever before.

Yet with all these needs, there are too many voices raised in and out of Congress in support of policies that would mean retreat—retreat from the defense of freedom in Viet Nam and retreat from the war against poverty, disease, illiteracy and exploitation here at home.

The AFL-CIO has always rejected the counsel of retreat and we reject it now.

There is no doubt where the responsibility lies for the domestic crisis our country faces. It is the responsibility of the Congress, where a conservative coalition of both parties now dominates the House of Representatives, blocking the avenue to social progress.

There is little reason to expect the second session of the 90th Congress to reverse the dismal record it has achieved to date. But we shall keep pressing upon the Congress the need for programs such as those we have sought so far in vain.

More importantly, we must work in the elections of 1968 to restore to the Congress the liberalism, idealism and determination necessary to achieve a better nation and a better world.

While we continue our fight for major domestic needs we must not forget or ignore the problems posed by America's defense of freedom on the battlefield of Viet Nam.

Today, the calm, firm and patient course that is essential to a successful conclusion of this difficult struggle is under attack from two sides. There are those too short-sighted to see that the very future of freedom is at stake, who cry for American withdrawal on any terms or no terms at all. At the opposite pole are those who demand a total military victory, even at the risk of an atomic holocaust. Both are wrong.

THE UNITED STATES is fighting in Viet Nam to uphold a principle and fulfill a promise. The principle is self-determination—the right of any people to choose its own form of government and pursue its own destiny. The promise, dating back to the Eisenhower Administration, is that the United States will assist in protecting the independence of free nations that are attacked by an aggressor. Our ultimate goal is peace, a goal that must be ceaselessly pursued. But a peace achieved by abandoning principle and breaking a solemn promise would be only a prelude to a wider war.

That is why the United States is deliberately waging a limited war for limited ends, seeking no victory except the right of the South Vietnamese to be left alone.

Those who maintain that the cost of the war in Viet Nam demands drastic curtailment of outlays for social progress at home are equally wrong. There is no economic substance in this argument, and in every other respect it is even less valid.

Thus we can say that in both domestic and foreign affairs the AFL-CIO has identified the perils and pointed out the remedies. We say this, not in a spirit of self-justification, but rather as evidence that the programs and policies established by previous conventions, and implemented by the Executive Council, can properly serve as guides to this convention as it determines the course of our movement for the two years ahead.

Growth Continuing:

4-Year Surge In Membership Bolsters Trade Union Strength

The following is excerpted from an article "The Growth of the AFL-CIO" by Nathaniel Goldfinger, director of research for the AFL-CIO, in the December 1967 issue of the AFL-CIO American Federationist.

UNION MEMBERSHIP GAINS have been in an upsurge since 1963. The past four years have been a period of expansion of organized labor, following a small membership decline in the previous six years. And the growth of trade union membership is continuing.

In 1966-1967, the average paid membership of AFL-CIO affiliates rose to 13.8 million. By the first six months of 1967 per capita dues payments of affiliated unions to the AFL-CIO were up to 14.3 million—representing 18.6 percent of the civilian labor force. This was a gain of 1.8 million since the 1962-1963 low-point, when the AFL-CIO's paid membership represented 17.6 percent of a much smaller labor force.

Reflecting steady membership growth during the course of 1966 and 1967, the per capita dues payments of affiliated national and international unions to the AFL-CIO are continuing to rise.

In some industries, trades and occupations, the membership of organized labor represents 80 percent or more of the people who are eligible. And, in others, the membership represents 20 percent or less. But in most parts of the economy since 1963, trade union membership has been advancing as rapidly or faster than employment.

In the latter 1950s and into 1960, there was a mounting political attack on organized labor. From many Republicans and conservative Democrats, there was a continuing outcry about corruption, with the finger of blame pointed at all of organized labor. Conservative politicians also hammered away at organized labor as the source of inflation, while similar charges were made at frequent intervals by business leaders and some university economists, including self-proclaimed liberals. Hardly a week passed during those years without a public attack on trade unions and collective bargaining, loudly proclaimed on television, radio, the newspapers and magazines.

The AFL-CIO's early and strong support of civil rights legislation and programs also made organizing gains more difficult, especially in the South.

The combination of these economic and political trends placed trade unions increasingly on the defensive—particularly in industries whose employment was declining. Yet despite these difficulties, organizing gains were made—not only by the unions that expanded their memberships, but also by unions whose memberships declined.

Large-scale turnover of employment in many industries required continuing organizing efforts to keep the over-all membership stable. During 1957-1963—with plant shutdowns, changes in industry location and frequent lay-offs—unions in such industries as auto, steel and machinery had to gain new organizational victories in order to prevent their overall memberships from dropping even more than they did.

Some unions, such as those on the railroads, already represented close to 100 percent of eligible employes and could hardly gain new organizational victories. For them, declining employment meant declining memberships, while they continued to represent close to 100 percent of the workforce in such industries.

Despite these difficulties, organized labor made strides in collective bargaining. Wages and salaries increased moderately. Significant forward advances were made in fringe benefits—such as pension plans, medical insurance, vacations and holidays. And the unions began to develop numerous job-security measures, adjustment procedures and protective machinery against the impact of automation.

These complex and varied factors help to explain the 414,000 net decline in the membership of AFL-CIO affiliated unions between 1956-1957 and 1962-1963, as well as the decline from 19.3 percent of the civilian labor force to 17.6 percent.

On Jan. 17, 1962, Pres. Kennedy issued an executive order, which directed federal agencies to recognize and bargain with unions representing their employes. While this executive order dealt directly with federal employes, it provided an atmosphere of support for union organization and collective bargaining in public employment generally—state and local government, as well as federal. Moreover, it reflected the Administration's general acceptance of trade unions and collective bargaining as important American institutions.

These policies and attitudes towards unions and collective bargaining, as institutions, have been carried on generally by the Administration of Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson.

WHILE THE NATIONAL POLITICAL situation began to improve in 1961, it was not until 1963 that economic conditions started to pick up significantly. The real volume of national production increased at a yearly rate of 5.5 percent between 1963 and the first-half of 1967—two-thirds faster than in 1957-1963. Moreover, this more rapid rise of sales and production was partly concentrated in heavy goods manufacturing, industrial and commercial construction and related activities.

As a result, factory employment and jobs in construction bounced up, while employment in government, the services, retail and wholesale trade continued to move forward strongly.

Unions continued to make significant collective bargaining gains in wages, working conditions and fringe benefits. Pension and health insurance plans were expanded and improved. Job security measures and supplemental unemployment benefit plans were gained. And the AFL-CIO's national leadership, in seeking progressive economic and social legislation, bore fruit in the adoption of such measures as medicare, federal aid to education, substantial expansion of coverage of the federal minimum wage and an increase in the minimum wage, civil rights legislation and expanded aid for housing and community facilities.

Median Income Falls Short:

City Worker's Family Budget Seen New Bargaining Target

THE LABOR DEPT.'S updated city worker's family budget will be a new collective bargaining target, the AFL-CIO's chief economist predicted in a network radio interview.

Only 25 percent of America's families now earn what the Labor Dept. said is needed for a "moderate standard of living" in urban areas, Nathaniel Goldfinger, the federation's director of research, reported on Labor News Conference. Even then, he asserted, many are able to do so only because they have more than one wage earner in the family or rely heavily on installment buying.

Goldfinger pointed out that the budget, pegged at nearly $9,200 per year, provides "very few luxuries and amenities," but is still "quite a bit higher" than the average worker's income and national median family income. Unions won't expect to reach the target figure in a single jump, but will build toward it, he said.

The trade union movement moves ahead step-by-step in both collective bargaining and legislation "to improve the standard of life for union members and the population of the country as a whole," he said.

THE UPDATED city worker family budget represents living standards that the average American family would like to have and is "a target to shoot for—something to strive for," he added.

"In the good American tradition, all of us do seek, and should seek, improved standards of living," he declared.

Reporters questioning Goldfinger on the AFL-CIO produced public affairs interview, aired Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EST, over the Mutual Broadcasting System, were Sam Sharkey of the Newhouse Newspapers and Frank Swoboda of United Press Intl.

AS THE FIRST SESSION of the 90th Congress makes its way to a not overly inspiring end, one of the somewhat redeeming aspects is the amount of fresh thinking that is being given by some members to the problems of the slum-ridden and sometimes violent cities.

While Congress overall has choked off appropriations, new aspects of the problems are being explored: a model cities program, improved public housing, aid to private industry in the housing field, rent supplements, a "new towns" proposal, better transportation systems to bring workers and jobs together and finally, a revolutionary study on the feasibility of free transportation if necessary.

The very idea of "free" transportation as a possible solution to the job of bringing men and jobs together is startling in itself. It is doubly startling when it is authorized and paid for by a government department—the newly created Dept. of Transportation.

The proposal, originally made by the president of the Atlanta transportation system, was specifically suggested as a way to bring more people into downtown shopping areas. It has now been expanded to cover its possible usefulness in enabling ghetto workers to reach jobs that are denied to them because of either the lack of public transportation or its expense.

"If a job applicant doesn't have an automobile, don't send him to us," said the representative of an industrial plant just outside of Los Angeles, accenting the tragedy of low-income dwellers in metropolitan areas who literally can't get jobs because they can't get to them.

"Free" transportation may well prove one way to solve this problem. A more immediate solution to the problem is now being demonstrated by the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development in a cooperative project under which the State of California is trying out a subsidized transportation system in a 46-square mile area of Los Angeles—including Watts—long without adequate transportation to outlying job-rich areas.

HUD reports that the project has shown real success. During October the experimental line averaged about 2,800 riders daily with most of the passengers bound for work. A year ago ridership was only 800, indicating a heavy increase in jobs outside of the district.

During November the project entered a new phase under which a one-way 15 cents fare has been established for extension of the line into the nearby city of Commerce which is an excellent source of jobs for residents of the project area.

AFTER A SLOW START the Johnson "model cities" program is making some progress. HUD has selected 63 cities, including New York City, Detroit, Boston, Philadelphia and Baltimore, as eligible to share in an overall development program when their final plans are completed.

Another new approach to urban problem is that offered by Sen. Abraham A. Ribicoff, Connecticut Democrat, who calls his proposed legislation a "New Towns Development Act." Under this proposal wholly new communities would be set up in the future to handle the expected 70 million growth of the American population during the next 20 years.

Many of the new ideas that are now being suggested or are just beginning to go into operation may not be the entire answer to what has become a highly complicated problem, but some of them hold real promise of success.

What is most important about them is that they show a willingness to experiment, a flexibility in approach on the part of public officials that goes far beyond the simple tearing down of slums leaving great areas of nothingness in the hearts of great American cities without really solving the problems of the people who have been dispossessed.

American cities will die without new thinking about what to do about them. We appear finally to be on the road to giving their problems the fresh thinking that is needed.

THE LABOR DEPT.'s updated city worker's family budget is a new collective bargaining target "to shoot for," AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nathaniel Goldfinger (center) told Frank Swoboda (left) of United Press Intl. and Sam Sharkey of the Newhouse Newspapers on Labor News Conference, public affairs interview broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EST, on the Mutual radio network.

Disputes Plan Results Cited As Successful

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO's Internal Disputes Plan "has proven itself most successful," largely through the cooperation of affiliates and the high caliber of the mediators, the Executive Council reported.

The disputes plan was adopted as Article XXI of the AFL-CIO constitution by the 1961 convention and became effective the following Jan. 1. The plan's record through the first 10 months of 1967 shows that of the 701 cases filed nearly 60 percent — 424 — were settled in mediation.

It noted that many of the cases are settled on an informal basis after discussions by the parties with Pres. George Meany's office.

Mediation of disputes is handled by a panel of officers of international unions and a panel of umpires that includes David L. Cole, Saul Wallen and Philip Taft. All members of the Executive Council serve on the three-man subcommittee of the council that hears appeals and examines complaints of non-compliance.

Since the plan's inception, the impartial umpires have made determinations in 247 cases and have issued 12 fact-finding reports. Ten cases currently are pending before umpires.

The Executive Council subcommittee has received 81 appeals from umpires' determinations. Of these, 64 were denied, four were withdrawn, eight were referred to the council and five are pending.

The subcommittee also received 42 complaints of non-compliance with the determinations of the impartial umpires. It achieved compliance in 23 cases, found non-compliance in 12 others. Six cases were withdrawn and one is still pending.

The report noted that non-compliance sanctions are still in effect against the Air Line Pilots, National Maritime Union, Brotherhood of Railroad Signalmen, Journeymen Stonecutters, Switchmen's Union and Typographical Union.

Gains Won for Voice Roles on Animated TV

Hollywood, Calif.—The Screen Actors Guild has negotiated a new contract with producers of animated television motion pictures to provide sizable wage increases and improved working conditions for players employed as off-camera voices.

For animated films of 10 minutes or less, the minimum was raised from $90 to $100 for an unlimited number of voices, retroactive to July 1. It goes to $100 on July 1, 1969, with a limit of three voices. For each voice over three, the player will be paid at least an additional $35.

For 10-minute-and-over animated films, the $100 minimum was raised to $112, retroactive to July 1. It goes to $120 on July 1, 1969, with a limitation of three voices for the one minimum. For performing more than three voices, the player will be paid an additional full minimum fee.

John L. Dales, SAG national executive secretary, said the contract also contains improvements in residuals and in producers contributions to the union's pension and health and welfare plans.

Producers covered by the contract include Warner Bros. - Seven Arts, MGM, Walt Disney Productions, Walter Lantz Television, UPA Pictures, De Patie - Freling Enterprises, Hanna - Barbera Productions, Format Films, and Grantray - Lawrence Animation.

SCROLL OF THANKS is presented to Manager Thomas Flavell of Clothing Workers Local 169, New York, by Daniel Alejandro, student body president at Margaret Knox Junior High School in East Harlem. When the school's basketball uniforms were misplaced or stolen, the local's members made new ones and presented them to the school complete with school insignia.

Participation Spurred In Mortgage Trust Plan

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Participation in the AFL-CIO Mortgage Investment Trust has been "disappointing," the Executive Council reported to the convention, and it urged affiliates to reexamine their investment policies to give the trust greater consideration.

The trust was established as a medium to pool the investment of union reserves into socially desirable union-built housing programs, the council noted.

Its report noted that "a large and up to this time relatively untapped source of funds is the ever-increasing long-term reserves of pension, welfare and retirement trusts."

Many unions whose members are covered by such plans are particularly affected by the need and demand for new housing units, the report noted, "and it therefore seems that consideration should be given to use a portion of the reserves to acquire mortgage loans" through the medium of the Investment Trust.

Any qualified labor-management welfare, pension or retirement plan, regardless of size, may participate in the trust, as well as general or special purpose union funds, the report said.

The trust was established in late 1965 with a $50 million initial issue of certificates of participation filed with the Securities & Exchange Commission. It has since distributed about $12 million of these certificates to investing funds.

"In view of the great potential of available investment reserves from labor sources," the council said, "the limited amount of participation certificates distributed to date is disappointing."

It appears, the report said, that many unions are not fully informed of the advantages of this "well-conceived program" and renewed efforts are being made to encourage participation.

The council also outlined the work of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Investment with the Agency for Intl. Development and the American Institute for Free Labor Development in encouraging investment in programs of improved housing for workers in Latin America.

Federal Locals Continue Shift, Number Drops

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO had 219 directly affiliated local unions with 56,200 members as of last June 30, the Executive Council reported to the convention.

The number of locals represented a decline from 255 over two years, but total membership was up from 49,700 as of July 1, 1965.

During the period, 23 locals with 5,192 members chose to affiliate with national or international unions. The report laid the shift to the desire of the members for active participation in the affairs of a national union with similar activities and jurisdiction.

Twelve of the direct affiliates with 221 members disbanded during the interval and the charters of two others with 244 members were revoked. One new local charter was issued.

The report also noted that all 50 states had state central bodies in operation and that as of June 30, 766 local central bodies were in existence.

Shift to Suburbs Cited:

COPE Drive Keyed To Member Trends

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Organized labor is determined to "go where the members live" to marshall its forces in preparation for the 1968 election, the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared.

The council's report to the convention on the operations of the Committee on Political Education noted that "where the members live" increasingly is in the suburbs.

It cited findings of the COPE-sponsored Kraft poll that nearly half of all union members and three-fourths of those under age 40 were living in the suburbs at the end of 1966.

Most of these suburban unionists are white, the report noted, whereas the 17 percent of union members classified as "non-white" are concentrated largely in the cities which are "becoming Negro ghettos."

"This pattern," the council said, "creates new situations for which new solutions to labor's organizational and educational problems are demanded."

It stressed particularly the problem of "maintaining lines of political communication between all sectors" of labor and urged formation of community COPEs among union members living beyond the bounds of central labor bodies.

The report cited several suburban COPE organizations already in existence and said such groups "can be to the community what the grievance committee is to the workplace."

"Suburbs are the new frontier of politics," the council declared. "In many the political potential from a trade union point of view is untapped. In newer suburbs particularly, political lines have not yet hardened. Thus, opportunities exist for a well-organized suburban COPE to establish itself as an effective political force."

Reviewing the 1966 elections and the sharp setback it produced for the liberal forces in Congress, the council emphasized that "without COPE's best efforts, the . . . swing of the pendulum would have been more extreme, considering the nature of the unfavorable forces at work."

While "labor can never account for more than a minority of votes" . . . in a situation such as in 1966 "we can take satisfaction in having prevented worse disaster," the report observed. It said COPE's performance in the election was marked by "a higher degree of involvement" at every level of the AFL-CIO and "an unusually early start in planning and organizing" with "continuing cooperation with candidates."

The council also reported on COPE pilot projects using data processing equipment for mass mailings to union members and predicted this would become an "indispensible part" of COPE activity, particularly in building new suburban organizations.

The council said the forthcoming election in 1968 posed "particular hazards" for all liberal candidates. In recognition of this, it said, COPE Dir. Al Barkan has named a special committee of the COPE Operating Committee to work with him on plans for the campaign.

"The luck of the draw is with conservatives in 1968," the council warned, "as a larger number of liberal incumbents will be running for statewide election in very marginal situations."

High Court Sets New Principles In Key Rulings Upholding Unions

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Unions continued to maintain a good won-lost record and to score a number of major successes in legal disputes carried to the U.S. Supreme Court, the AFL-CIO Executive Council said in its report to the 1967 Convention.

The high court's past term which saw seven clear union victories in 10 decided cases—several establishing important new principles—will "hopefully be a portent of the future," the council said.

Its review of legal matters described cases heard by the high court in the 1965 and 1966 terms also. Among them were decisions called "three of the most important labor victories" acted on since the 1965 convention.

The first, NLRB v. Allis Chalmers, upheld (5-4) the right of a union to impose and collect through court action a reasonable fine on members who had crossed and worked behind the union's picket line during a lawful strike.

A majority of the justices concluded that Congress had not intended to prohibit union discipline for such activity, especially since it is clear that the union could expel a member for the same conduct.

While the court did not clarify the extent to which a union may go in disciplining its members, it did stress that national labor policy "extinguishes the individual employe's right to order his relations with his employer and creates a power, vested in the chosen representatives, to act in the interests of all employes." That power necessarily includes the power "to reasonably discipline its members who violate rules governing membership," the court reasoned.

Two other decisions termed union victories involved the "hot cargo" and secondary boycott provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act. The council report said "they point the way toward collective bargaining agreements that preserve work traditionally performed by the contracting union's members."

In National Woodwork v. NLRB, a contractor agreed not to require his employes to handle prefabricated materials which incorporated work that the union members had customarily performed. When the employer violated the contract and sought to use finished doors, the union members refused to handle them. The Supreme Court called this primary activity because the members' sole objective was the preservation of work they had traditionally performed. The decision means that Section 8(e) of the Landrum-Griffin amendments makes secondary "hot cargo" clauses unlawful, but not primary work preservation clauses, the council said.

Houston Insulation Contractors v. NLRB involved sister locals of the same international union. One refused to install work not performed by the local with the contract. Since both locals' members were working for the same employer, the refusal was not an attempt to influence a "neutral" employer in a dispute in which he had no interest. Therefore, the court ruled, only legal primary activity, rather than illegal secondary boycott was involved.

The council report pointed out that "the statutory duty of a union to fairly represent all of the employes in a bargaining unit is now well established. In general, a breach occurs only when a union's conduct toward an employe is arbitrary, discriminatory or in bad faith." Following these general principles the high court held in Vaca v. Sipes that a union does not breach its duty of fair representation merely because it settles a grievance unfavorably to an employe before the final stage of arbitration provided for in the union's contract.

The council said the court "thus rejected the argument that there is an affirmative duty to carry every case to arbitration."

The council described several other Supreme Court decisions as well as important lower court cases in various areas of labor law, and listed "significant" NLRB decisions. The report noted that "the massive unfair labor practice campaigns of certain obdurate southern textile employers, and the board's attempts to cope with them, produced a number of important decisions."

The council declared: "The board at last is showing the first tentative signs of recognizing the urgent need for more effective remedies in those cases, such as J. P. Stevens & Co., in which but for the employer's unlawful actions, the possibility is strong that the union would have gained a majority" during an organizing drive.

Progress Trails Hopes:

Lag in Jobs Sparks Ghetto 'Powder Keg'

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Unemployment and unfulfilled civil rights expectations are major components in the "powder keg" that threatens the nation's cities, the AFL-CIO Executive Council warned in its report to the seventh constitutional convention here.

While the overall unemployment rate has been reduced to 4 percent and lower in the past two years, the council noted, the rate for minority groups is still 7.5 percent and higher, nearly double the national average.

Further, the council said, "minority group youth unemployment has maintained itself at between 21 and 30 percent" and the rate is "as high as 35 percent" in hard-core ghetto areas.

Although there has been progress toward eliminating discrimination in recent years, this progress has not resulted in better jobs, education and housing "for large masses of minority group citizens," the council said.

For example, it noted that during the past decade of rising standards of living for the population as a whole, "the median income of minority group citizens has not kept pace" with the rising national median.

"The country, white as well as non-white, expected that with the acceleration of the pace by which segregation and discrimination were being eliminated, minority group citizens would move up the economic ladder," the council added.

As examples of civil rights gains, the report said that public accommodations issues have been generally resolved and that "some progress" has been made toward equality in jobs, voting and education.

On the other hand, the council pointed out that "there still is a long way to go" if we are to end the dual school system in the South and "de facto" segregation in the North.

"Equal justice and freedom from intimidation have still to be won," it continued, "and the struggle to halt discrimination in housing has barely begun."

The council called for "massive action" by Congress to include approval of Administration-sought appropriations for model cities, anti-poverty, housing, education and job training programs, plus enactment of a program to provide a million new public service jobs.

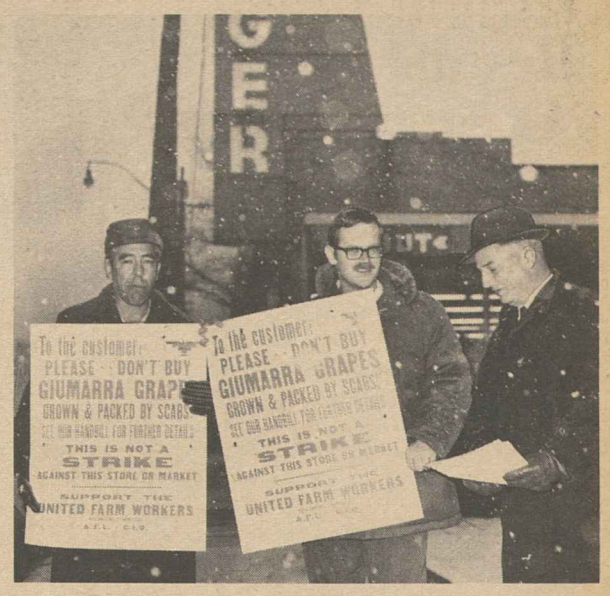
Besides "assuming a responsibility" for helping to get civil rights legislation passed, the AFL-CIO also works for "effective implementation" of existing laws and the removal of any discrimination "that may exist in our own house," the council noted.

It described the federation's continuing education program on civil rights, the cooperation given by state and local bodies to community rights programs and the way in which affiliates cooperate with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

The report described the work of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights in helping organize civil rights conferences and institutes for union members in various parts of the country.

It noted that AFL-CIO affiliates have pressed their drives to effect mergers of previously segregated locals until "at latest count" there were only 142 racially segregated locals among the more than 60,000 locals of AFL-CIO unions.

One section of the report detailed federation activities in cooperation with government and private agencies to help minority group youths get into apprenticeship programs.



GIUMARRA GRAPES BOYCOTT is pressed by United Farm Workers Organizing Committee and AFL-CIO staff organizers in cities across the country. Giumarra Co., a big California grape grower, has refused to grant a union election despite UFWOC's show of cards among 95 percent of its workers. Right, in Cleveland snow (left to right) UFWOC Organizer Joseph Serda, UFWOC Research Assistant Edward Chiera and Russell L. Schroeder, AFL-CIO field representative.

Farm, White Collar Union Gains Highlight Rising Organizing Tide

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The organizing tide for AFL-CIO unions continues to run high in spite of persistent employer unfair practices and jobs lost to the machine, the Executive Council said in a report prepared for 1967 convention delegates here.

The council cited new-member gains in farm and white collar areas and the addition of 477,000 workers to union rolls through representation elections conducted by the National Labor Relations Board over the two-year period ended last May.

"A determined labor movement," the council said, "has never failed to accomplish reasonable goals designed to help working people and thus to strengthen this nation. A new era of great union growth is such a goal and all evidence indicates new progress toward it."

Since the 1965 convention, the report noted, long-exploited farm workers in Texas and California forged a union chartered by the AFL-CIO and won a "brilliant election victory" at the Delano, Calif., and Borrego Springs farms of the giant DiGiorgio Corp. By the spring of 1967, contract negotiations supplemented by arbitration won for the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee, AFL-CIO, a contract providing wage increases ranging up to 40 cents an hour, a health-welfare fund and union hiring hall.

Those "truly momentous achievements" raised the hopes of farm workers all over the nation, the council said, and stimulated activity elsewhere. Since then, additional contracts have been negotiated with key growers such as Christian Brothers, Novitiate, Perelli-Minetti and Almaden, with a contractually-guaranteed minimum wage of $2 an hour.

'Direct Confrontation'

These accomplishments "have come about through direct economic confrontation — strikes, picketing, boycotts," the report said. In the absence of any regularly available machinery for resolving representation disputes, such direct and vigorous action is required "just to obtain union recognition," it said.

The council noted that AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany had appeared before a House Labor subcommittee last May to urge that agricultural workers be given the protections of the National Labor Relations Act. Meany was joined in that plea by Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz. Other voices also were raised on behalf of union rights for farm workers, among them the Senate Migratory Labor subcommittee and the President's Food & Fiber Commission.

"If the massive weight of evidence now presented received the reaction it should from Congress, there could be a major revision of federal legislation bringing agricultural workers into equal status with other workers," the council said.

Besides farm workers, the AFL-CIO assigns a "high priority" of organizing interest to public employes, service workers, white collar employes, and those in the South.

The council noted that public employe unions have made substantial gains both in membership and collective bargaining. The number of federal employes covered by exclusive recognition agreements under Pres. Kennedy's Executive Order 10988 passed the one million mark in 1966—a 50 percent increase in about three years, the report said. It noted that AFL-CIO unions represent 90 percent of all federal employes in exclusive agreements — 38 percent of total employment in the Executive Branch of the federal government.

White collar workers, long viewed as indifferent, have been organizing and voting for union representation in increasing numbers, the report said, citing particularly school teachers, college professors, workers in transportation, electronics, broadcasting, engineering, insurance, metal manufacturing and newspaper publishing.

Last March, 17 AFL-CIO international unions with 400,000 members founded the Council of AFL-CIO Unions for Scientific, Professional & Cultural Employes and set as its goal the organization of 10 million white collar workers.

In the service industries, AFL-CIO unions continue to secure recognition and win elections. NLRB figures show affiliated unions won 60 percent of more than 300 election wins in the service industries and were certified to represent nearly 13,000 employes in the latest annual reporting period.

Cooperative organizing programs continued to get a great deal of attention, the council reported. The Los Angeles-Orange Counties program passed the 100,000 mark last summer in workers brought into unions. Successes also have marked Iowa's state-wide organizing program, now in its fifth year, and smaller-scale cooperative drives in Arkansas and Mississippi. Interested unions in Kansas and Missouri have taken preliminary campaign steps, the council noted.

Staff Programs

Currently more than 70 percent of the field staff time of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization has been devoted to organizing activity, according to the report. Training programs have been conducted for staff organizers in more than 15 AFL-CIO unions. Area conferences were held in every region in the country, along with special meetings on NLRB problems. Each month a "model" organizing leaflet is published by the department.

Organizing activity is reflected, the council said, in NLRB reports showing that, in the 24-month period ended last May 31, AFL-CIO unions took part in 10,646 representation elections and won 6,034 or 56.6 percent in units containing 477,250 employes.

The council noted the continuing rise in the number of unfair labor practice charges filed with the NLRB. Close to 16,000 such cases were handled in fiscal 1966. Illegal firings still remain as the "most numerous and most grievous form of employer unfair practices," the council said.

Progress Cited in War on Poverty, High Priority Urged to Meet Goals

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The United States must not renege on the commitment made three years ago to wage all-out war on poverty, the Executive Council declared.

Its report to the AFL-CIO convention stressed both the accomplishment and the unmet goals. It pledged that labor "will continue to support, participate in and cooperate with the war on poverty at all levels and in every meaningful way until poverty has been fully eradicated from our midst."

To achieve that goal, the council said, there must be:

- Job opportunities at decent wages for all able to work.
- Adequate social security benefits.
- Adequate income maintenance for those who cannot support themselves because of disability or the absence or unemployment of the family breadwinner.

It called the programs launched by the Office of Economic Opportunity "a vital part of the overall effort to break the poverty cycle"—the Job Corps, Community Action programs, Neighborhood Youth Corps, Head Start and many others in which labor has been actively involved.

The council termed the first years of OEO "encouraging," and declared:

"The important fact is that the anti-poverty effort is reaching the poor and is opening doors through which they can escape. . . . True, not enough of the poor are being reached. Not enough doors are being opened. This is not the fault of OEO. The war on poverty is an expensive war and Congress has not been overly generous."

Labor's evaluation, the report makes clear, is not an ivory tower analysis or acceptance uncritically of claims of government administrators.

It is based on first-hand experience of union leaders at the national, state and local levels who have been intimately involved in developing the anti-poverty programs and union members who have seen active duty in the war on poverty.

Labor participation goes much deeper than the OEO's National Advisory Council and a special Labor Advisory Council. Some 3,000 local union leaders are actively participating on the boards and committees of community action programs in their neighborhoods.

But to win the war on poverty, the Executive Council emphasized, "much more needs to be done" and "more money is essential."

The council said that "up to now the expenditures for the war on poverty have been woefully inadequate" — and the current OEO appropriations bill obviously falls far short of the need.

The report noted that more than half of all poor families have someone who is working, and 30 percent are headed by persons with full-time, year-round employment—the "working poor."

Along with more job opportunities are needed "the extension of effective collective bargaining, improved unemployment compensation and adequate minimum wages."

For the 20 percent of the poor who are too old to work, "social insurance benefits are still far too low and the level of public assistance remains completely inadequate."

Better health, housing, education "and the elimination of every vestige of racial prejudice" are also essential to a meaningful war on want, the council declared.

The report took note of "six years of prosperity for most Americans."

But amidst this general prosperity, it stressed, "32 million of our fellow citizens still live in abject poverty and millions more hover at its fringe."

Labor Presses All-Out Campaign For Social Insurance Advances

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Labor pressed in Congress, the state legislatures and at the bargaining table for better protection for workers against the hazards of unemployment, illness, injury and old age.

The two-year record of accomplishments, the report of the Executive Council indicated, has been considerable—although still short of the goals.

At the federal level, there is the still-pending social security bill. The Senate version, based on the Administration's proposals, has been described by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany as a "substantial down payment" towards labor's goals. The whittled-down House version is marked by grave deficiencies.

The Council took note of the successful start of the medicare program, terming it "an outstanding achievement." It noted that the AFL-CIO played an important part in the campaign to urge older Americans to sign up for the voluntary medical insurance portion of the program—and more than 93 percent of those eligible did so.

A grave deficiency of both the 89th and 90th Congress, the report stressed, has been the failure to enact meaningful federal standards of unemployment compensation.

In the absence of congressional action, the battle has been carried to the states—with some success.

These are some of the highlights reported by the council:

● Flexible provisions under which maximum benefits keep pace with average wages in the state were adopted by Connecticut, Kentucky, New Jersey, Puerto Rico and West Virginia. There are now 22 jurisdictions that have adopted the flexible maximum benefit concept, although most are still below the ceiling recommended by the AFL-CIO of two-thirds of average weekly wages.

● Maryland, Connecticut and New Jersey amended their laws to permit payment of unemployment compensation to workers jobless because of a lockout.

● Twenty-three states raised benefit ceilings during 1966 or 1967 legislative sessions.

Most states also improved workmen's compensation benefits during the past two years, although usually by only a modest amount. There still remains a wide discrepancy between the amount of compensation received by workers earning the same pay and suffering the same injuries but living in different states.

The council said the past two years has seen "dramatic developments" in health, welfare and pension programs.

Overshadowing the major improvements made, however, has been the vast increase in the cost of medical care—both in hospital charges and doctor bills.

The average daily expense for hospitalization soared 16.5 percent in 1966 and now is about $55. By 1975, the prediction is for a $100-a-day hospital charge. Doctor fees have also paced the rise in living costs, and incomes of physicians have risen even more because of fees from medicare and medicaid.

The AFL-CIO has long urged comprehensive prepayment group practice health care as "the best way of providing quality health service efficiently and at reasonable cost." The council noted that Administration studies of health costs have also strongly endorsed such an approach.

New Federal Programs

A series of new federal programs, ranging from assistance to medical education through regional centers for research and treatment of major diseases have all contributed to better health care for Americans, the report observed.

At the bargaining table, unions have often found themselves on a "treadmill," negotiating for more money to maintain the level of health care benefits established in prior negotiations.

There is increased interest, the council report said, in a new type of health "bargaining." Unions in a community, which are among the major "purchasers" of medical care, have in some areas successfully negotiated with hospitals and medical societies to get the best value for the health dollar.

The Executive Council report also expressed labor's concern for those at the bottom of the economic ladder, who haven't shared in the prosperity unions helped bring to the nation, and who are dependent on public welfare payments for their survival.

"The overwhelming number of individuals and families who receive public assistance do so through no fault of their own," the report stressed.

Punitive Proposals

Not only do public assistance payments today generally fall short of the need for a decent, minimum standard of living, but punitive proposals are brought out periodically to "punish" people for being poor.

The AFL-CIO council added:

"People on public assistance are perhaps the most defenseless segment of the population. They pull no political weight; they have no lobby of their own. Their well-being to a large extent depends on the national conscience. It is our hope that the Congress will recognize its clear obligation to provide the millions who depend on public assistance with adequate income maintenance in a dignified manner as a matter of legal right."

Safety Drive Focused On Uranium, Pipelines

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Battles for new safety standards covering uranium mines and natural gas pipelines highlighted labor's safety activities in the past year, the AFL-CIO Executive Council said in its report to the 1967 convention.

The high death rate among uranium miners from over-exposure to radiation in the mines was brought before Congress, the Administration and the public "mainly through the efforts of the AFL-CIO," the council observed.

The report told how labor pressed for strong new standards that would lower the permissible radiation level in mines. Although a "protection guide" later adopted "was less stringent" than the AFL-CIO sought, it did contain a number of labor's proposals, the council said.

The council described labor's efforts to secure stronger protection from radiation for other workers, and uniform record-keeping of radiation exposure.

The fight for strong, enforceable regulations over natural gas pipelines began in 1966 and continued this year, the council pointed out, with labor determined to press the drive until Congress enacts legislation recommended by Pres. Johnson.

The Administration would authorize the secretary of transportation to set federal standards for the safe transmission and distribution of natural gas over hundreds of thousands of miles of pipeline.

The report also described AFL-CIO's activities in seeking a national occupational health program, reduction in the heavy toll of traffic accidents and firm restrictions on the use of child labor.

It emphasized the need of an "adequate budget" and a sufficient staff for the Dept. of Labor's Bureau of Labor Standards so that it can "carry out an adequate safety inspection program for the millions of workers covered by federal legislation."

Despite Obstacles:

New Contract Gains Won in Bargaining

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Collective bargaining continued to be the major force for improving workers' wages and job conditions in the two years since the last AFL-CIO convention, the Executive Council said in its report.

Union negotiators succeeded in winning more "real" wages, better job security and extended fringe benefits despite such obstacles as rising consumer prices, frequent government intervention and increased employer resistance against sharing record-breaking profits, the report showed.

The council said that these developments marked the bargaining scene since the last convention:

● Consumer prices rose by 2.5 to 3.5 percent per year to eat into the buying power of worker's earnings. As a result, unions had to seek larger increases to provide gains in real wages. Escalator clauses tying wages to living costs received greater emphasis in contract negotiations.

● Negotiated wage increases have been getting larger. The average first-year wage boost in contracts covering 1,000 or more workers rose steadily—from 3.8 percent in 1965 to 4.8 in 1966 to approximately 5 percent this year, not counting fringe benefits.

● Profits reached new high points in 1966, yet there was increased employer resistance to union proposals. After-tax profits in 1966 were 8 percent above the previous year's peak and 81 percent greater than in 1960.

● The strike record was slightly higher than in the early 1960s but considerably below the level of the 1950s. Less than two tenths of 1 percent of total working time was lost because of strikes, and contract agreement was reached without strike or lockout in the "overwhelming majority" of negotiations.

● Taft-Hartley Act injunctions were invoked four times to bring the total number of disputes brought before the courts to 28 since T-H was enacted.

The report cited government surveys showing that major contracts negotiated in 1966 by unions provided wage increases averaging 4.8 percent in the first year and 3.7 percent during their full term. Wage and fringe benefits combined averaged 4.9 percent in contracts affecting 5,000 or more workers in 1966.

For the first half of 1967, wage increases averaged 5 percent during the first year and also during the full life of the contract.

The report said fringe benefit improvements were common to most contracts. Four out of every five major pacts improved one or more fringe benefits, but great variation existed, the council said. It listed these principal trends:

● Pension benefit levels were more than doubled in many contracts to provide benefits typically of $5 a month per year of service. Age requirements for retirement were eliminated in some cases, and in others reduced to age 60 or 62. Greater emphasis was placed on vesting rights which permit workers to keep accumulated pension credits if they leave before retirement age.

● Paid holidays now average 8 or 9 a year in contrast to the traditional 6 a few years ago.

● Paid vacations were liberalized in many pacts to provide five-week or six week leaves for long-service employes. The two-week vacation after one year of service has become widespread.

● Supplemental unemployment benefits have been improved to provide a higher portion of lost-time earnings and more long-term benefits to senior workers.

● Health and welfare plans were revised in attempts to meet the rising cost of hospital and doctor care and to provide coordination with medicare benefits under the Social Security Act. The coverage of many health plans was broadened to provide for dental and optical care, drugs and mental illness.

● Job security remained a central concern in many contracts. Some agreements provide attrition-type clauses and guarantees of a minimum number of working hours to protect the workforce against layoffs caused by automation, corporate mergers and economic slumps.

● Many agreements provide severance pay clauses to cushion the impact of job loss on displaced workers. Transfer rights and moving-expense allowances have been broadened to meet the needs of changing job conditions. Shorter hours continue to spread slowly to provide more job opportunities.

The council concluded: "Collective bargaining continues to exhibit its ability to adapt to changing economic conditions in the nation's thousands of different industries, trades, labor markets and workplaces."

Progress Cited in Drive To Build Central Bodies

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Progress toward the goal of full affiliation by all local unions with state and local AFL-CIO central bodies was reported by the Executive Council to the seventh convention here.

The council noted that the last convention had adopted a resolution giving strong support to remarks by Federation Pres. George Meany in the keynote address "that far too many local unions stand apart from their brothers at the state and local level and do not bear their share of labor's efforts to make the American community a better place" for all to live and work.

The last convention also set up a system of awards to unions, 80 percent of whose locals are affiliated with their state central bodies. The award was presented to 12 unions in 1965 and to seven others in 1966.

"Although the 1967 results are not yet in," the council observed, "there is reason to be optimistic that substantial additional progress will be evident toward the solution of this vexing problem."

The report noted that 44 unions have designated an official to work with the AFL-CIO Coordinator of State and Local Central Bodies to encourage affiliation of locals. The president of the union serves in that capacity in all other cases.

The report also cited an upward trend in per capita tax rates of state AFL-CIO bodies, resulting from voluntary convention actions to establish programs to meet increasing responsibilities.

"The AFL-CIO," the council said, "depends on the central bodies for successful implementation of labor's programs" at the state and local level and it is incumbent that unions support them fully.

'Best-in-History' Congress Gives Way to Retrenchment

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The accomplishments and failures of two vastly different congresses are covered in the Executive Council's legislative report.

The two-year period since the last convention covers the second session of the 89th Congress and the current first session of the 90th. In both of these years, the council noted, the AFL-CIO worked actively for a broad program of social legislation to benefit all America, including the nation's working men and women and their families.

Despite some sharp disappointments—such as the failure to repeal Section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act, to establish federal standards for unemployment insurance, and to pass the on-site picketing bill—the 89th Congress "was the most progressive in the history of the country," the report declared.

The great achievement of its second session was the wage-hour law, but the roster of its other accomplishments is many pages long.

Coalition in Control

This year, while the Senate remains liberal, the conservative Republican-Dixiecrat coalition recaptured the House.

As a result, the council report declared, "the American labor movement is now fighting defensive battles against conservative, anti-labor efforts to undermine and undercut the gains achieved in the past."

The 1966 session saw the launching of the model cities program, holding out the promise of large-scale aid to cities that developed imaginative plans to rehabilitate entire neighborhoods through improved housing, better schools, recreation facilities, health centers, social services and transit service.

It was up to the 90th Congress this year to provide the money to carry out the program. The $312 million it voted was less than half the amount Pres. Johnson had requested.

Even in the 89th Congress, the council noted, it was only by a margin of a few votes that money was finally appropriated for rent supplements—one of the most imaginative approaches developed to provide decent housing for people whose incomes were too low to afford the rents charged in private, profit-making apartment houses. The 90th Congress cut the budget so sharply that only a token program remains in existence.

Funds Denied

The 89th Congress voted funds to plan the Dickey-Lincoln public power project in Maine, to generate low-cost electricity for a New England area that pays the highest rates in the nation. The 90th Congress refused any further funds to carry on the project.

In the 89th Congress, the report noted, the appropriations to finance Great Society programs came within one-half of 1 percent of the President's budget requests. The budget-cutting spree of the House economy bloc this year, the council observed, has put in serious jeopardy many of the programs enacted by the 89th Congress.

There has been some progress made in both 1966 and 1967 on consumer legislation, with the record still not closed.

A "half-loaf" version of truth-in-packaging — more accurately a truth in labeling law—was enacted last year. Of far-reaching significance was an auto safety law, authorizing the government to set safety standards for all cars and establish a uniform quality grading system for tires. Mine safety and highway safety bills were also passed.

The 1967 session saw Senate passage of a somewhat weakened truth-in-lending bill, a strong meat inspection bill, pipeline safety legislation and other consumer measures. Final action in these areas during the life of the 90th Congress appeared likely.

The filibuster again came into its own as a weapon to block progressive legislation, the report noted.

Passage of the landmark 1964 and 1965 civil rights laws had raised some hope that the ability of a minority to prevent a majority of the Senate from acting was impaired. But events proved otherwise.

One of the great accomplishments of the first session of the 89th Congress was House passage of repeal of 14(b)—the section of the Taft-Hartley Act that allows states to outlaw the union shop.

Senate Republican Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen led a conservative filibuster against taking up the bill. A majority of the Senate voted to close debate, but not the two-thirds required under the Senate's Rule 22.

The filibuster weapon was also used that same 1966 session to kill a House-passed civil rights bill, which included a modified fair housing section.

A strong effort was made at the start of the 90th Congress to make it easier to break a filibuster, but failed for lack of a two-thirds vote to break a filibuster against a rules change.

The Executive Council report noted that the 1966 session enacted and the 1967 session improved a permanent program of education and training benefits for all returning servicemen, in peace as well as in war. The AFL-CIO was one of the earliest supporters of this legislation, long sponsored by Sen. Ralph W. Yarborough (D-Tex.).

Rail Arbitration

Congress this year resorted to compulsory arbitration—over labor's strong protest—to prohibit railroad workers from striking for a better contract. The rail shopcraft unions directly involved in the dispute were convinced that a voluntary agreement could have been worked out if rail management hadn't been confident that Congress would step in to prevent a strike.

Much of the record of the 90th Congress was still incomplete at the time the Executive Council report was prepared. But the pattern of a conservative-controlled House pushing to slash funds for social welfare programs had already been established.

The Road to Victory

'Impressive' Gains Made In State Legislatures

Bal Harbour, Fla.—"Impressive" gains were made in state labor laws during the two years since the last AFL-CIO convention, the Executive Council reported.

It cited significant advances in minimum wage legislation in 16 states, although most state pay floors still trail the federal wage-hour law.

Connecticut, Massachusetts, New Mexico, Rhode Island and Washington all provided step increases to bring large numbers of workers up to the $1.60 level during 1968 or 1969.

New Mexico had a 90-cent wage floor for non-service workers and an 80-cent minimum for service workers. This year it voted an immediate boost to $1.25 for general workers and $1 for service workers, moving in two steps to $1.60 for non-service groups and $1.30 for service workers by Feb. 1, 1969. It also covered farm workers under a wage base starting at $1 and rising to $1.30.

New Jersey, which joined the growing list of states with statutory minimum wages, also included agricultural workers under its law.

In other areas:

Wisconsin extended its collective bargaining law to state employes, Rhode Island and Vermont provided bargaining rights for municipal employes, and Louisiana authorized a voluntary checkoff of union dues for public employes. Minnesota extended its public employe collective bargaining law to cover teachers.

Connecticut became the latest state to enact anti-strikebreaker laws and the list of cities with similar ordinances has grown to 92.

Kentucky and West Virginia enacted fair employment laws and a number of other states strengthened civil rights laws.

A labor-pushed campaign to prohibit the use of so-called lie detectors in employment led to passage of legislation in Delaware, Maryland and New Jersey in 1966 and in Connecticut this year.

Occupational health and safety laws were improved in a number of states, including labor-sought legislation to protect workers against radiation hazards.

A section of the report dealing with taxes noted continued demand for additional public services brought on by population growth.

These require additional revenue, and the report noted with regret that regressive taxation, such as sales taxes, still is the major source of state and local income.

Sales taxes, the council pointed out, fall heaviest on lower-income families and also fail to produce the growth in revenue that comes from a progressive income tax.

In the past two years, however, Michigan and Nebraska have levied income taxes for the first time and some cities have been able to substitute income taxes for sales and property taxes.

Because of inadequate tax policies, state and local debt has risen much more rapidly than the federal debt, the Executive Council noted.

Council Reaffirms AFL-CIO Support For U.S. Military Action in Viet Nam

Bal Harbour, Fla.—An increase in the "scope and intensity" of the war in Viet Nam has made it "more and more the dominating factor in United States foreign policy," the AFL-CIO Executive Council said in reiterating labor's support for Administration policies in that country.

In its report to the AFL-CIO convention, the council cited five reasons why the federation has "consistently" backed Pres. Johnson's military measures to halt aggression—"including the bombing of strategic targets in North Viet Nam":

- The "nature of the war," recognition that it is "a Communist war of conquest and part of the Communist drive to dominate the world."
- The U.S. commitment to the people of South Viet Nam to help them halt North Viet Nam's aggression and decide their own destiny.
- The danger that defeat of South Viet Nam "would open the door to Communist control of Southeast Asia," menacing the independence of free countries there and bringing the threat of Communism closer to U.S. shores.
- A conviction that victory for Viet Cong guerrilla warfare would encourage "so-called people's liberation wars" elsewhere, particularly in Latin America.
- Humanitarian grounds: If the U.S. were to abandon South Viet Nam to a Communist takeover "its people would be exposed to brutal oppression and millions would become the victims of persecution, reprisals and murder."

At the same time, the council pointed out, labor has "wholeheartedly" backed the many initiatives taken by the President in a "constant search for an end of the conflict."

Furthermore, the council noted, the AFL-CIO has always stressed that winning the war requires "not only adequate military means but also economic improvements, especially land reform, social justice and a representative government."

The council also cited the AFL-CIO program of aid in Viet Nam in cooperation with the Vietnamese Confederation of Labor (CVT).

The report called attention to other "grave events" that have marked the international scene in the two years since the 1965 AFL-CIO convention, including "another war that shook the world"—the Israeli-Arab conflict last summer.

Although the fighting was brief and "its outcome decisive," a permanent peaceful settlement of the problems "of this strategic region" seems to be far off, the council said.

Elsewhere, the council deplored Communist China's attainment of the nuclear bomb and its "increasing irresponsibility"; Portuguese colonialism in Africa, Rhodesia's secession and South Africa's apartheid policy; continuing dictatorships in Spain and Portugal, and the military take-over of Greece.

Alliance Crumbles

Disintegration of the Western Alliance that set in a few years ago "has deepened," the report said, because Pres. DeGaulle of France has moved farther away from the Atlantic community.

A "chilling" in relations between the U.S. and Russia over the past two years is due to the Soviet's continuing flow of weapons to North Viet Nam and its arming of Egypt's Nasser and encouragement of his aggression against Israel, the council said.

The war in Viet Nam "would have ended long ago, if it were not for the vast Soviet aid to North Viet Nam," the council declared. It warned that Russia wants a Communist victory so as to extend its influence and weaken the U.S.

Despite these "disturbing developments" in international affairs, the council reported that the picture "is not all bleak."

Fears that regional conflicts might develop into World War III have not materialized because the U.S. has maintained its strength, the council said. Most Western nations continue to enjoy steady economic growth and the "blessings of democracy," it observed.

New Nations Alert

The report also hailed the fact that developing nations, while avoiding any "bloc" commitment," are becoming increasingly aware of Communist danger and are making progress toward greater democracy.

This assertion of democratic aspirations "by the peoples of the 'third world' " combined with setbacks suffered by the Soviet Union and Communist China "are among the brightest spots in the international picture," the report said.

It repeated labor's endorsement of foreign aid programs, stressing that they should be channeled to make sure they reach the people in beneficiary nations. It also detailed AFL-CIO's support for international trade programs, provided they avoid undue hardship on a particular U.S. industry and its employes.

The council described AFL-CIO's extensive participation in the American Institute for Free Labor Development and the African-American Labor Center—programs to aid unions and democracy in Latin America and Africa, respectively; as well as its work in the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions and the Intl. Labor Organization.

Boost in Worker Buying Power Called Vital to Balanced Economy

Bal Harbour, Fla.—American workers must receive a fair share of the expanding economy they have helped create, the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared.

If the nation is to achieve healthy economic expansion and move towards full employment, the council said in its report to the convention, there must be a boost in worker buying power to overcome the present imbalance in the economy.

Worker buying power has lagged while corporate profits and outlays for plants and machines have soared, the council observed.

An improved balance in the economy is essential, it declared, "to provide the framework for continued, healthy economic expansion without booms and busts."

To achieve a balanced economy, the report urged two broad courses of action:

● "Increases in the buying power of wages and salaries are required to provide workers with a fair share of the benefits of economic progress and a foundation for the needed expansion of consumer markets, which account for about 70 percent of total national production.

● "The government's tax policies should aim at a fair distribution of the tax burden, based on ability to pay, and to maintain an improved balance in the private economy between expanding productive capacity and rising demand for goods and services.

Economic Yardsticks

In describing the persisting lack of balance in the economy, the council used these yardsticks to indicate what happened between 1960 and the first half of 1967:

● Corporate profits after payment of taxes skyrocketed 74.5 percent.

● Dividend payments to stockholders soared almost 69.5 percent.

● Total wage and salary payments to all employes in the entire economy increased only 54 percent —reflecting increased employment as well as the wage and salary gains of individual workers.

● Total after-tax personal income to all persons in the entire economy rose merely 53 percent —also reflecting increased employment as well as the income gains of individuals.

● Weekly after-tax take-home pay of an average factory worker with three dependents increased only 24 percent and, in terms of buying power, merely 11 percent.

● Real compensation per hour for all employes in the private economy, including executives and supervisors, increased only 2.6 percent a year in the six years from 1960 through 1966. But the real volume of output per manhour in the entire private economy rose at a yearly rate of 3.6 percent. The vast majority of wage and salary earners have not received a fair share of the benefits of the national economy's expansion.

"While profits skyrocketed during the 1960s, wage increases have been moderate," the council pointed out.

"In 1966 and the first half of 1967, the pace of wage increases stepped up as workers and unions sought to catch up in a period of more rapidly rising living costs. However, the pace of rising wages in the 1960s has remained moderate.

"Between 1960 and the first half of 1967, average hourly earnings of factory workers—including the effect of overtime pay—increased from $2.26 to $2.80, an average yearly increase of 3.4 percent. In contract construction, the average yearly rise of hourly earnings was 4.1 percent—from $3.08 to $4.00.

"During those six and one-half years, part of the buying power of wage gains was washed out by the rise of living costs. The Consumer Price Index increased at an average yearly rate of 1.7 percent—1.3 percent per year in 1960-65 and 3.2 percent per year between 1965 and the first half of 1967.

Unit Costs Stable

"While employe compensation was rising modestly, productivity was rising more rapidly during most of this period. And the combination of rapidly increasing output per manhour with moderately rising employe compensation meant relatively stable costs of labor per unit of output."

In 1966 and the first half of 1967, the council said, productivity increased at a slower pace as economic activity slowed down. And worker compensation rose at a faster rate as workers sought to catch up and also meet rising living costs.

"These trends in wages, productivity and prices—in addition to the relatively excessive tax cuts on business income—help to explain the high profits and lagging rise of real wages of the 1960s," the council observed.

The report then focused on the lag in worker buying power:

"Between 1960 and the first half of 1967, the buying power of the weekly after-tax take-home pay of the average factory worker with three dependents increased at a yearly rate of only 1.7 percent. The gains were actually made between 1960 and 1965. In the year and one-half that followed, the average factory worker's buying power slipped as living costs rose more rapidly and weekly hours declined during the economic slowdown of the first half of 1967.

". . . This record reveals that the vast majority of wage and salary earners have not shared equitably in the benefits of the national economy's expansion in the 1960s," the council said.

Massive Effort Needed:

10-Point Plan Urged To End Urban Blight

The AFL-CIO Executive Council has reemphasized its call for a massive national effort to rebuild the cities, provide needed public facilities, overcome the housing shortage and to put the unemployed to work.

The council, in its report to the convention, set forth anew its wide-ranging program to meet a variety of problems caused by rapid social change and to crack the housing shortage.

"A planned national effort under federal leadership is needed," the council declared, "to apply the nation's resources of manpower, materials and money to meet the requirements of a rapidly growing urban population and at the same time provide a solid foundation for continued economic progress.

"Achievement of these objectives," the report said, "will require federal funds, planning and leadership. But it will depend, too, on the initiative and local implementation by the states and metropolitan area governments as well as the cooperation of private groups in society."

Reviewing the problems created by a fast-growing population, by the internal migration of millions of Americans, by the festering ills of the ghettos, the council said planned programs over the next decade or two are necessary "to revitalize American society."

It outlined these specific programs:

● "One million public service jobs for persons now unemployed or seriously underemployed" based on Congressional approval of a 4 billion program to fund federal, state and local government agencies and non-profit organizations for the creation of such jobs "at wages not less than the federal minimum wage."

● Two and a half million new housing units each year, including specific numbers of low-cost and moderate-cost housing, rent supplements, open housing in the suburbs and cities, urban renewal keyed to balanced neighborhoods and an adequately financed model cities program.

● Mass transit, improved and expanded, to meet "an urgent need in all metropolitan areas."

● A $2 billion a year grant-in-aid program to rebuild America's metropolitan areas through stepped-up facilities, such as water supplies, sewage systems, mass transit, schools, hospitals, daycare centers, playgrounds, libraries, museums, air and water pollution control systems.

● "A substantially expanded Neighborhood Youth Corps program to help youngsters remain in school and to provide work and training for those who have dropped out. . . ."

● Programs to assure "quality education for all" including special incentives to teachers in poverty areas, federal aid for More Effective School programs, and vocational training "realistically geared to the modern job market."

● Manpower training, linked with job placement and adequate training allowances, designed to lift the skills of the labor force.

● A restructuring of the public welfare assistance program based on need alone, with a federal minimum standard of payments and adequate federal funds.

● Relief of rural poverty by bringing workers under federal laws so they also can have the right to organize unions, the right to jobless pay and other protections, and through a wide range of federal programs.

● Continued labor-management efforts through bargaining to provide job security for workers.

● A federal inventory of needs for housing and public facilities based on current backlogs and estimated needs, with each state and metropolitan area developing similar inventories. These would provide the basis for national programs.

New U.S. Education Programs Hailed But Report Finds 'Significant Gaps'

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The federal government is financially committed to a variety of new programs designed to improve the quality and quantity of educational institutions at all levels.

But there is abundant evidence that many of these programs still contain "significant gaps," the AFL-CIO Executive Council told the federation's convention here.

In its report, the council pointed out that the U.S. Education Office, now in its 100th year, administers 70 federal programs, gives technical assistance to the states and conducts long-range educational planning.

It noted that the Elementary & Secondary Education Act, the largest of these programs, is helping more than 8 million disadvantaged children through special programs in over 17,000 communities.

The 89th Congress was cited for a "significant contribution" to education in alloting more than $1.3 billion in funds to help school districts provide quality education for low income families.

In spite of these and other "impressive statistics," the report stressed, the nation is "far short" of its educational goals because for too long American education was "primarily oriented to the needs of middle income families."

In one area, the council traced labor's efforts in Congress to defeat proposals that would weaken the enforcement of Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 which calls for school desegregation.

"Thirteen years after the historic 1954 Supreme Court decision and three years after the act was passed, 75 percent of the Negro children in southern and border states still attend all-Negro schools," the council noted.

And yet, it added, "the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare has been accused of over-zealousness in enforcing" the law.

One of the "gaps" in our educational system, the council emphasized, is that little federal aid is available to improve the salaries of nearly 1.8 million full time teachers.

Although teachers' salaries have improved somewhat in recent years, the report observed, few teachers yet have earnings commensurate with their training and competence "when compared with their fellow citizens."

"Labor continues its fight to meet this need particularly where teachers have been determined to form unions," the council asserted.

The report analyzed these other education programs:

Vocational Education Act—Its enactment in 1963 "has positively affected" the growth of vocational education throughout the U.S. The AFL-CIO believes, however, that it needs to be more specifically directed to helping youths "among minority groups in cities."

The Adult & Basic Education Act—It is beginning to meet the need of educating illiterate adults but "more classroom facilities are required" under this program.

Higher Education—The Bureau of Higher Education now administers a number of programs to loan money to students to pursue education beyond secondary school but current spending for these programs "does not and will not meet the needs of the country."

"If one point has been proven," the council said, "it is that the AFL-CIO position for the tuition-free principle" for students who wish to go to college "was never more relevant."

The report also listed labor's role in helping to achieve special educational programs for ghetto youths in New York and other cities and the expansion of education television.

The major battle now is to secure adequate funds for all federal education programs and keep them from being gutted, the council declared.

home and in the war against aggression in Viet Nam to avoid tragedy for the nation, he said.

The AFL-CIO, he emphasized, has always rejected the counsel of retreat "and we reject it now." He pointed to warnings from the Executive Council a year and a half before the Newark and Detroit riots that cutting back social programs could be "dangerous to society." The warning was not heeded "and the crisis has occurred" posing the need for crash programs that might never have been necessary.

Internally, Meany pointed up the 1.5 million growth in membership since the 1965 convention to a monthly average of 14.3 million during the first half of 1967. The growth, he said, was due to a better job of organizing and a partial breakthrough into areas that have traditionally resisted organizing.

Noting the success in organizing farm workers in California and Texas, he cited the many years of patient, unpublicized work of the AFL-CIO that laid the foundation for the current drives and victories.

A report by Schnitzler showed that the net worth of the federation increased $852,048 since 1965 to $5,698,000 and provided a detailed breakdown of the AFL-CIO's financial operations.

The section on the labor movement traces the farm worker organizing campaigns, the growth in membership of public employe unions at the federal, state and local level, the continuing success in organizing white collar and service workers and the bargaining rights gained for 477,250 workers through National Labor Relations Board elections since 1965.

Noting that the vigor and scope of opposition of anti-union employers has increased, the report said that organizing efforts have been accelerating and that "the level of emphasis on organizing and of standards of competence is at an all-time high in the labor movement."

The section on the national economy stressed that workers are not receiving a fair share of the expanding economy they have helped create and the resulting lag in workers' buying power "threatens to undermine the needed expansion of consumer markets by falling short of the economy's increasing ability to produce more goods and services, more efficiently."

The report expressed deep concern that the national need for full employment is still unmet and urged a continuing expansion of the economy to provide enough new jobs for those now unemployed, for the large number of those entering the labor force and for those displaced by new technologies and automation.

The economic analysis extended also to the urban crisis detailing its background and reiterating the council's 10-point broad-ranging program for meeting the critical needs of the millions caught up in the slums and ghettos.

Turning to international affairs, the council detailed its support of U.S. policy in Viet Nam, placing the blame for extending the war upon vast Soviet aid to North Viet Nam.

The council expressed its concern over the erosion of NATO and the "dissension and disarray" in the Atlantic community. It noted also that Soviet aid to the Arab nations is a bar to a peaceful Arab-Israeli settlement in the Middle East.

The council noted also the attempts by Communist "trade unions" to infiltrate free labor organizations around the globe and reaffirmed its policy of strongly opposing contacts and exchanges with these state-controlled "unions."

In the area of social security the council reviewed the continuing struggle to improve and overhaul the current law—a battle still in progress as the report went to press. It hailed the successful launching of the medicare program and called for extensive changes in the nation's welfare programs, unemployment insurance and workmen's compensation.

Major Unmet Needs

On education, the council found major unmet needs and significant gaps in present federal programs. It called for increased aid for vocational education, higher education and programs aiding functional illiterates.

The report stressed also the need for action to bring about total involvement of all AFL-CIO affiliates in the affairs of their communities as part of the continuing activity in the field of community services.

Terming the funds voted for the war on poverty "woefully inadequate," the council called for greater urgency on all fronts in pressing the attack on need and want with more funds "if we are to move the poor out of their intolerable conditions."

It noted that labor has been active on many fronts in the anti-poverty war with 3,000 local AFL-CIO leaders participating in community action programs.

Labor has historically been in the front ranks of those working toward more and better housing, the council said, citing a number of non-profit low and middle income housing projects sponsored by unions.

It deplored the fact of the drop-off in federally aided public housing units and called for a vigorous drive to win support for a more intensive attack on the massive housing problem facing the nation.

Congress Prodded

A call for Congress to enact civil rights legislation coupled with adequate funds for model cities, anti-poverty, housing, education and job training programs marks this section of the council's report.

The council detailed the areas in which AFL-CIO affiliates have been working toward developing equal job rights and noted the progress in merging segregated locals with only 142 of 60,000 still in this category.

In a section on labor and the law, the council reported on several major Supreme Court decisions, noting that "unions continued to maintain a good overall won-lost record and to score a number of major successes."

In a review on national legislative activities since the 1965 convention the council reported on 66 major pieces of legislation and noted the sharp shift from the progressive 89th Congress to the GOP-Dixiecrat dominated 90th Congress.

"The American labor movement is now fighting defensive battles against conservative, anti-labor efforts to undermine and undercut the gains achieved in the past," the council declared.

Labor made generally impressive gains at the state level the council noted in a section on state legislation, citing improvements in many areas of vital concern to unions.

Organized labor's efforts to effectively get its story to members and their neighbors in the suburbs highlighted the section on political activity. "Suburbs are the new frontier of politics," the report asserted. In many, the political potential, from a trade union point of view, is untapped."

The council said that the suburban COPE organization can be to a community what a grievance committee is to the workplace. "Implicit in our determination to 'go where the members live' is the necessity to identify what our members want and need," the council declared.

Looking toward the 1968 elections the council said "we are resolved to marshal our forces more vigorously and efficiently than ever before so that we may more truly serve the best interests of all our own constitutents—young and old, urban and suburban, black and white, affluent and poor."

The report covered also the operations of the AFL-CIO's 13 headquarters department and the various constitutional departments. The latter's reports are prepared separately by each department and transmitted without action or comment to the convention.

Labor Expands Role In Community Services

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Workers represented by AFL-CIO affiliates contributed nearly half a billion dollars to local united funds and community chests in the past two campaigns, the Executive Council reported to the AFL-CIO convention here.

The council's report described how union members have increasingly participated in the fund-collecting, joined in a wide range of community projects, contributed blood to Red Cross emergency banks and volunteered services in disasters.

There are now 170 full-time AFL-CIO Community Services representatives on the staffs of united funds, community chests and community health and welfare planning bodies in 114 communities, the council reported.

The council also pointed to a steady growth in the number of new community service committees established by state and local central bodies.

It described new programs, such as a debt counseling project in Minneapolis, a rehabilitation project in Iowa, a health-education project in Miami, Fla., a juvenile delinquency control project in Massachusetts and an arts project in Omaha.

It cited continuing community service programs being carried on by unions, such as summer camping for underprivileged youngsters, citizen training courses, consumer counseling and mental health projects.

A major function of the Dept. of Community Services, the report pointed out, has been to provide training of CSA representatives "in the field" through conferences held at universities and colleges and workshops at annual CSA national conferences.

Workshops Held

A number of regional and community workshops on disaster services also were sponsored by the department during the past two years, the council said.

The report described an agreement between CSA and the American Red Cross in 1965 for first aid training of union members in hazardous occupations. It has already given such training to "many thousands of building and construction workers," the council said.

It noted that AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph A. Beirne was elected president of the United Community Funds & Councils of America and viewed his election as indicative of labor's increasing role in community affairs.

"A community service program—in its broadest sense," the council said, "means active labor participation in community planning; in training for community leadership; in community action and development; in responsible citizenship.

"It also means the total involvement of all AFL-CIO affiliates and members in the total community. Only through such complete participation will unions, union members and all citizens be better served."

Minimum Wage Law Termed 'Giant Stride'

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Congress took "a giant stride toward meeting labor's goals" in the 1966 improvements in the wage-hour law but further action is needed, the Executive Council said.

The section of the council report dealing with the Fair Labor Standards Act made three key points:

- The 1966 amendments contain "the greatest package of improvements" since the wage-hour law was enacted in 1938. They brought 9.1 million more workers under the law's protection—including men and women employed in large restaurants, stores, hotels, farms, schools, hospitals and laundries. The minimum wage moves up to $1.60 next Feb. 1 for workers who had already been covered and in future years for newly-covered workers, with a $1.30 floor for farm workers.
- Effective enforcement is the key to fulfillment of the promise of the law, and AFL-CIO central bodies have been assigned a major watchdog role in assuring that workers in their communities are not shortchanged.
- Still outside the law's coverage are about 11 million workers, only part of whom are protected by state minimum wage laws. And the present wage floor and ceiling on hours remain below labor's objectives.

Further action will be needed, the council stressed, "to meet the objectives of a $2-an-hour minimum wage; universal coverage under the law; doubletime for overtime and a 35-hour workweek to help create job opportunities in an age of automation and a rapidly growing labor force."

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, the council report notes, has termed wage-hour improvements "the most potent single weapon in the war on poverty."

U.S., Bermuda Musicians in Pact

Establishment of a reciprocal working agreement between American and Bermuda musicians has been announced by Pres. Herman D. Kenin of the Musicians and Sec.-Gen. Charles Vaucrosson of the Bermuda Federation of Musicians & Variety Artists.

Principal terms of the agreement provide that:

Requests from the Bermuda union to AFM for listing of Bermuda musicians on AFM's "unfair" or "defaulters" listings will be handled by AFM in the same manner it handles such requests from its own locals.

AFM will approve contracts by its members for Bermuda engagements, but it will reject such contracts if the Bermuda union objects for reasons relating to its minimum scale or because the purchaser of the music has an "unfair" or "default" status in Bermuda.

Declares AFL-CIO Stronger Than Ever

labor movement who see trade unions becoming obsolete or part of the "establishment," and who "draw adverse comparisons between the modern labor movement and that of some mythical past period of crusading fervor and dynamic forward motion."

Tracing the course of American labor since the 1880's, he said the conclusion was clear that "year in and year out while adverse forces have chopped away at the stems and branches of our structure, new growth has always emerged and the roots of the trade union movement have extended deeply and firmly into the soil of American life."

Today, in the 1960's the trade union movement is meeting the beginning of a "new and challenging period of growth, change and response to the needs and opportunities of our times."

Meany read the record of the AFL-CIO in the following areas:

MEMBERSHIP: A growth of almost 1.5 million since 1965 with the growth reflecting gains in sectors of the labor force which have not in the past been responsive to organizing efforts.

The record is the more remarkable, he stressed, in face of a decline in membership in 45 affiliates because of technology, automation and other factors. Meany urged the delegates to read the analysis of membership growth in the December 1967 issue of the AFL-CIO American Federationist to dispel the "baloney that you sometimes hear or read about the state of the labor movement."

ORGANIZING: Vigorous and effective organizing work has been going on with the federation devoting more than one-fourth of its income to direct programs and activities in this area. Meany reviewed in detail the organizing of farm labor going back to 1959 resulting now in the creation of the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee which is winning new contracts with sharply improved benefits.

Citing the types of strikes and disputes that have attracted attention in the past few months—teachers, nurses, television and radio announcers and the Radio City Music Hall rockettes, Meany commented:

"Surely that proves something about the adaptability of the trade union movement and the instrument of collective bargaining to the needs of the changing times and the modern labor force."

COLLECTIVE BARGAINING: The performance in this area "continues to confound the critics and the soothsayers." While the obituary notices are being written, he noted, Americans continue to demonstrate their faith in bargaining "and new groups in our economy are learning to use it to their advantage."

The results of thousands of negotiations have brought "the most profound and revolutionary changes and improvements in the pattern of our national and family life." He spelled out the progress in vacation provisions as an example of the bringing of leisure time to working people—through bargaining.

CONSUMERS: The AFL-CIO has taken the lead in efforts to bring fair standards to the market place to prevent exploitation of working people as consumers because the problems of environment and of living and raising a family in "today's complex, crowded, urbanized and suburbanized society" have become as important as the problems of the work place itself.

CIVIL RIGHTS: The federation "furnished a very large part of the legislative talent and drive that accomplished the enactment of the most far-reaching civil rights program since the abolition of slavery." Neither of the former, pre-merger federations "had operations remotely approaching the calibre of the present Civil Rights Dept. of the AFL-CIO." Meany continued:

"It is no exaggeration to say that of all the major volunteer groups in our society — church, civic, social or economic — the trade union movement is the most completely integrated organization in America."

URBAN CRISIS: Stressing the 10-point program adopted by the federation and the concept that the federal government must become the employer of last resort and the landlord of last resort, Meany said that this wide range of measures is necessary to any real solution of the national problem of urban blight. There can be no retreat in the war on poverty and deprivation. America can afford and must afford this battle as it does the battle for human freedom in Viet Nam.

VIET NAM: The AFL-CIO is neither hawk, nor dove "nor chicken." It simply takes a trade union position that human freedom and democracy are values worth defending. In Viet Nam the overriding issue for the federation is the survival of the free trade union movement, the confederation of Viet Nam Workers (CVT) who want "our forces to stay until the independence and freedom of South Viet Nam are assured."

It is difficult to understand, said Meany, how any American trade unionist can advocate a course of action "that would abandon brother trade unionists of South Viet Nam to certain destruction." He declared he could not "comprehend how one who takes that position can be called a 'liberal.' "

Congress Passes Strong Meat Bill, Nears Vote on Poverty Compromise

the fiscal year which began last July 1 and $2.18 billion for fiscal 1969. It remains, of course, for both houses to sustain these totals when appropriations are voted. Pres. Johnson had requested $2.06 billion in a one-year extension; the House had cut this back to a one-year sum of $1.6 billion and the Senate had boosted it to $2.25 billion for 1968 and $2.4 billion for 1969.

One conferee reported there were 196 differences between the House and Senate versions of the anti-poverty bill and each had to be thrashed out and compromised.

The most important change in the nature of the anti-poverty program could be caused by an amendment sponsored by Rep. Edith Green (D-Ore.). In its original form, this would have opened the way for state, city or county elected officials to assume control of some 1,000 community action programs now operating.

The Green amendment was the major problem in the stalled conference negotiations. It was tempered somewhat, though conferees had differing interpretations as to how the complicated administrative change would work in practice.

Under the Green amendment, the elected city, county or state officials could designate themselves as community action agencies and create an administering board. The board would be made up of one-third from local government, one-third from the ranks of the poor and one-third from civic groups like labor, business, religious and others.

Since the original Green amendment did not specify the powers of this board, the conferees reportedly agreed it should plan and implement poverty programs, with the ultimate decisions resting with local officials.

The amendment was altered in other respects. One conferee reported some role was retained for the poor, though not as much as now exists; local government projects must be approved by OEO and OEO can take over a program if it finds it being run improperly. The date for "local control" was postponed a half-year to Feb. 1, 1969.

The Senate conferees also won their demand that, in retaining the present 20 percent of the cost required of local agencies, it can be in cash or "in kind" items such as office facilities, equipment and services. The House would have required that half the local share be in cash, a requirement which poorer communities protested as too burdensome.

While Republicans have vigorously opposed the local control amendment as a "city hall" patronage move, the conference committee's agreement will be put to a vote as a whole in House and Senate. Senate action was pending as the AFL-CIO News went to press while House action was expected for next week.

These were the major actions on the legislative front:

● On meat inspection, the tougher Senate version adopted in the main by the Senate-House conferees was aimed at some 15,000 meat plants selling entirely within state lines. Scandalous conditions in many of these plants produced strong consumer and labor demands for action. These plants produce about 9 million pounds of meat annually.

Matching federal grants are offered to bring state inspection on systems up to federal standards. If a state fails to act within two years, federal standards would be imposed. The secretary of agriculture also is given certain powers to clean up dirty conditions. Imported meats also now have to meet usually stricter U.S. standards.

● On education, the important three-year $14.5 billion program of aid to elementary and secondary schools survived a major attack by economy forces. The Senate defeated by 54 to 27 a slash of $2.5 billion proposed by Sens. Frank J. Lausche (D-Ohio) and Harry F. Byrd (D-Va.). With most of the funds slated for slum areas, Sen. Wayne Morse (D-Ore.) scored the economizers for "playing cheap politics with schoolchildren."

Final Senate action was being sought by Morse, the bill's floor manager, as the AFL-CIO News went to press.

● On adult education, the House passed and sent to the Senate a bill to continue for two years federal programs to educate some 24 million illiterate and "undereducated" adults. Adopted by 352-0, the bill authorizes $60 million for the year starting next July 1 to set up elementary school programs.

● On age discrimination, the House approved and sent to the White House a bill to ban job discrimination based on age. The labor-backed measure says a person between 40 and 65 cannot be refused a job or otherwise treated unfairly because of age. The ban also applies to unions and employment agencies.

New Membership Mark Set by AFL-CIO Unions

Bal Harbour, Fla.—A surge in union growth sends the AFL-CIO into its seventh convention with the paid membership of its affiliates at the highest level since the merger in 1955, the Executive Council reported.

Membership, based on average per capita payments over the past two years, stood at 13,781,000 as of Sept. 30, including the ranks of directly affiliated local unions. This compares with 12,919,000 two years earlier.

Even more significant, membership figured on average per capita payments for the first six months of 1967 alone was up to 14.3 million, an increase of nearly 1.5 million since the last convention.

Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler reported that the federation's net worth rose by $852,048.47 in the two-year fiscal period ended last June 30.

Income during the two-year period totaled $21,071,224.53 while operating expenses amounted to $20,219,175.96. Biggest share of the income — $18,470,160 — came from per capita taxes paid by national and international unions and organizing committees. An additional $1,769,323 came from directly affiliated local unions in the form of per capita taxes, initiation and reinstatement fees.

Net Worth Reported

The net worth of the general fund, represented by the excess of assets over liabilities was $5,698,000 as of June 30 as against $4,845,951 two years earlier.

Schnitzler's report included 14 statements, 11 of which were devoted to details of income and expenses and the others to special funds. A financial report of the AFL-CIO pension plan trustees also was included in the section. All statements were certified by Main Lafrentz & Co., certified public accountants.

Labor Renews Drive to Set Nation on Progressive Path

PRES. JOHNSON GREETS cheering, placard-waving delegates to the AFL-CIO convention as he joins Federation Pres. George Meany on the platform to deliver a major televised address to the nation.

President Hails Labor's Role:

Cheering Delegates Give LBJ Solid Support on Programs

By David L. Perlman

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Cheering, standing, placard-waving delegates to the AFL-CIO convention showed Pres. Johnson and a nationwide television audience what they had repeatedly said in resolutions—American labor stands behind LBJ and his programs.

The President spoke to all the American people from the AFL-CIO convention.

He talked of war and peace—of his firm determination "to hold the line we have drawn against aggression" until Hanoi is willing to negotiate peace.

He spoke of historic progress at home and of the crucial role of the 1968 elections in determining whether the nation will continue to move forward—or whether it will turn back.

The President's address was carried to the nation by all three major television networks.

He chose the AFL-CIO convention as his platform, Johnson indicated, because American labor has always stood "in the first rank" of a continuing "battle for freedom and progress."

Labor has fought consistently "for the greatest good for the greatest number," Johnson said, "for the kind of programs that would make this country better for your children than it had been for you."

And it had answered with a "resounding yes" the question asked time and again by American soldiers, "are the folks back home really behind us?"

The answer given by the AFL-CIO convention, Johnson told his nationwide audience, came through so clearly and strongly "that even Hanoi cannot mistake its meaning or misinterpret what it says."

The crowded convention hall erupted into a wildly cheering demonstration when the President arrived. Hastily improvised placards and union standards were paraded through the aisles. Thirty-eight times during the half-hour speech, delegates broke in with applause, cheers or standing ovations.

The President read the roll of the programs that he and the labor movement fought for and won.

He spoke of the accomplishments of medicare, aid to education, minimum wage protection. He talked of the battle against poverty, of historic progress on civil rights, or immigration reform, an unprecedented 81 months of national prosperity.

Conservation measures, pollution control, a long list of consumer protection laws, including the meat inspection measure just sent to the White House—all these and more,

Union Solidarity Keys Aid to Copper Strikers

By Eugene A. Kelly

Bal Harbour, Fla.—A united labor movement formed ranks behind 60,000 members of 26 unions on strike since July 15 against the "barons" of the copper industry. Backing their promises of support "to the finish," delegates stepped to the microphones at the AFL-CIO convention here to pledge initial contributions of nearly $550,000 for the strikers and their families.

The convention, besides pledging its firm backing, urged the Johnson Administration to "renounce publicly" any intention of breaking the strike with a Taft-Hartley injunction or of using the government's stockpile of copper so long as the industry declines to bargain with its unions.

A special fact-finding commission, the convention declared in its resolution of support, "could throw the pitiless glare of national publicity on these greedy giants" and force them to make a collective bargaining settlement with their employes.

"These public-be-damned, employe-be-damned corporations must be dragged belatedly kicking and screaming into the 20th century," the convention resolved.

Convention Girds For '68 Election

By Saul Miller

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO squared away for two years of hard and determined work as the leader of the nation's progressive forces, dedicated to continuing unity and set to wage an all-out fight against the conservative threat in the 1968 elections.

In a four-day convention climaxed by an enthusiastic demonstration of support for Pres. Johnson as he spoke to the nation from the platform of the AFL-CIO, 943 delegates strongly reaffirmed the leadership of Pres. George Meany and fashioned a program to meet the challenges and the problems of the late 1960s.

Meany summed up in a post-convention statement that "the American trade union movement is in fine shape and this convention proved that." Noting the need for a major effort to achieve the programs adopted by the delegates, he added "I am confident that, at every level of the trade union movement, we'll get that kind of work."

Re-elected for a seventh term as president of the AFL-CIO along with Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler and the 27 members of the Executive Council, Meany predicted that "there is a great future for this organization."

The vigor and vitality was demonstrated in the sessions that witnessed a wide open debate on the war in Viet Nam culminating in a dramatic overwhelming vote of support for the Administration's position, and a classic example of trade union solidarity as delegates rallied to the striking copper workers with nearly $550,000 and firm pledges of continuing support.

109 Resolutions Adopted

It marked the work of the convention committees as they dealt with 263 separate resolutions and proposals and the adoption by the delegates of 109 programs and policies covering every aspect of American life and relations with other nations. Only 22 were rejected while 48 were referred to the Executive Council for further study or action. The others were either covered by other resolutions or policy statements or withdrawn. (Index, Page 2.)

By unanimous action the convention amended the AFL-CIO Constitution to increase the flexibility and efficiency of the organization and simplify its government.

It heard a dozen speakers led by Pres. Johnson and including five cabinet members, top figures in the Administration, leaders of the free world trade union movements—all hailing the progressive programs and leadership of the AFL-CIO, and asking labor's continued help in dealing with the difficult problems at home and abroad.

Blended in with the speakers from the platform and the reports of the committee chairmen and secretaries were the voices of the delegates, pointing up the need for action in certain areas, voicing dissent on a few resolutions, explaining the wider impact and thrust of a program.

Recurring themes in the resolutions and the discussions were the need to step up organizing to expand even further the membership gains of the past few years, a reassertion of the strength of collective bargaining and the gains it has brought to workers, a strong defense of the right to strike in a free society.

Dominating much of the convention was the theme of the serious challenge to the future of the trade union movement posed by the

Attack on Unions Spurs All-Out COPE Drive

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The developing political threat to the trade union movement must be met by a maximum mobilization of labor's resources behind COPE in the 1968 elections, the convention asserted.

Approved by the convention was a resolution urging "every affiliate, every union leader, every union staff person, every union member to cooperate with COPE in every possible way to assure that the conservative attack on the labor movement will be repulsed where it must be repulsed, at the polls next Nov. 5."

The resolution pointed out that in 1966 liberalism suffered a defeat at the polls with the loss of more than 48 liberal seats in the House. The story in Congress since that time "has been one of retreat from the great social welfare programs of the past few years."

With this retreat has come "an ominous build-up in Congress," the convention noted "of a campaign for restrictive new legislation aimed at weakening labor unions," a planned and coordinated campaign by the conservative Republican-Dixiecrat

ALL-OUT SUPPORT of 60,000 copper workers on strike since July 15 against eight nonferrous metals firms is urged at the convention by AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Ralph Helstein, who heads the Packinghouse Workers. Union spokesmen pledged contributions of nearly $550,000 to swell the fund established by the AFL-CIO with a $50,000 donation.

Book Boycott Pressed Against Kingsport Press

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Action to "continue and intensify" the boycott against Kingsport Press, first endorsed by the 1963 AFL-CIO convention, was voted by the 1967 convention here. Delegates urged that all segments of organized labor "give all possible publicity" to the fact that World Book Encyclopedia and Childcraft series of books are being printed and bound by strikebreakers at the Kingsport, Tenn., plant.

"Such books should not be purchased by union members," the convention said, urging each AFL-CIO affiliate to "renew its efforts to rid the school systems of books produced by Kingsport Press."

A resolution asked that the boycott, directed by the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept. be "regarded as a continuing problem and of paramount importance and concern" to organized labor in every community.

The strike of five unions at Kingsport began in March 1963 by vote of more than 1,000 workers in protest against company refusal to meet the wages and working conditions of comparable firms in the printing industry. The unions are the Bookbinders, Printing Pressmen, Stereotypers & Electrotypers, Machinists and Typographers. Their resolution informed the convention that:

● Kingsport Press, after recruiting strikebreakers and "pressuring union members to scab against their fellow workers," finally succeeded in obtaining National Labor Relations Board elections in which strikers were not permitted to vote and which resulted in the decertification of all unions in the plant, once the biggest book-printery in the Americas.

● The plant is "now operated solely by scabs and strikebreakers and more than 1,000 union members have permanently lost their jobs after having undergone great privation" in standing fast against this "unfair and callous employer," the resolution said.

● The plight of these workers and the effect of the "substandard and unfair operation of this plant" is properly of concern to delegates and affiliates of the AFL-CIO, it continued, noting that the unfair products of the struck firm are textbooks and encyclopedias sold to public and private schools and paid for by the tax dollars or tuition payments of trade unionists.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany took the microphone to declare "we have a right to say that public money, our money, is not spent in this manner. So I plead with everyone to give continued support to these Kingsport strikers. I think we are going to win out in the end."

Pres. Anthony J. DeAndrade of the Printing Pressmen reported earlier to the Union Label Trades convention that the five unions involved in the strike have paid out more than $10 million to help support strikers and their families.

At the AFL-CIO convention, he urged all of labor to "make this fight its fight" and to work at the local level with unions and central bodies to ask boards of education not to buy "strike-breaker-made books."

Dangers Cited In Research Funds Use

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO has asked Congress to take a close look at the $15 billion Federal Research and Development effort, warning that this vast program has an "enormous" potential for monopoly, waste and adverse effect on industrial location.

"The impact on this nation's economic and social institutions, policies and programs can be profound," the resolution adopted by the convention delegates said.

The resolution also expressed support for legislation to establish a national policy dealing with the issuance of patents created at federal expense. Title should be held by the U.S. and placed in the public domain under royalty-free cross-licensing provisions, the resolution said, observing that such a policy is now lacking in defense and space programs.

The convention additionally backed legislation aimed at prohibiting requirements by private industry that employes waive their rights to their inventions. It also opposed any rise in patent fees.

'Runaway' Films Curb Endorsed

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The convention put organized labor's support behind Hollywood unions uniting to curb "runaway" motion picture and TV commercial production overseas. The issue was referred to the Executive Council "for examination and implementation."

Variety, the newspaper of the entertainment industry, reported from Hollywood that the problem has reached a near-disaster state and said a meeting has been set for January of talent guild and craft unions representing some 30,000 workers to seek a remedy.

Vietnamese Labor Aids Copper Strike

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Twelve members of Vietnamese unions, sitting as observers and guests at the AFL-CIO convention, sent this note which Pres. Meany read to the delegates:

"The team of the Confederation of Vietnamese Workers at the convention send you this with their complete sympathy and moral support. The small sum of money here is only a symbolic sign of their support to the copper workers' strike."

With the note was $50 in cash. The CVT represents bus and taxi drivers, dockworkers, fishermen, tenant farmers, plantation workers and provincial councils.

Jobs Held Key To Problem of Youth Crime

Bal Harbour, Fla. — More jobs for unemployed youth would mean less crime in the streets of America, Atty. Gen. Ramsey Clark declared.

He told the AFL-CIO convention that "crime committed by youth has increased immensely" while the adult crime rate has shown little change in recent years.

"In every crime-plagued area," Clark said, "there is heavy unemployment and the jobless rate is greatest of all among teenagers in the labor market.

Clark urged unions to "work with our youth . . . show them that we care . . . instill a respect for the rights of others."

The nation must strive for "full employment without discrimination," Clark said, and opportunity for advancement on the job.

He warned, however, against neglect of law enforcement and charged that the overall level of police protection is "generations behind the times."

Clark urged Congress to enact Pres. Johnson's recommendations to provide federal grants for local law enforcement.

Law enforcement remains primarily a local obligation, Clark noted. There are only 700 United States marshals in the entire nation, he said, and "this is the way it has to be. This nation does not want a national police force."

But at the local level, with federal support in helping to bring it about, there must be "excellence in modern police forces . . . with qualifications that will bring the very best from our youth to their service, with constant training . . . intense care in areas of police-community relations."

Unions Rally Aid To Copper Strike

through" to ultimate victory "no matter how long it takes." The delegates voted unanimously by rising vote to stand behind their fellow unionists on strike at the mines, mills and smelters of the Big Four of the nonferrous metals industry, which with four smaller firms produce 90 percent of the U.S. supply of copper, lead and zinc.

It is "quite evident," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told the convention, that the copper companies and their "giant combine" are a "throwback" to the days when the captains of industry ruled with an iron fist.

The strike is "a little different from the average strike," he said. "This is not just a question of a strike for more wages or better working conditions. This is really an effort to destroy the unity" that the Steelworkers and 25 other unions forged in setting up a coordinated bargaining structure early in 1967 to prevent the industry from playing one union against another, as they had successfully done for almost a century of unchallenged domination.

The resolution endorsed by the delegates pointed out that the American copper industry is "vital to our national welfare." It employs more than 100,000 workers in its mines and plants, and has "reaped a rich harvest of red metal" from the soil while maintaining domination by a "small handful of large corporations who have grown wealthy and powerful from the labors of their workers."

After the Steelworkers and the former Mine, Mill & Smelter Workers merged in 1967, they invited other interested unions to coordinate their bargaining policies and their goals. The "so-called negotiations which ensued were a farce," the resolution declared. The companies met but they did not bargain. Suddenly they "pulled a Boulware technique on the unions," the resolution said. Each company made a "first, last, untouchable, unbargainable offer"—one that was rejected as "cheap, inadequate and unacceptable."

The convention agreed: "The major copper corporations have threatened to starve their workers into surrender. They are using their record-breaking profits to finance a war against their employes. They are determined to break the strike. They must be defeated."

USWA Vice Pres. Joseph Molony expressed thanks on behalf of the strikers to Pres. Meany and the Executive Council for their support, to the federation's Industrial Union Dept. and "to so many in this room who have contributed food, money and manpower to sustain 60,000 copper workers" and their families.

The council gave $50,000 for strike relief and established a fund to which all affiliates were urged to contribute.

A score of veteran union leaders took the floor of the convention to emphasize the importance of the strike.

Abel Calls Roll

USWA Pres. I. W. Abel read the roll of all the unions allied with the Steelworkers in the copper strike: Auto Workers, Boilermakers, Bricklayers, Carpenters, Chemical Workers, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, Iron Workers, Laborers. Locomotive Engineers, Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen, Machinists, Molders, Office & Professional Employes, Operating Engineers, Painters, Pattern Makers, Plumbers, Railroad Trainmen, Railway Carmen, Conductors, Sheet Metal Workers, Switchmen and Teamsters. All are AFL-CIO affiliates except four.

IAM Sec.-Treas. Matthew De More reported that, as of two weeks before, his union had spent $1.3 million for strike support and added: "If it is going to cost 10 times more, we will stand shoulder to shoulder with all the other unions . . . to see that this strike is brought to a successful conclusion."

Convention Maps Course for Progress

Girds Trade Union Movement To Counter Conservative Threat

conservative coalition in Congress and its bid for control of the next Congress with resulting anti-labor and anti-progress legislation.

The convention's reaction was expressed in the resolution on political action in which it declared that the developing political threat to the trade union movement must be met by a maximum mobilization of labor's resources behind COPE in the 1968 elections.

A meeting of the AFL-CIO General Board during the convention heard a detailed analysis of the situation in Congress and the political problems coming up next year with Meany summing up that the federation was neither optimistic nor pessimistic about 1968 but simply determined to mount the most extensive drive ever.

In terms of national programs the convention took these positions:

- Gave Congress a blueprint for action to protect the health, safety and buying power of the American consumer.
- Called for an expansion of the war on poverty by Congress and the Administration and by labor at the local level.
- Reaffirmed its conviction that the American economy can support the extension of social advances at home while meeting the needs of Viet Nam and called for further action by the government to implement the policies spelled out in the Employment Act of 1946.
- Spelled out its determination to achieve full equality for all minority groups in all aspects of American life, noting the accomplishments to date and the long distance still to be traveled.
- Called for a comprehensive national health insurance program as the key to dealing effectively with the mounting problem of health care.
- Urged a beefed-up drive on air and water pollution to correct the present weaknesses in funds and enforcement.
- Detailed specific programs for the development, management and conservation of natural resources for the benefit of all citizens.
- Assailed extremists of both the right and left as a continuing threat to American life.
- Called for a massive national effort to provide quality education for America's youth, regardless of race, background or income.
- Reasserted the need for minimum federal standards for unemployment insurance and workmen's compensation because of inadequate state laws.
- Urged a national effort to humanize technological change to alleviate the damage and disruption caused by rampant automation geared to engineering and financial concepts.
- Stressed the continuing need for major improvements in social security benefits and public assistance programs.
- Cited the need for enactment of legislation setting out a comprehensive national manpower policy keyed to a commitment to full employment, making the government the employer of last resort.
- Called again for a clearly warranted increase in the minimum wage to $2 an hour, coverage of all workers and a 35 hour workweek.

The convention's strong reaffirmation of support for the Johnson Administration's policies in Viet Nam to halt Communist aggression in Southeast Asia was backed by a series of other resolutions dealing with international affairs:

- On international trade the convention made clear that its support for expanded trade involves increased employment and progress at home and among America's allies does not extend to the undercutting of U.S. wages and working conditions.
- The delegates stressed their concern over the cutbacks in foreign aid and the need to expand economic assistance to the underdeveloped nations.
- In a review of the international situation, the convention said the principal threat to world peace and freedom comes from communism's "imperialistic drive." It asked a strengthening of the Atlantic Alliance and assurances that the U.S. has not abandoned Europe because of its commitment in Viet Nam.
- Progress and continuing problems were noted in resolutions dealing with Latin America and Africa. In both areas, a strengthened trade union and cooperative role in developing the economies was urged. In the Middle East, the convention asked direct negotiations between Israel and the Arab nations to bring a lasting peace. It condemned Soviet arms aid to aggressive Egyptian and Syrian governments.
- A resolution on the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions reaffirmed the AFL-CIO's strong support for continuation of the ICFTU's ban on trade union exchanges with the government-controlled unions of totalitarian countries.

In the area of labor relations and internal federation activities the convention took these actions:

- Cited the gains in AFL-CIO membership as fresh evidence that American workers recognize that trade unionism and collective bargaining provide the surest machinery for economic and social progress.
- Pledged full support for the continuing drive to organize farm workers, noting the dramatic and substantial progress and the dedication of the farm workers themselves.
- Called for a Presidential executive order to establish the policy that willful and repeated violators of the National Labor Relations Act shall not be given federal contracts.
- Urged basic changes in the NLRA to make a reality out of the right of workers to organize and bargain collectively, including repeal of Section 14(b) which allows "right-to-work" laws, ending of interminable delays in handling unfair labor practices cases and correction of the procedure governing the issuance of mandatory court orders.
- Reaffirmed the strong, overriding opposition to compulsory arbitration.
- Backed the eventual creation of a labor college starting as a training institute for union officers and staff. A feasibility study is currently under way.
- Pledged labor's continued support to its broad-ranging community services program and called for stepped-up participation of unions and union members in the voluntary health and welfare field.
- Reaffirmed the long-standing policy that all applications for affiliation or reaffiliation with the AFL-CIO should be given consideration by the council in light of federation policies and standards.

943 Delegates Attend Convention

Bal Harbour, Fla. — The final report of the credentials committee at the labor movement's seventh constitutional convention showed 943 delegates in attendance.

Delegates to the top policy-making body of the AFL-CIO served on committees, acted on resolutions and heard numerous guest speakers. They represented 127 national and international unions, five AFL-CIO departments, 46 state bodies, 180 local central bodies, 16 directly-affiliated local unions. Also present were three fraternal delegates.

STATE OF THE UNION address by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany to the convention reported that "the trade union movement is a more vital, a more vigorous and a more effective force for progress today than ever before."

Air Dispatchers Backed on Rules

Bal Harbour, Fla.—A call for a change in federal regulations to provide for the use of certificated aircraft dispatchers on flights of military men and their families, as well as vital defense cargo, was approved by the AFL-CIO convention.

A resolution noted that scheduled U.S. air carriers hired to transport passengers, cargo and mail are covered by federal laws requiring the "release, monitoring and control" of flights by federally certificated dispatchers. It urged extension of this protection to hundreds of flights around the world by scheduled and non-scheduled air carriers on contract to the military.

Wirtz Praises Record Of Constructive Action

Bal Harbour, Fla.—American unions have demonstrated how to channel protest into constructive action, Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz declared.

Wirtz told AFL-CIO convention delegates that U.S. labor history "has been the history of turning protest into accomplishment, of counting every single gain a reason for taking the next step forward, of never tearing anything down without building something better in its place."

The secretary of labor was the first of a number of cabinet members to address the convention—so many that Wirtz described the gathering as "this first joint convention of the AFL-CIO and the President's cabinet."

In a more serious vein, he told the delegates that the cause of the participation of so many high Administration officials was that much of the "unparalleled" accomplishments of the Johnson Administration "would never have happened if it had not been for organized labor."

The reason, Wirtz said, could be found in the "report on the 90th Congress" section of the Dec. 2 issue of the AFL-CIO News.

Wirtz read over the list of roll call issues on which the AFL-CIO graded Congress. Only one of the 12, he said, "could be considered in any way a special interest measure as far as labor is concerned." The others, he noted, dealt with subjects such as model cities, aid to education, poverty, rat control.

"If there are any other organizations" with a comparable record of working in the broad public interest, said Wirtz, the cabinet members "will be glad to be invited to those conventions, too, and we will be there bright-eyed and bushy-tailed."

Wirtz expressed his and the Administration's growing concern with the threat of inflation, declaring "there is a danger where there was not before that wages and prices will move up to the point where the gains are as nothing."

"The issues of stopping inflation aren't easy," he said. "The answers aren't clear." Enactment of the President's tax increase proposal is a "minimum" essential step, he urged.

Later Wirtz told newsmen that the Administration has no intention of seeking wage-price control legislation and does not plan to revive "decimal point" guidelines.

At the convention, Wirtz spoke directly to the visiting trade unionists from 42 nations who were attending the session, telling them not to be misled by dissension among Americans.

"There is no real division here in America about the things that really count," he declared. "There is no real issue in this country about whether we mean to move backward or to stand still or to move forward."

Looking at the delegates representing millions of trade unionists in the United States, Wirtz concluded:

"This is the real America in this hall today, and in the months ahead the real America is going to be standing up."

Convention Hails Meany: 'Courageous, Determined'

Text of the convention's resolution on George Meany:

We in the AFL-CIO are deeply proud that the principles and practices of democracy are inherent in our movement, whether on the floor of this convention or in the councils of the smallest local union. The policies adopted at this convention reflect a consensus of 14 million working people; 14 million members of American trade unions, whose views are represented by the delegates assembled here. The true substance of the labor movement is the people who comprise it.

But in any democratic institution, whether it be a government or a union or any other undertaking that has a substantive role to fulfill, another element is needed. There must be something more than the free expression of the will of the people, if their will is to have any influence on the course of events. That other essential element, the one that makes democracy meaningful is leadership; for without leadership, the purest democracy will flounder.

The AFL-CIO is not floundering, and it has never floundered during its 12 years of united life. For we, and the nation, are fortunate beyond measure that the AFL-CIO has had leadership from its inception—strong, courageous and determined leadership; flexible in meeting new problems, but never at the cost of sacrificing principle to expediency.

Such has been the leadership of the president of the AFL-CIO, George Meany.

Therefore be it resolved that we, the delegates to the seventh biennial convention of the AFL-CIO, on our own behalf and that of the 14 million workers we are honored to represent, express to George Meany our profound appreciation of his strength and wisdom as leader of the American labor movement, and of his inspiring effectiveness as spokesman for the cause of progress in America and the cause of freedom for all mankind.

'Massive Effort' Needed:

Quality Education Linked to U.S. Aid

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Labor called for a "massive national effort" to provide quality education for America's youth, "wherever they may live, whatever their race or national background, whatever their family income."

To accomplish this, the AFL-CIO convention said, there must be "full federal partnership in the financing of education at all levels from pre-kindergarten programs through adult education."

The cities and states simply don't have the financial resources, the resolution declared.

A companion resolution pointed to the need for continued improvement in vocational education—a problem "highlighted by the high unemployment rate among young people."

It cited the major accomplishments stemming from legislation of recent years in updating vocational training, raising its status and expanding and updating facilities.

Nevertheless, it stressed, the great majority of youngsters leave school without preparation "for the world of work."

The convention called for a unified occupational training system in the public schools, an increase in the number of occupations for which training is available, and adequate funds for these programs.

The general education resolution pointed up the need to raise the quality of education, especially in the inner-city schools.

It said the evidence is that most inner-city schools "have utterly failed" to teach "the basic reading and arithmetical skills which are the foundation of all future learning."

Yet the tools are at hand to overcome these problems, the resolution noted. Smaller classes to permit individualized instruction are the key. New educational technology, experimental programs such as the "more effective schools" program initiated by the American Federation of Teachers, all "hold great promise for the improvement of slum and ghetto schools."

The convention cited the Teacher Corps as evidence that "able young Americans will step forward to serve in the nation's poverty schools if they are offered imaginative training and support."

Learning is stimulated when schools have children from a wide range of racial, economic and cultural backgrounds, the resolution noted.

It said that "where ghetto schools are an inevitable consequence of urban housing patterns, then massive resources must be poured into those schools to compensate for the educational handicap which stems from the very fact that they are ghetto schools."

Democracy must come into the school system itself, the AFL-CIO said, through collective bargaining and greater teacher participation in educational plans.

The resolution noted with pride labor's steadfast support of public education over the years, back to the fight for free schools.

TRADE UNIONISTS from 42 nations throughout the world were attentive observers of the AFL-CIO convention. The 174 foreign visitors came from Latin America and Asia, Europe and Africa.

All Officers Re-elected Unanimously

Bal Harbour, Fla. — George Meany was elected to his seventh term as president of the AFL-CIO by a unanimous convention that also returned to office Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler and the 27-member Executive Council,.

Meany's name was placed in nomination by Vice Pres. Peter Schoemann, president of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters, Meany's union, and was seconded by Raymond Corbett, president of the New York AFL-CIO.

Delegates rose to their feet to signal with applause his election by acclamation.

Schnitzler was nominated by Daniel P. Conway, president of the American Bakery & Confectionery Workers, Schnitzler's union. The seconding speech was made by Vincent J. Murphy, president of the New Jersey AFL-CIO.

The 27 members of the Executive Council were elected by a unanimous vote of the convention, three of them for the first time—William Pollack, Max Greenberg and John H. Lyons.

Communism's 'Imperialistic Drive' Called Chief Threat to World Peace

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Peace and freedom are in danger in all areas of the world, with the principal threat coming from communism's "imperialistic drive," an AFL-CIO convention resolution warned.

Weapons used, the federation declared, range "from open aggression in Viet Nam to war by proxy in the Middle East, from diplomatic intrigues to political pressure and propaganda."

The overall goal remains "world conquest and domination," the AFL-CIO said. Because the Soviet Union is still the most powerful Communist country, it is "the most dangerous."

In Moscow, as in Peking, Hanoi and Havana, the resolution stressed, the United States is considered "enemy Number 1—the strongest obstacle in their expansionist ambitions. In this regard, there is unanimous agreement among the otherwise feuding members of the Communist camp."

The resolution expressed concern at signs of the weakening of the Atlantic Alliance and questioned the value of the proposed nonproliferation treaty in view of fears of European nations that it would expose them to "atomic blackmail by Moscow."

To dispel "unjustified apprehensions" that the United States has abandoned Europe because of its heavy commitments in Viet Nam, the resolution opposes reduction in the number of U.S. troops in Europe and asks new steps to strengthen the unity of the Atlantic alliance.

It urged the United States to propose a reform of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization by 1969 to "increase its military power and simultaneously invigorate it as a political instrument."

The convention called for the admission of Great Britain to the European Common Market and asked "new initiatives" to end the division of Germany.

A resolution on Latin America noted some "encouraging achievements" under the Alliance for Progress.

But many countries still suffer from weak economies, inflation, maldistribution of land, political instability, dictatorial regimes, poor health and lack of schooling, it stressed.

Despite solemn pledges of basic trade union rights, there are still countries where "trade union freedoms and the right of labor to participate in the planning of social and economic development are being denied."

The convention reiterated the AFL-CIO's strong support for the free trade unions of Latin America and praised the work of ORIT and the AIFLD.

It warned that the problems of Latin America "can never be cured by an arms race," but only by "genuine deep-going social and economic reforms."

A resolution on the Middle East urged direct negotiations between Israel and the Arab nations "with a view of ending all hostilities, fixing definitive and secure borders, obtaining an enduring peace."

It urged that the United States refrain from economic or military assistance to any country which refuses to enter into negotiations for a permanent peace settlement.

The convention denounced the Soviet Union's role in "arming the aggressive Egyptian and Syrian regimes."

It urged aid from industrially developed countries to help overcome poverty in the Middle East and help develop "prosperous and peaceful democracies."

It expressed the AFL-CIO's solidarity with Histadrut, the Israeli labor federation, and said it counts on Histadrut "to set the pace in helping the Arab population now under Israel law to attain equal economic, social and political treatment."

A resolution on Africa viewed serious problems of political instability in the newly-independent nations—including the Congo and Nigeria, with 40 percent of the population of Black Africa.

To strengthen the economies of the African nations, much more needs to be done in assistance from the United States and other nations, the convention said.

It urged assistance also for "developing and strengthening the democratic institutions of African society," including the trade unions.

The resolution welcomed a reversal of some past tendencies to make unions an arm of the government. It stressed that social justice must accompany economic growth and trade unions and cooperatives must have key roles in their nation's economies.

French Labor Conveys Message of Solidarity

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The leader of the democratic French labor federation told the AFL-CIO convention that Force Ouvriere will soon celebrate its 20th anniversary in a position of strength and independence.

Andre Bergeron, general secretary of Confederation Force Ouvriere, also reported that FO differs with French Pres. Charles De Gaulle on two important international questions:

He said FO favors Britain's admission to the common market and also blames United Arab Republic Pres. Abdel Nasser for the Middle East crisis. De Gaulle has vetoed Britain's applications for market membership and called Israel the aggressor in the Mid-East.

Bergeron recalled how FO was established early in 1948 with American labor's help after Communist elements had captured the leadership of the CGT, the General Confederation of Workers, and plunged the workers into political strikes in the winter of 1947.

In a speech delivered by a translator, Bergeron told the delegates that FO will soon celebrate its 20th birthday and "is absolutely independent of any political party, of the employers and the government of our country."

What distinguishes free trade unions from the so-called unions of Communist countries, Bergeron said, is a fundamental difference of conception, adding:

"We are partisans of free trade unionism. They are subordinated to the power of the state. We believe in the freedom of man, in human freedom. They uphold a system of oppression."

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany thanked Bergeron and read a congratulatory message which will be sent to the FO. It pledged continued solidarity with FO.

Staff Training Proposal Foresees Labor College

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The American labor movement may one day have its own college, starting as a training institute for union officers and staff, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told the convention.

Meany spoke on a report of the education committee dealing with resolutions urging establishment of a permanent staff training institute. The committee report noted that the AFL-CIO Executive Council has authorized a feasibility study to examine problems of scope, cost, location and related issues.

The purpose of such an institute, Meany said, would be to "develop a more highly educated official family for the trade union movement." There is a constant need, he said, "for more and more technical skills, more and more highly trained people."

Meany cited the precedent of the American Institute for Free Labor Development, which trains Latin American union leaders, adding:

"We have felt the time has come to establish an institution of learning . . . that could develop into a labor college sponsored by the AFL-CIO."

He cautioned that "this is not going to be done overnight." The first step, he said, would be to have the expert study made.

Mail Order Guns Held Crime Factor

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Federal legislation to bar the mail order sale of guns across state lines was urged in an AFL-CIO convention resolution.

It termed the uncontrolled sale of firearms "one of the principal factors in crime and accidental death" and noted that a mail order weapon was used to assassinate Pres. Kennedy.

Solid Support Voted U.S. on Viet Nam

LASTING PEACE cannot be achieved by appeasing aggression, Sec. of State Dean Rusk told the AFL-CIO convention delegates. He said the United States seeks to avoid a greater catastrophe in the Pacific by acting in Viet Nam with "firmness and restraint."

Rusk Stresses U.S. Role In Blocking Aggression

Bal Harbour, Fla.—America's "fidelity" to the mutual security treaties it has signed with other nations "is the principal pillar of peace in this period of world history," Sec. of State Dean Rusk declared.

Rusk told the AFL-CIO convention that if the United States stood by idly during armed aggression against South Viet Nam, the Pacific would become "a vast area of conflict" and no free nation in Asia would be secure.

The secretary of state was given a cheering, standing ovation by the delegates and AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told him that the labor movement, which understands the practical aspects of freedom, "will remain back of you and the President of the United States in your efforts."

Rusk traced in detail the efforts made by the United States to bring North Viet Nam to the conference table.

Every Channel Tried

The government, he said, has tried to explore the possibility of a peaceful settlement "through every channel . . . by private talks, direct talks, public talks, conferences, the use of intermediaries, the exchange of public statements, all of the methods that the human mind can conceive have been brought to bear."

He wished, Rusk said, that the peace demonstrators could "produce somewhere in the world a representative of Hanoi with whom I can talk about peace, because I would be there."

So far, he said, every U.S. overture has met with "a blunt and complete rejection."

Rusk talked about the distinction between dissidents who express their disagreement "under the normal processes of free speech" and those who seek "to deprive other people of the public platform."

He recalled that as a student in Germany, "I saw the original storm troopers take the platforms away from the democratic forces . . . including the free trade unions of Germany, and some of us think that must never happen again, and must never happen here."

Rusk recalled also those in the 1930s who took the view that "Manchuria is too far away. Ethiopia is none of our business. Give Hitler another bite and maybe he will be satisfied."

"Is it rude for us to be skeptical" the secretary asked, "when those same ideas are put forward as new ideas of the 1960s, when we know they were the ideas that led us all into the catastrophe of World War II?"

If we haven't learned the lesson, Rusk warned, "we shall not have the chance to draw the lessons from World War III. There won't be enough left."

The combinaton of firmness with restraint is the same that the United States used in the Berlin blockade, in Korea, and in the Cuban missile crisis, Rusk said.

Firmness is needed, he said, because unchecked aggression leads to catastrophe.

Restraint is necessary, he declared, because "there is no point driving the human race into that catastrophe if an honorable alternative can be found."

Dramatic Debate Demostrates Labor's 'Unequivocal' Position

By John M. Barry

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Organized labor's solid and "unequivocal" support of the Johnson Administration's policy in Viet Nam was dramatically reaffirmed by a standing, nearly unanimous vote of delegates to the AFL-CIO convention here.

"We pledge the continued support of American labor," the convention declared in a resolution, "for the President's effort to halt Communist aggression in Asia, assure the Vietnamese people their right of self-determination, promote democracy, political stability, and economic prosperity in Southeast Asia, and bring the war in Viet Nam to a speedy and honorable end."

Fewer than a dozen of the more than 900 delegates to the convention stood in opposition to the resolution.

The action followed overwhelming rejection by the convention of a substitute motion by Pres. Charles Cogen of the Teachers that the AFL-CIO "take no position on the Viet Nam situation."

Cogen said he was presenting the view of the Teachers' national convention last summer that the Viet Nam issue had divided the ranks of labor and that "further divisiveness" should be avoided.

Federation Pres. George Meany, closing debate on the motion, charged that the proposal amounted to "isolationism" at a time when missiles are "on pads 5,000 miles away that can come here in 18 or 19 minutes and destroy . . . perhaps half a country in an hour or two."

'Not in the Cards'

Meany said "it would be nice" to remain isolationists, but that "it just isn't in the cards; it is not that kind of a world."

The only reason the missiles are not being hurled at U.S. cities, he declared, is that "we have the missiles to throw back" and can "survive an initial attack and still destroy the aggressor."

"So don't let us toy with this dream of being isolationists," he warned.

He recalled that in 1933, when the American people were "75 percent isolationists," the labor movement took a position when Hitler came to power "that what happened in Germany 6,000 miles away was a threat to our security here in the United States. Very few people believed that, but we saw it come to fruition in 1939 and 1941."

Cogen's proposal to refrain from taking a stand on Viet Nam was supported in the debate by two delegates—Sec.-Treas. A. Toffoli of the Colorado State AFL-CIO, who explained that he was not speaking for the central body, and Leon Davis, president of Local 1199, Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union.

Davis charged that the Viet Nam war is a "tragic mistake" and that the nation is sending its youth "to fight a war that they do not understand, a war that they do not feel is their war, a cause that they do not feel is their cause."

This position was assailed by speakers supporting the policies of the Administration and the AFL-CIO on Viet Nam — Pres. James Suffridge of the Retail Clerks, Pres. Richard A. Walsh of the Stage Employes, Pres. Joseph Curran of the National Maritime Union, Andrew J. Kaelin of the Transport Workers, Hugh McClellan of the Glass Bottle Blowers, Milton Weintraub of the Theatrical Press Agents and Thomas W. Gleason of the Longshoremen.

Curran reported that with him at the convention was his son who had recently returned from two years of service in Viet Nam: "He has told me over and over again that he knows what he was fighting for out in Viet Nam, he knows that unless we join the battle in Viet Nam it will be joined somewhere else, because the Communists must fight this battle on a world scale. They must continue this struggle and we have got to stop them and stop them dead wherever we can stop them."

Meany permitted Toffoli to read into the convention record the policy statement adopted at a meeting in Chicago last month by a group called the Labor Leadership Assembly for Peace which called the war "immoral" and called on the United States to move for an "immediate and unconditional" halt to the bombing of targets in North Viet Nam.

The AFL-CIO president ridiculed the statement's claim that it represented the views of "523 trade union leaders."

Meany said he was "quite sure" that not all of the 523 in attendance were trade union leaders — "they might have had a couple of hundred."

But measured against an estimated 500,000 officials of 60,000 local unions in the AFL-CIO—"if we give them credit for the whole 500—the division in the trade union movement is 600 to 1" in support of the government's policies in Viet Nam.

The convention resolution reviewed the origins of the conflict in Viet Nam and the American role there, starting with non-military aid under the SEATO Treaty and extending to military action "only after Hanoi resorted to major aggression and launched a full-scale war to annex South Viet Nam."

The statement declared that the war "is no more a civil war than the Korean war was." In both cases, it said, "one part of the divided country attempted—with massive Soviet and Chinese Communist military support—to annex the other part by force and to impose its totalitarian regime on the people in the south."

The AFL-CIO charged that both the Soviet Union and Communist China are "working hard for an American defeat in Viet Nam so as to weaken the prestige and power of the United States throughout the world."

"Victory for Hanoi would certainly encourage Communist China to foment guerrilla warfare in Southeast Asia or even to launch direct military attacks against neighboring countries like Burma and India."

The resolution also cited U.S. efforts to encourage stable democratic institutions in Viet Nam accompanied by economic and social progress. It emphasized the need for programs to achieve improved living conditions, social reforms, "and a more decent existence for the refugees." The Vietnamese Confederation of Labor (CVT) must be assured an opportunity to participate in these programs, the convention declared, adding:

"We reaffirm our solidarity with the CVT which has been doing admirable work in alleviating human misery, aiding the refugees, educating children and adults, and laying the foundations of a sound democratic society."

The convention endorsed the Executive Council's decision to intensify assistance to the CVT and urged affiliates to be "generous" with aid to the Viet Nam labor movement.

Anti-War Sit-Ins Scored By Legion Commander

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Both the American Legion and American labor have from time to time taken issue with government policies "but we have never considered the undermining of our government to be a proper or responsible means of dissent," Legion Cmdr. William E. Galbraith said in a convention address.

Calling a recent sit-in by anti-war demonstrators at the Pentagon "a not too subtle example of subversion from within," Galbraith said he was sure "labor is in accord" with the feelings of the Legion that in this country "there is room for honest differences and doubts" and for the "responsible airing" of those differences.

But when demonstrations "lead to sabotage, vandalism and violence, dissent becomes dishonest, the right to remonstrate loses . . . responsibility, and the nation is threatened with anarchy."

There are orderly processes for the righting of wrongs, and these procedures must be followed. the speaker said. While our system of government "may have its shortcomings, it still provides its citizens the greatest degree of freedom any people have ever enjoyed," he said, declaring "It cannot survive conditions of anarchy any more than any other system" of government.

On Viet Nam, "there is but one course for America to pursue, and that is the road to victory." Dissension here at home "encourages the Communists to continue fighting" and brings new casualties to American youths, Galbraith said, noting that he spoke of the 26th anniversary of the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor.

Galbraith invited AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany to address the Legion's 50th annual convention next September in New Orleans. Speaking as a cattle farmer, he said "I recognize that the greatest friend of the farmer" has always been labor, because labor buys farm products.

Delegates Vote Two Changes In Constitution

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Without a dissenting voice or vote the seventh AFL-CIO convention revised the federation's constitution to increase the flexibility and efficiency of the organization and simplify its government.

The changes would eliminate the provision in the constitution calling for an eight-man executive committee to advise and consult with the president and secretary-treasurer on policy matters and provide for meetings of the General Board on the call of the president or the Executive Council.

The changes were voted by the council at its September 1967 meeting in New York and submitted to the convention's constitution committee where they won unanimous approval.

The delegates also approved the committee's recommendation for non-concurrence in 10 resolutions submitted by affiliates on the grounds that the "subject matter of these resolutions is already treated in the constitution and is part of the policy of the AFL-CIO."

The resolutions dealt with elections, retirement of officers, convention representation, affiliation with state and local central bodies and revision of the internal disputes plan.

Trade Outlets Called Vital to Young Nations

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The Prime Minister of Jamaica, stressing the interdependence of nations, appealed to the AFL-CIO to oppose protectionist forces and support expanded trade as a means of promoting higher living standards for all workers.

Hugh Lawson Shearer, a trade union leader who became prime minister last April, told the convention of new attitudes and pressures "for urgent action to achieve goals of higher living standards by the working classes in the Western Hemisphere and all over the globe."

Asks Balance

He asked U.S. labor to consider its positions on trade and fiscal policies in light of today's problems and seek "a balanced attitude" recognizing the interdependence of nations.

"Today, because of world interdependence, national problems in one country have ripples in other countries," Shearer said, adding:

"If developing countries, therefore—that is, those dependent on primary production—are unable to afford to trade in the vast market of the industrially-developed countries such as the United States of America, it will mean they will not be in a position to purchase the goods of this developed country.

"If there is no buying, there can be no selling, and there is no doubt in my mind that instability in one country and the resultant inability to purchase can adversely affect and curtail the export market of developed countries such as yours."

AMBASSADORIAL GREETING at AFL-CIO convention features Jamaican Prime Minister Hugh L. Shearer (right) and former U.S. ambassador to Jamaica William C. Doherty. Shearer is an active trade unionist and an elected vice president of his union. Doherty is past president of the Letter Carriers and a former AFL-CIO vice president.

3-Pronged Drive Urged On Jobs for Disabled

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Programs to rehabilitate and find jobs for the handicapped received the backing of the AFL-CIO convention.

Delegates approved a resolution calling for labor action on three fronts—legislative, community and collective bargaining.

It called on labor central bodies to press their state legislatures to take full advantage of federal matching funds available for rehabilitation programs.

It asked active participation and support for community rehabilitation programs.

And it urged that a ban on discrimination against handicapped workers be written into fair employment practices clauses of union contracts.

The resolution praised the work of the national institutes on rehabilitation and health services and urged continued cooperation by unions.

A separate occupational health resolution called for a federal program to protect all workers against on-the-job health hazards, including new toxic chemicals as well as such long-standing problems as excessive noise which could lead to deafness.

It urged that the program be set up in the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare, with enforcement shared with the Dept. of Labor. It should provide "adequate inspection and criminal penalties for willful violators of safety standards and regulations."

The resolution also urged that a White House conference on occupational health be convened and praised Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz for the "decisive action" he took in establishing limits on the radiation exposure for uranium miners.

Legislative Program Endorsed:

Federal Workers Backed on Goals

Bal Harbour, Fla.—A broad-ranging legislative program for federal workers, drafted by the AFL-CIO Government Employes Council, received a strong endorsement from the AFL-CIO convention.

It calls for pay and a salary structure consistent with comparable jobs in private industry.

It asks improvement in overtime laws and a shorter workweek. It proposes major improvements in the Civil Service Retirement System, including the right to retire with full benefits after 30 years of service.

Special emphasis was given to the need to improve collective bargaining in the federal service.

The resolution, introduced by 34 affiliates, charged that the intent of the presidential executive order five years ago which brought collective bargaining into the government has been thwarted in many areas by "stubborn resistance and indifference" of management officials.

It gave a full endorsement to the proposals made by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany to a cabinet-level committee set up to consider changes in the executive order.

The resolution called for "a complete reappraisal" of the Hatch Act. It said appointments and promotions in the civil service must be kept free of political considerations. But "at the same time, federal employes must be assured maximum freedom to exercise their political rights and responsibilities as citizens."

It asked safeguards against adverse effects of automation and strongly opposed speed-up programs in the Post Office and other government agencies.

The resolution reiterated labor's opposition to use of military personnel in jobs that can be better performed by civilian employes. This remains a "pressing problem," the resolution said.

It said firefighters should be protected "from illegal interference while engaged in the lawful performance of their duties."

Another section of the omnibus legislative statement called for development of "impartial promotion procedures with recognition of seniority, merit and promotion from within as the guiding principles."

The resolution called on the federal government to defray the full cost of health benefits and life insurance programs for active and retired government workers.

It endorsed the President's safety program for the government and urged active union participation.

The resolution noted that the AFL-CIO has played an "indispensable role" in helping its affiliates improve the conditions of federal workers, and expressed the gratitude of the Government Employes Council.

It urged that the federal government should be "an ideal employer" and set an example to the nation.

In another area, the convention adopted a resolution urging the Civil Service Commission to provide by regulation for the direct transfer of U.S. employes from agencies in the Panama Canal Zone to government agencies in the continental United States.

Labor Hailed for Aiding Rehabilitation Programs

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Without widespread union support, programs designed to return the handicapped to useful employment "would not be nearly as far advanced" as they are, Chairman Harold Russell of the President's Committee on Employment of the Handicapped said here.

"A good part of the strength of the committee lies in the support of labor," Russell told the AFL-CIO convention. He formerly served with Meat Cutters Local 592 in Boston.

"Working together, we have witnessed many notable gains," he said. "The number of handicapped persons rehabilitated by state-federal programs" goes "up and up" as does the number placed in jobs by public employment offices, the number of disabled veterans aided by Veterans Administration programs, and those hired by the federal government, Russell reported.

He praised the services of his group's labor committee headed by Pres. Gordon M. Freeman of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers. Also he lauded labor participation in the National Institutes on Rehabilitation and Health Services, sheltered workshops started by unions, the thousands of union counselors who volunteer their help to disabled workers, and "the many collective bargaining agreements" calling for rehabilitation of workers injured on the job, along with mental health care for workers.

Russell told the delegates: "There is a place for you individually, or for your local union, in your community's volunteer groups that serve the handicapped." More unions could develop workshops, more union members could help serve as a "committee of one for the handicapped," Russell said.

Hanford Atom Strikers Voted Solid Backing

Bal Harbour, Fla. — The AFL-CIO convention voted support for the efforts of the Hanford, Wash., Atomic Metal Trades Council to protect members at the Atomic Energy Commission works there against arbitrary increases in radiation exposure on the job.

The council has been the exclusive bargaining representative of Hanford production and maintenance employes for 20 years. Last July 1, the AEC contracted with the Douglas United Nuclear Co. to operate the multipurpose reactor there. But when labor and management approached agreement on new contract terms, the AEC injected itself into bargaining to block a settlement, the Hanford council said.

Later the company instructed eight workers to submit to radiation exposure exceeding the 300 millirems per week which had been the maximum for 20 years. When they refused, management suspended them, precipitating a strike of more than 200 workers which has continued since September, delegates were told.

The convention called on AEC to instruct the company to withdraw a $2.2 million damage suit against the council.

7 Unions Cited For Record on Central Bodies

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Seven more unions received awards at the AFL-CIO convention for having at least 80 percent of their locals affiliated with central bodies—bringing the total to 19.

But a convention committee said the overall record on affiliations with state and local labor councils is disappointing in view of strong recommendations of past conventions for 100 percent affiliation.

It urged that both international unions and central bodies work to overcome obstacles to affiliation "from the simple standpoint of what is best for the trade union movement."

Central bodies are a "vital part" of the labor movement, the report emphasized. The committee also suggested a major review of the role of central bodies by the AFL-CIO Executive Council.

The unions which received affiliation awards, presented by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, were: American Bakery & Confectionery Workers, Broadcast Employes, Glass & Ceramic Workers, Glass Bottle Blowers, Laundry Workers, Plate Printers, and Retail Clerks.

Taylor Law Denounced As 'Harsh, Destructive'

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Strong disapproval of New York State's Taylor Law restricting bargaining of public employe unions, and support of a "full-scale campaign" for a law adequately protecting employe rights was voted by the AFL-CIO convention.

Delegates asserted that the law unfairly limits the rights of public employes in the field of labor-management relations and is a matter of "deep concern" to organized labor everywhere.

Before the law was passed last April, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany strongly denounced it as a punitive anti-union measure. He said that "to levy confiscatory fines against unions of public employes who exercise free and democratic rights is not consistent with proven and workable" industrial relations. Such laws, Meany said at the time, have proven not a deterrent to strikes but on the contrary make strikes harder to resolve.

The convention declared: "Not only is this legislation harsh and restrictive but it is destructive of the legitimate representation efforts of legitimate unions." A provision in the law for the determination of bargaining units based on a community of interests, the resolution observed, has been "violated in letter and spirit." It voiced strong disapproval also of the manner in which the act has been administered so as to deny employes the rights purportedly assured them under the law.

Union progress is being "drastically affected by the vicious law and the vicious way it is being administered," said Pres. Jerry Wurf of the State, County & Municipal Employes. Andrew Kaelin of the Transport Workers predicted that his union would be the next target of the Taylor Law.

Delegates also approved other resolutions recognizing the rights of public employes in state and federal government agencies. One reasserted the right of state and local government employes to organize into unions of their own choice and declared labor's beliefe that the most realistic vehicle for such employes is collective bargaining, together with "effective mediation and fact-finding procedures including the use of impartial fact-finding panels with authority to make" settlement recommendations.

Another resolution promised increased efforts by state and national labor bodies to win the same rights for public employes as other workers—freedom of political action and the full protection of minimum wage and unemployment compensation laws.

During discussion, Pres. Albert Shanker of Teachers Local 2 the United Federation of Teachers, recalled that New York City officials invoked Taylor Law provisions under which the union and Shanker were heavily fined and Shanker sentenced to jail.

Procedures for mediation and fact-finding under the law are "absolutely phony procedures," Shanker said. His union negotiated for months with Mayor John V. Lindsay "and it was that same mayor, our employer, who selected the mediation and fact-finding panels" whose reports led to action against the union, he said.

Strong Push Urged for Nation's Goals

Economic Strength Cited to Meet Both Military, Domestic Needs

By Robert B. Cooney

Bal Harbor, Fla.—The AFL-CIO has reaffirmed its conviction that the American economy can support the extension of social advances at home while meeting military requirements in Viet Nam.

The convention resolution on the national economy strongly rejected the idea that the cost of the war be absorbed by cutting back such programs as housing, rebuilding the cities, aid to education, the war on poverty and pollution control.

To aid in pursuing these goals and moving towards sustained full employment, the President's Council of Economic Advisers should present annual projections to provide a framework for balanced growth, the resolution said.

If the Council of Economic Advisers persists in its failure to present annual estimates of what is required to sustain balanced economic growth and full employment, then Congress should change the law to compel such planning, the AFL-CIO declared.

The convention said it was the intent of the Employment Act of 1946 that the council make annual projections of the consumer spending and business investment, as well as government spending, required to achieve and sustain full employment. These estimates were to be meshed with the government's inventory of long-range needs.

If the President's economic advisers continue to neglect their responsibility to provide such an economic yardstick, "the Employment Act (of 1946) should be amended to require it," the resolution said.

Conference Asked

The AFL-CIO also proposed that the President call an economic conference of major economic organizations early each year to improve the economic policymaking process. These leaders would exchange information and views on government forecasts and policies as well as trends in the private economy.

In related resolutions, the convention called on the Federal Reserve Board to "roll back the 4½ percent discount rate" and said the board should be required by law to harmonize its policies with those of Congress and the White House; urged the President to include a capital budget as part of his effort to modernize the annual federal budget, and said the Administration should improve methods of meeting balance of payments pressures in the context of a growing economy.

In the important resolution on the national economy, the AFL-CIO took these positions:

● Labor reconfirms its view that the economy can support the extension of social advances at home while meeting military requirements in Viet Nam. The cost of the war should not be absorbed by cutting back such domestic programs as housing, rebuilding the cities, aid to education, the war on poverty and air and water pollution control.

● "A temporary war surtax should be adopted." The surcharge on corporations should be "at least twice as great as on personal income." The tax on personal income should be based on ability to pay. Corporate and personal income excluded from taxation through major loopholes in the tax system should be subjected to the surcharge rate.

● The top objective of economic policy should be "to achieve and sustain full employment—jobs at decent wages for all people who are able to work and desire employment." The government's tax, spending and monetary policies should coincide with this goal. A program to create one million public service jobs for unemployed and underemployed people — along the lines of the bill sponsored by Rep. James G. O'Hara (D-Mich.) —is essential.

● The lag in real wages and salaries must be ended. A faster rise in buying power is needed to provide workers with a fair share of economic progress and to bolster consumer markets.

● Reform of the federal tax structure is "long overdue." Loopholes for the wealthy and corporations should be closed and the burden eased for low and moderate-income families. The next cuts in federal income taxes should go to the low and middle-income groups through such devices as hiking the $600 personal exemption and reducing low-bracket rates.

● The nation's monetary policy should encourage rather than retard economic growth if the nation is to achieve full employment. The need is for an ample money supply and low interest rates. The board of governors and other advisory arms of the Federal Reserve System should be opened up to all segments of society, including organized labor.

● A national manpower policy is essential to aid workers and communities to adjust to changing technology. Central to such a policy is a national employment service and effective manpower programs to upgrade the skills of the workforce.

● The federal government should establish a technological clearinghouse to centralize information on automation and its effects so public and private programs can plan adjustments to change.

● Discriminatory employment practices which limit job opportunities of Negroes and other minorities should be ended by effective enforcement of federal law.

● Measures to solve the balance of payments difficulties should be formulated within the context of policies aimed at full employment. The government should have a range of tools to restrict the outflow of private capital.

● To curb the potential danger from corporate pricing policies in key administered-price industries, federal agencies should focus public attention on the facts of the cost-price-profit-investment policies of companies involved.

● The federal government is urged to develop a national inventory of needs for housing, community facilities and public services, coordinated by the President's Council of Economic Advisers. Such inventories, which would include lists of needs furnished by states and cities, would provide the basis for plans and programs and a timetable. Such a coordinated effort could be regulated according to changes in defense requirements and the availability of manpower and productive capacity.

● If the President determines there is a national emergency warranting extraordinary stabilization measures, he will have labor's support as long as there is even-handed restraint on all costs, prices, profits, dividends, rents, management compensation of all kinds and worker wages and salaries. Labor is prepared to sacrifice to the extent necessary "so long as there is equality of sacrifice."

WOMAN-TO-WOMAN welcome is given Mrs. Esther Peterson, assistant labor secretary, by Mrs. James A. Suffridge (right), wife of AFL-CIO Vice Pres. James A. Suffridge, at convention.

Stepped-Up Organizing Asked Among Women

Bal Harbour, Fla.—AFL-CIO affiliates should broaden their efforts to organize America's 29 million women workers and should continue being responsive to their needs, the convention declared.

In a resolution observing that women make up 37 percent of all U.S. workers and that 3.7 million women are union members, the convention said organized labor has "traditionally sought to protect and promote the interests of women workers, to eliminate discrimination on the job," and to be "responsive to the special needs of women workers carrying the double responsibilities of job and home."

Nearly 60 per cent of women workers are married, doing home duties as well as contributing to the economic support of their families. Nearly 10 million working women have children under the age of 18, and 2.5 million are heads of families, the resolution pointed out.

While unions have "firmly established the principle of equal treatment of men and women on the job," an effort is under way, spearheaded by "organizing business and professional women and supported by employer interests," to repeal all state labor standards laws for women on the ground that they are inconsistent with the civil rights act, the resolution reported.

The labor movement "seeks rather to conserve protective laws for women, extend them where possible to men, and press for improved legislation for all workers," the convention said. It called for:

● Expanded union organizing among women workers and wider participation by women in union work, not only in special activities for women but also in policy-making posts within unions.

● The use of federal funds for further expansion of child-care facilities and additional liberalization of the child-care income tax deductions allowed working mothers.

● Programs to promote more adequate training and educational opportunities for women and to upgrade their qualifications for better jobs.

The resolution concluded: "We oppose moves seeking the destruction of state labor laws for women. Adjustments may profitably be made in such laws to modernize and improve them, and to make appropriate extensions to men. In particular, the right to protection against involuntary overtime work must be preserved—a right especially important to women with home responsibilities."

Achieving Full Employment Stressed As Key to Broad Manpower Policy

Bal Harbour, Fla.—If the nation is to make proper use of its manpower resources, the AFL-CIO declared, Congress should promptly enact legislation to create 1 million public service jobs, federalize the employment service and coordinate all training activities through a single manpower administrator.

The nation needs a comprehensive national manpower policy, said a convention resolution, "the keystone of which must be a meaningful commitment to full employment."

The absence of such a commitment has led to a piecemeal approach to training and work programs, the resolution said. Their finding has been inadequate and their purposes blurred to the extent they often are viewed as substitutes for welfare programs.

"The distortion of the (manpower) program's purpose," the resolution pointed out, "arises in large part because there are not enough jobs for the nation's unemployed and underemployed manpower.

"If the job market were tighter —if we had full employment— then the urge to train for jobs at the low end of the wage spectrum would disappear."

In a tight job market, the AFL-CIO observed, the employer would, as many are now doing, hire untrained workers for entry-level jobs and train them without government aid. The manpower programs could then serve their proper purposes, it added.

The convention called for these major actions:

● Congress should promptly enact the bill proposed by Rep. James G. O'Hara (D-Mich.) "to provide 1 million jobs in public service employment."

● The Public Employment Service—which is now, in fact, 50 different state systems—should be federalized. This service should be structured according to economic activities which cut across local and state boundaries.

● All federally-supported training programs should be coordinated through the Dept. of Labor's Manpower Administration to eliminate duplication and make the programs more effective.

● The manpower administrator should ensure that programs place greater priority on upgrading workers already employed, with income maintenance for those requiring instruction off the job.

● Greater use should be made of the full 104 weeks of training time allowed under the Manpower Development & Training Act, but with a substantial rise in training allowances.

● Federal relocation allowances are needed to help jobless workers move to areas of job opportunities.

● In other problem areas, the resolution urged the manpower administrator to utilize more effectively the expert advice available on local and state advisory committees under MDTA; public funds should not go to employers for costs previously considered a normal operating expense; and programs for training in low-wage, entry-level jobs or high turnover jobs should be sharply curtailed.

U.S. Probe Asked Of Farm Bureau

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO urged Congress to investigate the operations of the American Farm Bureau Federation.

It charged in a convention resolution that the Farm Bureau has used its "enormous wealth" from a massive group of business enterprises and its tax-exempt status to further its "ultraconservative" policies.

Clearing the Way

U.S. Contract Bar Urged On NLRA Violators

Bal Harbour, Fla.—A presidential executive order was urged by the AFL-CIO to establish the policy that "willful and repeated violators" of the National Labor Relations Act shall not be given federal contracts.

The entire nation has been shocked, the convention declared, "by the vicious, unremitting coercion with which J. P. Stevens & Co., the world's second largest textile firm, has opposed the efforts of its employes" to organize and engage in collective bargaining.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany announced after the convention acted that the Supreme Court that day had denied a hearing to the Stevens Co. and that Stevens therefore must reinstate 71 employes it fired for union activity in 1963.

The high court refused to review a 2nd Circuit Appeals Court ruling upholding a National Labor Relations Board order against Stevens.

Pres. William Pollock of the Textile Workers Union of America, the union representing the fired Stevens workers, told the delegates he hoped the decision "will bring an end to this company's vicious campaign of terror and discharges that has halted the unionization of workers" in its plants.

The decision, Pollock said, "is another justification . . . to deny this company further government contracts" until it fully complies with the labor law.

The convention resolution charged that thousands of workers in other industries, principally in the South, have likewise been denied the right to organize by venal employers who boldly and flagrantly violate the act, "knowing full well that the procedures of the NLRB are so time-consuming and its remedies so ineffectual that a board order, endlessly delayed, amounts to no more than a slap on the wrist."

The right to organize which these workers are being denied, the convention said, is "the keystone of American industrial democracy" and one of the chief factors that distinguishes American democracy from totalitarian despotism.

The right of workers to associate freely and build their own bargaining organizations is "as surely a part of the bundle of civil rights protected by the Constitution as is the right to free speech," freedom of worship and the right to be free from discrimination, the convention declared.

Machinists' Pres. P. L. Siemiller said Stevens is not the only government contractor showing contempt for the NLRB. He cited United Aircraft Corp., Hartford, Conn., which has been found guilty of law violations and still is being awarded federal contracts.

Siemiller asked a "yelling, shouting vote of yes" on the resolution to show "we want justice, we want the President" to issue an executive order mandating the Pentagon not to place contracts with "constant and willful violators" of the labor act.

Rutter Rex 'Defiant'

Clothing Workers' Delegate William Hall reported his union has been trying since 1956 to collect $160,000 that the NLRB ordered Rutter Rex Mfg. Co., New Orleans, to pay 182 workers the firm fired unlawfully during a 1950 strike. Hall said "this employer continuously has been violating the act" for 17 years and its "sole support" is from government contracts.

Pres. Alex Rose of the Hatters cited four years of defiance of the labor law by a Richmond, Va., firm which continues to make military headwear for the Defense Dept.

Potofsky Hits Prestige Firm's Shirt Imports

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Shirts made in low-wage Hong Kong under the Van Heusen label are being marketed in the U.S. at regular Van Heusen prices, Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky of the Clothing Workers charged here.

Potofsky warned that if Van Heusen continues its program of importing shirts from low-wage countries, the ACWA will inform retailers and the public of the "deplorable wages and conditions" under which imports are made.

The union, he said, will take all possible steps to protect the jobs of Van Heusen workers in the company's plants in Alabama, Georgia, Ohio, Pennsylvania and South Carolina.

The readiness of the corporation to abandon its 10,000 employes, instead of continuing to seek constructive government policies, contrasts sharply with its "protestations of concern for the workers and the communities in which they operate," the ACWA president said.

Firm Must Rehire 71:

High Court Ruling Enforces Crackdown on J.P. Stevens

By Duane Emme

The U.S. Supreme Court has left standing a lower court's ruling that J. P. Stevens & Co. "flagrantly, cynically and unlawfully" denied workers their rights in an effort to crush their union.

In a brief order, the high court rejected Stevens' plea to review a decision of the 2nd U.S. Court of Appeals in July, which sustained a National Labor Relations Board order against the firm with only minor changes.

The company, the nation's second largest textile chain, now must rehire 71 workers illegally fired for joining the Textile Workers Union of America during its organizing drive going back to 1963.

Each of the 71 must be made whole for all income lost from the date of his firing until the date of a bona fide offer of reinstatement. Two other workers must be reimbursed for overtime wrongfully denied them.

Further, the NLRB order, issued in March 1966, directed the firm to take steps to assure workers it will no longer interfere with their rights to join the union.

The decision also requires Stevens to mail a copy of the NLRB reinstatement and "cease and desist" order to every worker at its 43 plants throughout the Carolinas and to post a notice in each plant.

The order must be read to employes by either a company spokesman or a board official in 20 of the plants directly affected.

Stevens Guilty

The board's unanimous decision found Stevens guilty of "massive and deliberate unfair labor practices" in its plants at Rock Hill and Greenville, S. C., and Roanoke Rapids, N. C.

The company was charged with spying on union members, threats of reprisals for joining the union, intimidation of workers, changing working conditions to thwart union activity, and encouraging employes to commit anti-union acts.

The appeals court found that there was "no room for doubt" that the company "through its plant superintendents . . . initiated and pursued a pattern of conduct the purpose of which was to crush the union movement."

"With scant regard for the means employed other than their effectiveness," it added, Stevens "restrained and coerced its employes in the exercise of their rights under the law flagrantly, cynically, and unlawfully."

The ruling came in a case based upon charges made by TWUA and the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. in 1963. Since then they have advanced four other cases, citing more than 200 examples of alleged illegal employer activity by the giant textile producer.

Four NLRB examiners, who heard the cases initially, all found the same pattern of unlawful conduct.

In one of the later cases, the board last March ordered 18 other Stevens workers reinstated with full back pay and ruled that 20 additional employes are entitled to overtime pay which management had denied them.

18 More Fired

In September, in two other cases, the board added the names of 18 more firing victims it said must be reinstated, along with the names of three workers who had been illegally denied promotions.

So far, Stevens has frustrated the board's order in the March case with court action and ignored its September decision.

In Bal Harbour, Fla., where the AFL-CIO convention was in session, TWUA Pres. William Pollock hailed the Supreme Court decision. Noting that Stevens widely claimed it is being "persecuted" by the board, Pollock said the Supreme Court has exposed "this cynical tactic for what it has been from the very start—a sanctimonious fraud."

The AFL-CIO convention passed a resolution, introduced by TWUA, calling upon Pres. Johnson to issue an executive order to bar "wilful and repeated" violators of Taft-Hartley from receiving federal contracts.

Stevens was termed the "most flagrant" example of these violators. In 1966, the company received $76 million in federal orders and such contracts are continuing.

The company, headed by Robert T. Stevens, Army secretary in the Eisenhower Administration, expressed disappointment in the Supreme Court decision but promised to "abide by the rulings of the lower court."

At the same time, it said it would continue improving its "progressive" policies to employes, convinced that they will "prefer dealing with us in a direct relationship" and not through a union.

TWUA vowed to broaden its organizing drive at Stevens until the right to join a union and bargain collectively is "a reality" at all of the company's plants.

Radio, TV Urged To Serve Public

Bal Harbour, Fla. — Both television and radio should "serve the total public interest," the AFL-CIO declared.

A strongly-worded resolution charged that commercial broadcasting has "with few exceptions sunk to the lowest common denominator of public taste."

It charged also that the Federal Communications Commission has not adequately enforced its own "fairness doctrine" and as a result "lavishly-financed reactionaries and extremists dominate the 'opinion' phase of broadcasting."

To overcome these problems, the convention resolution:

- Welcomed the creation by Congress of a new corporation for public broadcasting, to channel federal funds into improved noncommercial broadcasting, without federal control over programs.
- Called on the FCC to require radio and television stations to live up to their public interest obligations and comply with the FCC's fairness doctrine.

Jobless Rate Drops to 3.9 Percent As Employment Shows Sharp Surge

November produced a sharp shift on the job front as employment increased by 450,000 and the number of jobless dropped below the 3 million mark for a rate of 3.9 percent as compared with 4.3 percent for October.

The Labor Dept. noted that unemployment usually rises with November cutbacks in outdoor work, but this time there were gains in trade and government along with the return of strikers in manufacturing, notably automobiles, and in trucking.

At the same time, the boost in jobs was accompanied by an increase in the factory workweek to 40.9 hours, its highest point since the first of the year.

During the month there were 75.1 million persons at work, 450,000 more than in October. Of this rise, 325,000 were in nonagricultural jobs. The civilian labor force, at 78.1 million, was up 1.5 million from a year earlier, about 1 million of the increase being among women. The increase among adult males was 800,000 with a decrease of 200,000 in the teenage labor force.

The November drop in unemployment represented a return to the general level that has prevailed for the past year with the exception of September and October when the rate started climbing. Major November drops in unemployment were among women and teenagers. The jobless rate for adult men, at 2.4 percent, was virtually unchanged from the level that has held for the past year.

One favorable development in the November figures was that while Negroes remained heavily unemployed, their jobless rate dropped from 8.8 percent in October to 7.3 percent.

Most of the month's job increase was in durable goods manufacturing where there was reduced strike activity, but there were also increases in nondurables, the service-producing industries and in state and local government.

A feature of the increase in state and local government employment was the rise in educational employment reflecting expansion of educational activities.

Service jobs have gone up about 500,000 over the year with the largest increase in medical and health employment—up 230,000.

Average weekly earnings of rank and file workers edged up to $103.90 during November—up $4 over the year. A good deal of this boost, however, has been eaten up by increases in the cost of living.

For factory production workers, average weekly wages hit $118.20, up $4.21 over the year.

The job picture in the nation's 150 major industrial centers shifted slightly over the month as the result of strikes and seasonal factors.

New Haven, Conn., and Denver, Colo., moved from a "low" unemployment rate to a "moderate" rate of 3 to 6 percent. Mayaguez in Puerto Rico shifted from a "substantial" unemployment rate of between 9 and 12 percent to a rate of 12 percent or more.

On the other hand, Flint, Mich., moved from the "moderate" category to the "low" category of below 3 percent as employment gained sharply following automobile model changeovers.

Clears 'Punitive' Provisions:

Congress Batters Social Security Bill

Congress sent a battered social security bill to the White House just hours before ringing the curtain down on its first session.

In wires sent to all senators and congressmen before the final vote, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany criticized the bill as "absolutely inadequate." He said its "punitive welfare provisions . . . unjustly penalize the nation's poor just because they are poor."

A bipartisan group of Senate liberals, who had fought to send the welfare sections of the bill back to a House-Senate conference, pledged a major effort to remedy the defects when Congress reconvenes in January.

The final version of the social security legislation was much closer to the limited, restrictive House-passed bill than to the measure passed by the Senate. The Senate had added to the House bill the higher benefits and wage base increases urged by Pres. Johnson and the AFL-CIO, and had softened the welfare restrictions voted by the House.

As finally enacted, the legislation provides a 13 percent across-the-board social security benefit increase—compared with the 15 percent sought by Johnson. More significantly, it raises the present $44 minimum benefit to only $55 as compared with the $70 in the Administration and Senate versions.

Lower Wage Base

The rise in the wage base on which social security taxes are paid and benefits computed was held to $7,800. It is now $6,600 and the Senate bill would have raised it in steps to $10,800—to finance improved benefits and raise the amount of retirement income higher-paid workers would receive.

Chief target of the liberal criticism was the public assistance restrictions, including a provision requiring mothers of small children to leave their homes to work, freezing the number of children who could be helped under the aid for dependent children grants and in a number of other areas imposing inflexible restrictions designed to purge the welfare rolls.

In other major congressional action clearing the way for adjournment:

● Congress appropriated $1.77 billion for the anti-poverty program this fiscal year, slightly less than the amount spent last year and below the $1.98 billion it had authorized just days before.

Nevertheless the action was a major Administration victory in the face of a conservative, budget-slashing majority in the House. The Office of Economic Opportunity was given authority to spend the funds in the areas it considers most urgent.

● Final passage was given to a three-step pay raise for federal employes, retroactive to Oct. 1. Postal workers would receive a 6 percent first-step raise and an additional 5 percent July 1, 1968. Other salaried federal workers would receive 4.5 percent in the first step and one-half the "comparability gap" with private industry scales in July. A final step on July 1, 1969, would close the remaining comparability gap. Similar increases were provided for the armed forces.

● A two-year extension of the federal aid program for elementary and secondary schools was adopted, a compromise between the one-year bill passed by the House and the three-year extension voted by the Senate. The final version drops two labor-opposed amendments—a "judicial review" provision in the Senate bill opening the way for court challenges to the constitutionality of aid to students in religious schools, and a House provision which would have barred withholding of federal funds to schools which refuse to desegregate until after a long administrative procedure.

● Congress slashed the nation's foreign aid appropriation to its lowest point in history, $2.3 billion—nearly $1 billion less than Pres. Johnson had asked. In a final demonstration of the power of the economy bloc, the House voted 196-185 to send the heavily-slashed bill back to conference to knock off another $20 million.

One of the major consumer accomplishments of the session was hailed at a White House ceremony at which Pres. Johnson signed the meat inspection bill applying federal standards to meat which does not cross state lines.

The President said the government will use the new law to force dirty meat packing plants to either "clean up or close down."

Full Support Voted Savings Bond Drive

Bal Harbour, Fla. — The AFL-CIO pledged its "full support" of the U.S. Treasury Dept.'s special drive to increase purchases of U.S. Savings Bonds and called on all members and officers to increase their purchase of bonds "as a special display of support for those Americans fighting for freedom in Viet Nam."

The convention approved a resolution noting that union members traditionally have been among the most consistent purchasers of U.S. bonds, and asserting that "because of this nation's commitment to the preservation of freedom in Viet Nam, the purchase" of bonds has taken on "added meaning and importance."

Federal Court Rejects Claim Against AFM

New York — The U.S. District Court here has dismissed a lawsuit brought by a group of dissident orchestra leaders to recover a 10 percent traveling surcharge tax levied by the Musicians between 1958 and 1964.

AFM Pres. Herman Kenin, in announcing the decision by U.S. Judge Richard H. Levet, hailed the decision as a "welcome rebuff of a transparent attempt by the group to raid AFM's treasury and enrich themselves" at the expense of sidemen.

Levet said the surcharges were "wages belonging to musicians," that the payments were transmitted to the union on behalf of all musician-employes and there was "no grounds" for the leaders getting any return.

The suit was originally instituted by 16 orchestra leaders in 1964. However, the claims of nine of them were dismissed for failure to appear for pre-trial examination, leaving seven covered by the dismissal.

The traveling surcharge was eliminated by the union as a source of revenue at its 1963 convention.

Union Label Held Major Weapon In Advancing Trade Union Cause

Bal Harbour, Fla.—All trade unionists were called on to use one of labor's "mightiest weapons"—its buying power—on behalf of union-made products and union-supplied services.

Delegates to the AFL-CIO convention said in a resolution that "to maintain the benefits and strength that labor now enjoys," union members must continue to "be union—buy union" by "recognizing the importance of Union Label & Service Trades programs and by purchasing union products and demanding union service.

The convention officially designated the weeks of Sept. 2-8, 1968, and Sept. 1-7, 1969, as Union Label Weeks; urged all affiliated unions to participate actively in the Union-Industries Show June 21-26, 1968, in Philadelphia; and reiterated AFL-CIO policy on the use of union labels.

On the latter subject, the delegates went on record as "insisting upon the use of a legitimate union label on all printed material produced for the use of, and paid for with funds of unions and union-sponsored organizations."

The convention accepted a report recommending non-concurrence in a substitute motion declaring "only those union labels representing the product of members of recognized international printing trades unions affiliated with the AFL-CIO, and the labels of the AFL-CIO unions whose members are employed on the manufacture of products on which printing is performed during the manufacturing process shall be recognized as bona fide for use on printing and related products."

Typographical Union delegates said the substitute motion was designed to eliminate "pseudo labels" from being used on non-union printing and "bedroom" printing shops like those which, he said, affiliated with an AFL-CIO union "not primarily concerned with printing."

Vice Pres. Harry D. Sayre of the Papermakers & Paperworkers said he spoke for that union and also for the Pulp, Sulphite & Paper Mill Workers in supporting non-concurrence. Not to adopt the committee's recommendation would be "a violation of the AFL-CIO constitution and the assurances we received" at AFL-CIO merger, Sayre said.

Federation Pres. George Meany pointed out that the issue has been before the Executive Council several times. The council, Meany declared, has unanimously interpreted the pertinent section of the AFL-CIO constitution to mean that "any organization could use a label on the product that it produced."

If there are abuses of that provision, Meany added, "we have the power to stop those abuses."

The convention, in its resolution on union purchasing power, urged AFL-CIO unions to "unite the massive potential power of all consumers and, more important, negotiate union label, shop card, store card and service button agreements with employers to inform consumers of union-made services or products." It also requested union members to help increase the demand for such products in order to assure the permanence of the "labor of wealth"— good wages, decent working conditions, good health and welfare benefits as well as quality products and services.

Pres. Jacob Potofsky of the Clothing Workers, speaking as chairman of the Union Label Committee, said "someone once called the union label labor's sleeping giant, and that is exactly what it is—a giant which, if fully awakened and fully utilized, could help speed our progress, particularly in organizing the unorganized."

If labor was to use only a fraction of its members' strength as consumers, "we could turn things upside down," Potofsky declared, adding: "Wake up this sleeping giant of ours. Put to work our power as consumers—as we have already used our power as producers and as voters—to help build stronger unions and a better America."

Ability-to-Pay Concept Keys War Tax Support

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Organized labor has restated its belief in the need for a temporary war tax, but made clear it would vigorously oppose the methods proposed in the Johnson Administration measure.

"We believe the required sacrifice should reflect ability to pay," the convention resolution declared.

The AFL-CIO said the temporary surtax should be "substantially greater" on corporations than on individuals in view of skyrocketing corporate profit levels.

The surtax on individual income should be more fully based on ability to pay than the proposal of the Administration now provides, the resolution added. Instead of a flat 10 percent tax with exemption for low-income families, there should be specific deductions allowed for each individual with the surtax applied to the remainder of the tax due.

Finally, the AFL-CIO said, the Administration proposes no wartime levy on income sheltered by loopholes—the $22 to $24 billion of untaxed income which individuals and companies receive from capital gains, oil depletion and other allowances and tax-free bonds.

With these three changes, based on the concept of ability to pay, a temporary tax surcharge should be enacted as soon as possible, the convention said.

The tax resolution covered two other areas: tax reform and the return of federal revenues to cities and states in need.

The resolution said the next priority after the war surtax should go to a "thoroughgoing loophole closing" which would yield billions of dollars badly needed by the nation, ease the tax burden on lower income groups and restore faith in the fairnes of the tax system.

In its statement on federal revenue-sharing, the AFL-CIO recognized the desperate needs of cities and states. But, it pointed out, these levels of government should make far greater use of progressive income taxes, now largely ignored by two-thirds of the states.

Most state and local tax revenue unfortunately now comes from regressive levies on consumers, property and payrolls—taxes bearing heavily on those least able to pay. These taxes extract a billion dollars a year from families below the poverty level, the resolution noted.

The federal government can help the states and localities in two ways, the AFL-CIO said. It can allow a credit for state and local income taxes against an individual's federal income tax obligation, thereby encouraging more progressive levies.

Secondly, as a result of loophole-closing and national income growth, the rise in federal revenues would permit funds to be shared through grants-in-aid to states and localities "whose needs are greatest" and for high-priority programs under enforceable federal standards.

"The AFL-CIO opposes, on the other hand, grants with no strings attached, which would invite the misuse of federal funds and prevent effective enforcement of federal standards," the resolution declared.

The Spirit of Unity

"I LOOK FORWARD to a great history for this organization," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told the convention, "I think we are on the right track."

His comment came after his election to a seventh term as president of the federation. He said in part:

Looking back over the years I think the most important day in the history of the American labor movement in my time was December 5, 1955, the day that we merged the AFL and the CIO and brought unity at least in form to the American trade union movement after 20 years of division.

The first few years, of course, there were some rough spots and I am sure that all the members of the Executive Council remember those days. It was not in the cards that we could merge and not go through some rough times, because we had the problem at the time of merger that we could either do it on a basis of perfection by eliminating all possible disputes between organizations, by outlining clear lines of demarcation in regard to jurisdiction between each and every affiliate.

Well, the people on the committee representing the CIO and the AFL realized that if we were going to build on that basis, going to eliminate all possible conflict before we merged, that none of us would live long enough really to merge. So we decided to take the difficult task to bring into one organization various unions with conflicting jurisdictions and to lay down a set of rules by which unions with conflicting jurisdictions could live in the one house and behave in some decent manner by which the conflict would not retard our forward progress.

AND HERE IN THIS hall on Wednesday, the 12th day of December, 1961, I think we finally achieved the formula which sealed the merger and set up the machinery by which we could in an orderly fashion keep order within the House of Labor and move forward. And that, too, is a very, very important date. What you witnessed here this morning is a result of those experiences.

What you witnessed here on the copper strike, the Kingsport strike, the J. P. Stevens probem and the various problems that our unions have and which everybody recognizes that no union should be called upon to fight alone. This is the real spirit of the trade union movement. It goes back many years, goes back to the very foundation of the movement.

But basic to it all is the human element, and basic to everything that we do is the question of unity. As men gather together, as workmen gather together in a single union, so must unions gather together to do the things together which they cannot do separately or which they can do much better together than they can do separately.

So it is in that spirit, the spirit of continuing unity that I look forward to a great history for this organization. I think we are on the right track. I think we have the respect of the American people.

I think that we have a responsibility to the community. I think we have demonstrated time and time again that we believe in America, that what is good for America must be good for the trade union movement.

We take our place in every phase of American life right from the grass roots level up, and I think there is a great future for this organization.

And to whatever extent I can continue to make a contribution, I am delighted and happy to do so. I don't want to do anything else except what I am doing.

Meany's Keynote:

Labor Enters Challenging Era Of Growth, Change, Opportunity

The following is excerpted from AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany's keynote speech to the seventh convention.

THE ESSENTIAL TRUTH is that—year in and year out—the trade unions of this country, as represented in this federation of ours, have constituted and will continue to constitute the vital main force of the progressive movement in America.

At no time, within my memory, has labor been better equipped and prepared to deal with its problems and responsibilities in society than is the case today.

Never has there been more real unity of spirit and purpose, in substance as well as form—within the labor movement as a whole.

Never have we been as active, through so many channels, in the pursuit of human progress as we are today.

The evidence is there—in abundance—for those who care to look without the blinders on.

It points, not to any decline of force and vigor—but to the beginning of a new and challenging period of growth, change and response to the needs and opportunities of our times.

It can be seen in the record of the recent past—a record of extraordinary progress achieved—not through any single course of action—but through the interplay of all of our efforts on the organizational, the legislative, the economic and the political fronts.

This record demonstrates that a vast amount of vigorous and effective organizing work is being done by our affiliates—not under the domination or control of the federation—but with the active, energetic assistance and support of the federation and its staff.

That work has been going on—without drums, bugles or fanfare—wherever a solid opportunity has appeared.

Anyone who knows how to read a financial statement can find, in the Executive Council's report, that more than one-fourth of the income of the AFL-CIO is spent on direct organizing programs and activities.

Beyond that, a great deal of the resources of the federation are devoted to legislative, political and other work which has a very strong, if indirect, bearing on the success of our organizing campaigns and the climate in which they are carried out.

The performance of free collective bargaining, as an instrument of social and economic progress, continues to confound the critics and the soothsayers.

While they have been writing its obituary notices, the working people of America have continued to demonstrate their faith in that instrument and new groups in our economy are learning to use it to their advantage.

Those who really understand the nature of a free and democratic society, where no one group or class dictates or dominates, know that collective bargaining is essential to its strength and survival.

Collective bargaining is the only effective way in which a free society can adapt—in a constructive way—to changing economic conditions in the thousands of different industries, trades and work places of the nation. It is the only way in which the benefits of economic progress can be fairly distributed throughout our society.

The results of the thousands upon thousands of negotiations, settlements and agreements that are taking place year in and year out in this country have brought—over time—the most profound and revolutionary changes and improvements in the pattern of our national and family life.

TAKEN ALL IN ALL, and in spite of our faults, it is no exaggeration to say that of all the major voluntary groups in our society—church, civic, social or economic—the trade union movement is the most completely integrated organization in America.

I could go on to detail the role the AFL-CIO has played and is playing in virtually any area of social concern that might be named. Medicare—federal aid to education, housing legislation, rent supplements, model cities' legislation, minimum wage, the anti-poverty program, social security—all reflect, in some degree, the heart and hand of the AFL-CIO.

The record will bear that out. I am proud of that record. I do not like to see it downgraded or misrepresented.

It is not a perfect record—nor are any of us perfect. There are no saviours or supermen among us. As I have said before, we are an imperfect body of imperfect men—trying our level best to do our duty in a very complicated, imperfect and rather messy world.

Perhaps the AFL-CIO is not doing everything that it might or should in terms of humanity's broad economic and social needs and goals. But—of this I am sure—without the AFL-CIO very little would be done.

Organizing Pressed As Major Union Goal

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The organizing performance of AFL-CIO unions in bringing federation membership to the highest point in history proves conclusively that American wage-earners "still recognize in trade unionism and collective bargaining the surest machinery for economic and social progress," the convention declared.

"The foundation of successful organizing," it said in a resolution, "remains as ever the genuine acceptance" by every union member, whatever his role in the union, of "a responsibility to promote unionization among unorganized."

But even if that foundation existed to its fullest extent, the convention said, it would probably not be sufficient to meet today's unusual challenges. "On that foundation" it asserted, "must be built organizing programs carefully constructed, tailor-made to the needs, constantly mindful that no two campaigns are the same. Recognizing the difference may be the key to success."

The convention said organizing efforts must be directed by staffs that are "adequate, not just in terms of number, but also in terms of competence—trained organizers who can make up-to-date applications of traditional tools, who have capabilities in the modern techniques of communications, who seek constant improvement in methods and who are not fearful of innovation, who understand the value of local leadership and have the skills to develop it."

The AFL-CIO called on all affiliates to emphasize organizing as their No. 1 objective. It urged a "careful and critical analysis" of present procedures to determine what additional resources, including skilled organizers and finances, are needed to carry out the objectives.

The convention asked all affiliates to consider ways of providing programs for specialized training of volunteer and staff organizing personnel. Such programs should take account of the obstacles, "external and of our own making;" the changing character of industry; the composition of the new work force—the age, education levels, attitudes of its members; and the need for developing and using effective organizing aids.

The resolution advised all unions to give top priority to AFL-CIO cooperative organizing programs, recognizing the "important role such programs can play in implementing" each union's own organizing goals and help it meet its "general organizing responsibilities as a member of the American labor movement."

Dir. of Organization William L. Kircher said his department "has in the past two years maintained the highest rate of direct assistance to affiliates" of any like period since merger of the former AFL and the former CIO. The staff coordinated a "vast array" of material on imbalances in the labor law while being "deeply involved" in farm worker organizing and in coordinated campaigns elsewhere, Kircher said.

FARM WORKERS "envy you your unions, and the things you have been able to do for the American workingman," Dir. Cesar Chavez of United Farm Workers Organizing Committee tells AFL-CIO convention as Pres. George Meany listens. Later Meany pledged "we're with you" in struggle to organize.

Farm Workers 'Hunger' for Union—Chavez

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Farm workers are "willing to pay any price" to have a union, Dir. Cesar Chavez of the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee told the AFL-CIO convention in expressing gratitude for "27 long months of support" by the federation and its unions.

There is "not one farm worker who would not literally crawl on his hands and knees to have a union," Chavez declared. Recounting the troubles of farm workers who have been "excluded from all major social and labor legislation," he spoke of blacklistings, police harassment of union pickets, strikebreakers with "green cards" for border crossing, and no election procedure.

Systems of Misery

"The agricultural employer," he said, has "imposed a system on us of poverty and misery, enforced migration, exploitation, subhuman working and living conditions, and hunger. But it is changing now."

"The hunger we have is for a union, and we are going to have a union" regardless of employer opposition. He reported the union now has 10 contracts, and two more employers—Francia Wine Co. of Ripon, Calif., and the Paul Masson wine company —have agreed to talk terms.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany assured Chavez and his assistant director, Larry Itliong, "we are going to stay with you until you have a real union." By rising vote, the delegates unanimously approved a resolution pledging continued support of UFWOC organizing, and sustained effort to secure the protections of federal law for farm workers.

Progress of Farm Union Held 'Good Sound Start'

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Progress in organizing farm workers has been "dramatic and substantial," measured against the organizational difficulties of the past 35 years. But it is "simply a good sound start" when viewed in the perspective of the total problem and the need for unionization of farm labor nationally, the AFL-CIO reported here.

The strike that started more than two years ago in the grape fields of California's San Joaquin Valley entered its 28th month as the federation's seventh convention opened. Out of it came many benefits, including the uniting of two unions into one—the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee—and their chartering by the AFL-CIO, the delegates were reminded.

A resolution of support for the effort pointed out that the farm worker would be the first to recognize that he has had the hand not only of the national AFL-CIO but of almost every major affiliate. The convention said:

"Progress must continue. It must accelerate. There can be no justice in the continued snail's pace of second class treatment resulting from the farm worker's exclusion from federal laws.

"There can be no justice or good sense" in an immigration policy which denies aliens "any course of action which would depress American wages or standards, and then turns its back on practices" permitting strikebreakers to cross the national border.

Delegates commended the farm worker for his courage and success in "achieving the progress" of the past two years. The resolution also:

- Pledged accelerated support for these "heroic unionists" in their organizing efforts.
- Promised all possible effort to secure passage of state and federal legislation extending benefits of the National Labor Relations Act and other protective laws to agricultural workers.

Demanded that the Justice Dept. take steps to deny the employment of any alien who holds a "green card" visa on any farm or for any employer in the U.S. where a strike certified by the Dept. of Labor is in progress.

Trade Policy Warns Against Undercutting

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Organized labor made clear here that its support for expanded trade involves increased employment and progress at home and among America's allies and "does not extend to promotion of private greed at public expense or the undercutting of U.S. wages and working conditions."

The AFL-CIO convention lashed government and business policies which have encouraged the large scale export of private capital to already-industrialized nations. These operations have cost American jobs, cut exports and added to imports, the AFL-CIO said in calling for investigation of the problem and direct restrictions on private investment overseas.

The convention resolution also pointed out that the rise in imports has adversely affected some domestic industries and imposed "severe hardships on thousands of American workers."

The resolution insisted that trade adjustment mechanisms designed to cushion the effects on workers be applied. It urged the U.S. to seek a workable system of international fair labor standards in trade to protect U.S. workers against unfair competition and to assure foreign workers a fair share of benefits from their countries' increased trade.

Tracing major trends, the AFL-CIO pointed out that private capital outlays for plants and machines in foreign nations jumped from $3.8 billion in 1960 to $8.7 billion in 1966—totals which include outflows from the U.S. as well as plowed-back profits and funds raised abroad.

Outflows from the U.S. for investment overseas soared from less than $1 billion a year in the 1950s to $1.7 billion in 1960 and $3.5 billion in 1966—"contributing substantially to America's balance of payments deficit."

"The skyrocketing rise in the export of U.S. private capital and operations of international corporations have cost American jobs, cut into American exports and added to imports," the AFL-CIO said, adding:

"The sharp rise of U.S. private investment has been overwhelmingly in industrial countries rather than the developing nations which badly need increased investment and an adequate share in the expansion of world trade."

Labor's support of an expansion of trade, the resolution declared, does not extend to promotion "of private greed at public expense" or undercutting of U.S. wages and standards. Labor's goal, it added, is increased employment and improved living standards and job conditions here and abroad.

The resolution then listed a wide range of recommendations aimed at complex trade problems. These stressed adjustment mechanisms generally and in specific commodity areas to cushion the impact on domestic industries and workers and aid displaced workers.

Human Rights Year In 1968 Endorsed

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Strong support for Intl. Human Rights Year in 1968 and the week of Dec. 10-17 as Human Rights Week was voiced by the AFL-CIO convention here.

The delegates approved a resolution reaffirming labor's "dedication to the ideals and aims of the universal declaration of human rights" and appealed for "tireless efforts to advance and protect, at home and abroad, the ideals embodied in this historic declaration."

Vigorous Steps Asked To End Rural Poverty

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Vigorous and wide-ranging efforts to wipe out the poverty of rural America were called for by the AFL-CIO convention.

One-half of all the impoverished people in the nation live in the countryside, said the resolution adopted by the delegates. While farm technology may have displaced millions of marginal farmers and created many migrants, there also persists the poverty of Appalachia and Indian reservations as well as exploitation of farm workers.

The resolution put labor's continued support behind government credit and income-maintenance programs for family-operated farms and others who need it rather than to big growers.

"Moreover, the discrimination against minority groups that has characterized administration of farm programs, particularly in the South, must end," the resolution added.

The statement also called for greater efforts to aid "the most exploited people on our farms—the farm laborers." The AFL-CIO urged an end to imported farm labor, inclusion of farm workers under all federal and state protective and social welfare legislation —especially under the National Labor Relations Act—and support of farm labor organizing campaigns.

Labor demanded an attack on rural hunger and disease through federal food distribution and emergency health programs, particularly in the 800 counties now outside the Surplus Commodity and Food Stamp programs. Minimum standards should be required under all federal welfare programs, it added.

The convention also backed expansion of the Appalachian Regional Development program, the Economic Development Act and other programs to speed up construction of public facilities and creation of jobs.

30-Hour Week Urged for GPO

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The public printer of the United States was urged in an AFL-CIO convention resolution to recommend a 30-hour workweek for the 1,700 printers employed in the Government Printing Office in Washington, D.C.

The convention approved a resolution pointing out that wage rates for GPO printers are adjusted annually in accord with the weighted wage rates paid to commercial printers in the U.S.

It notes that the public printer also has the legal authority to adjust the workweek in line with he workweek in the same 25 cities, which now is 2.5 to 5 hours less than that worked at the GPO, the "largest printshop in the USA," according to the resolution's sponsors, the Typographical Union.

Threat to U.S. Programs Seen in 'Back-Door' Bill

Bal Harbour, Fla.—A little-noted bill passed by the Senate represents "a back-door attack on federal aid to education, civil rights, the war on poverty and many related programs," the AFL-CIO charged.

The bill, pending in the House, would empower any person to challenge in court a broad series of federal aid programs as violating the First Amendment prohibition against "establishment of religion."

While respecting the sincerity of some of the supporters of the court test legislation, the convention warned that "their sincerity is being exploited by others with baser motives."

It was the carefully worked out legislative language permitting limited assistance to children attending church-operated schools which made possible the breakthrough of federal aid to education, the resolution noted.

Judicial intervention on the basis of individual taxpayer suits "would disrupt the orderly functions of government in general and . . . could destroy the effectiveness of the education, health and general welfare programs now in being," the resolution warned.

It declared that the AFL-CIO is "unalterably opposed" to the Senate bill and any similar measure.

'Major Bulwark':

Labor Vows Drive to Extend Free Collective Bargaining

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Collective bargaining is a flexible institution that has proved itself a "major bulwark of a free society" and the AFL-CIO will work for its continued extension to "all wage and salary workers," the convention declared here.

By unanimous vote, the delegates rededicated themselves to preserve and extend the right of working men and women to organize into unions and "freely negotiate agreements" with their employers.

Despite a record of positive accomplishments, the convention said, attacks on collective bargaining continue in the form of "right-to-work" laws, well-financed programs seeking to alienate workers from their unions, and propaganda for anti-trust regulation of unions and compulsory arbitration.

In addition, there have been attempts to "impose unfair and unworkable restrictions" on bargaining for wages, the convention said.

It cited particularly the attempt by the President's Council of Economic Advisers to set a "single, rigid nationwide figure" based solely on productivity without establishing an effective guideline for prices and "absolutely no guidelines for profits, dividends, executive salaries and bonuses."

The convention declared:

"We will continue to utilize the institution of collective bargaining to develop solutions to the great problems of technological change, although we recognize that collective bargaining alone cannot fully resolve these nationwide problems.

"We will continue to press for wage and salary increases to offset rising living costs and to advance buying power . . . The nation's rapidly rising output per man-hour and business profitability make improvements in wages, salaries and fringe benefits possible within the context of a relatively stable price level.

"We will continue our drive" for reduced working hours through collective bargaining and legislation. "We will continue to seek improved vacations, holidays and other increases in paid leisure time."

The resolution pledged to help advance the security and well-being of workers through improved health and welfare plans, better pensions, new programs for guaranteeing employment, training and transfer programs, and more adequate supplemental unemployment benefits.

The resolution noted the advantages of pooled pension plans, especially for small bargaining units. It said labor will "continue to support the voluntary efforts of unions to coordinate their bargaining" and commended Federation Pres. George Meany and the staff of the AFL-CIO for the assistance provided, as in negotiations with the General Electric Co. and Westinghouse.

"We seek these collective bargaining objectives to improve American working and living standards," the convention said.

"We repeat our opposition to any nationwide formula for wage determination as unworkable in our huge country, with its varied industries and occupations." However, the delegates said, "if the President determines that there is a national emergency that warrants extraordinary stabilization measures—with even-handed restraints on all costs, prices, profits, dividends, corporate executive compensations, as well as employes' wages and salaries—he will have the support of the AFL-CIO.

"We are prepared to sacrifice—as much as anyone else, for as long as anyone else—so long as there is equality of sacrifice. But we will never sacrifice nor compromise our right as free Americans to bargain collectively with our employers on the conditions that affect our livelihood."

Another resolution called on all unions and central bodies to assist in the development of "all efforts to safeguard the health of American workers" and said all health services should be provided when possible on a direct-service basis, with preference given to comprehensive health care in an "organized setting" such as a group practice prepayment plan.

Steps Urged to Harness Technological Change

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Decrying the damage and disruption caused by rampant automation, the AFL-CIO called for a national effort "to humanize technological change."

Technological change is inevitable and is frequently desirable, the convention resolution said, but labor does not believe it requires human sacrifices.

"The hardships which it often causes occur because of national indifference and because those who introduce change are concerned solely with what is technologically possible and financially profitable," the resolution said.

"If an effort were made instead to humanize technological change—to adjust its speed to avoid dislocating workers and communities and to plan for its introduction—the hardships could be reduced to a minimum."

The AFL-CIO recalled that, in the 1950s, automation advanced rapidly while the labor force grew and the economy slowed down. The result was the loss of millions of hours of work, billions of dollars in production and incalculable hardship for millions of people.

To harness technological change, the resolution urged that:

- The federal government use its taxing, spending, lending and other powers to expand the economy rapidly enough to achieve and sustain full employment.
- The government commit sufficient resources to provide everyone with education and training.
- A truly national public employment service be created, with all government levels expanding efforts to place and train and relocate workers.
- All unions utilize collective bargaining to cushion the impact of change at the workplace, through contract provisions on consultation, job reduction by attrition, early retirement, income maintenance, shorter hours, transfer rights, and retraining.
- The workweek be reduced through legislation and bargaining.
- The federal government set up a clearinghouse to monitor technological change and make forecasts.
- Congress improve present income maintenance programs such as jobless pay, social security, workmen's compensation, public assistance and the minimum wage law.

Joseph A. Beirne, an AFL-CIO vice-president and president of the Communications Workers, described the pervasive impact of automation on every aspect of life today. It will have good and bad effects, he predicted, and automation will have to be harnessed for the good of man.

Simkin Cites Success Of Bargaining System

Bal Harbour, Fla.—There is no adequate substitute for collective bargaining, which is "performing its intended function," Dir. William E. Simkin of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service assured the AFL-CIO convention.

The system of industrial democracy in which labor and management "hammer out" decisions "is the only sound system," Simkin said in bringing the greetings of 260 U.S. mediators to the AFL-CIO. Despite assertions to the contrary, the system "meets the pragmatic test" in most situations, he declared.

Compulsory arbitration, Simkin said, is "a mirage—wishful thinking—a process that won't work for any appreciable length of time." Voluntary arbitration, however, can be useful but "labor and management must make the ultimate decisions" in most contract areas and third parties "must recognize" that truth, he declared.

Some strikes are inevitable, and serve a useful function but others are not necessary and not useful, Simkin said. He advised negotiators to make use of the "special purpose study committee" to tackle problem issues during the life of a contract and to make the grievance procedure work more smoothly.

Preventive mediation work has more than quadrupled during the last four years to the point that federal mediators engaged in nearly 1,200 such cases last year, Simkin said.

He cited a labor-management program developed at a General Dynamics plants in Fort Worth, Tex., and one that produced early agreement on new contract terms at the Kokomo, Ind., plant of Union Carbide Corp., where striking Steelworkers were forced back to work last year by a Taft-Hartley injunction. Both programs were developed with the help of mediators "between contracts," Simkin said.

Noting 1,900 instances in which union members rejected negotiated contract terms over a two-year period, Simkin urged efforts by unions to insure that contracts "once negotiated are really final and the membership supports the job that is done at the bargaining table in the same way you support Pres. George Meany."

AFL-CIO Calls for Drastic Revision To Restore Labor Act's Protections

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Congress was called on here to rewrite the National Labor Relations Act to make a reality out of the right of workers to organize and bargain collectively without discrimination by employers.

The AFL-CIO convention called for these "minimum changes":

- Repeal of Section 14(b) to "ameliorate the hostile environment which invites violence to union organizers, discharge of union adherents and defeat of union organizing campaigns." Such repeal would strengthen unions in "right to work" states, which make up all of the "poorest and least organized" states.
- End the "inordinate and interminable delays" made possible by Taft-Hartley amendments in unfair labor practices cases and representation proceedings. The right of the NLRB to conduct pre-election hearings should be restored, the convention said, as one step in speeding up all NLRB proceedings.
- Correct the "flagrant inequity" of the act, which permits the issuance of mandatory court orders, in advance of NLRB hearings, against a "long list of union activities" and "no comparable sanction against any employer unfair practice." Employers should be required to reinstate workers as soon as the NLRB general counsel finds there is reasonable cause to believe they were fired for union activity, so that "victimized employes can continue to earn a living while the employer takes further legal processings."

"Every union in this convention," Vice Pres. Paul Swaity of the Textile Workers Union of America told the delegates, "has experienced the frustration and the injustices that have come to workers trying to organize under the present law. But nowhere have employers taken greater advantage of the inadequacy of this law" than in the South.

Workers favoring a union are "spied on like criminals," Swaity said. "They are called into the bosses' offices and interrogated for hours, again and again. They are threatened, told their plants will close and, if they strike, will be replaced and their jobs lost."

If the South remains unorganized "it's not because the workers don't want a union," the TWUA man said. "It is because workers are being fired and blacklisted and their families victimized." And when they win an election, "the company refuses to bargain" and workers face a conspiracy of Southern employers determined to crush the union, Swaity declared.

The resolution pointed out that "fair enforcement of the act requires open-minded federal judges, not anti-union ones." All too often, it said, federal judges are predisposed against unions, "particularly in the very areas . . . where unions most need fair and just treatment."

Labor's economic weapons, which sometimes restrained employers under the Wagner Act from illegal acts during an organizing campaign and from bad-faith bargaining afterwards, have been "blunted by unfair restrictions imposed on legitimate union activity" by the Taft-Hartley and Landrum-Griffin amendments. "These must be eliminated," the convention said.

The rule of agency in the present NLRA should be changed "so that third parties who do an employer's dirty work for him can be held responsible" for their anti-union conduct.

Employes who most need union organization and collective bargaining — agricultural workers, employes of non-profit hospitals, guards and others—should not be excluded. The convention declared:

"In sum, the National Labor Relations Act must be drastically and totally revised so that it is once more the magna charta of American labor. The promises it holds out to workers must be made real and the unwarranted shackles it places on unions must be removed."

Fire Fighters Hailed On 50th Birthday

Bal Harbour, Fla. — The AFL-CIO convention unanimously extended "warmest congratulations" to the Fire Fighters on the union's 50th anniversary.

The resolution, noting the coming of the anniversary in February 1968, praised the Fire Fighters for their long record of solidarity in labor matters and urged fuller public recognition and adequate compensation for their hazardous work.

Beyond 'Half-Loaf' Care:

National Health Plan Goal of New Drive

Bal Harbour, Fla.—A new drive for a comprehensive national health insurance program will be launched by the AFL-CIO.

A convention resolution mandated the labor movement to "take the initiative" in devising, in cooperation with other progressive groups, "a medically advanced and economically sound program of national health insurance."

"Progress has been made in recent years in improving the availability of health care," the convention noted, but "the richest country in the world" should not have to stop with "half-a-loaf" programs.

"America can afford to relate services to medical needs rather than to make money the primary passport to good health," the AFL-CIO said. And health care, it stressed, should be made available without a "pauper's oath."

The resolution noted that between 1950 and 1965, the United States dropped from 6th to 11th place in infant mortality rates among the leading nations of the world.

"Significantly," it stressed, "all countries whose infant mortality rates are superior to ours have a system of providing or of financing health care for the vast majority of their citizens."

Other convention resolutions:

- Criticized curtailment of federal medicaid grants to the states imposed by the "economy bloc" in Congress.
- Urged updating of the Hill-Burton Act hospital construction program to provide federal grants to nursing homes and out-patient clinics as well as for modernization of existing hospitals and expansion of facilities.
- Pledged labor's support to legislation to overcome the shortage of doctors, nurses and other health personnel, to make medical services more widely available, and "to establish effective controls on the cost of medical care."
- Strongly endorsed the principles of comprehensive group practice prepayment plans as the best means of providing quality care with emphasis on prevention of disease with controls over costs. The resolution backed a proposal by the Group Health Association of America for federal assistance in setting up a series of community health care programs in cooperation with AFL-CIO central labor bodies.

The convention urged affiliates to contract with existing group prepayment plans for health, dental, eye care, mental health and drug services wherever possible. It recommended that collective bargaining agreements offer a choice of health plans to members.

Nursing Home Abuses

An area of "immediate concern," a resolution declared, is the quality of care rendered in many profit-making nursing homes. It cited "evidence that a substantial number of such nursing homes are charging medicare and medicaid patients for drugs and services they did not receive."

Both collective bargaining and legislation have helped to close the gap between "health needs and health opportunities," the convention noted.

Patterns set in union agreements have made some form of health insurance a common fringe benefit in employment. Legislative breakthroughs made in the 89th Congress have been carried on and in some cases improved during the 90th Congress, the convention observed.

The legislative gains in the health field are "very substantial" and represent "a major achievement of the Johnson Administration."

But, the AFL-CIO emphasized, "much remains to be accomplished."

Laws Urged To Safeguard Pension Rights

Bal Harbour, Fla. — Federal legislation to safeguard—but not straitjacket—private pension, health, welfare and profit-sharing plans was endorsed by the AFL-CIO convention.

The diversity of plans and funding arrangements requires a flexible legislative approach, the convention resolution stressed.

Thus it urged that legislation establish minimum requirements for vesting and funding of single-employer pension plans. Such standards are not necessary for multi-employer plans, the resolution noted, because such plans "contain built-in safeguards for the pension rights of workers."

It supported a uniform federal "fiduciary statute" applying to all types of benefit plans and providing civil remedies for abuse of trust on the part of administrators.

Any federal regulatory law, the resolution said, should provide both civil and criminal remedies against "employers who fail to comply with their financial obligations to an employe benefit trust."

The convention reiterated the AFL-CIO's support for pension reinsurance legislation and said an employer's obligations to a trust fund should have prior claim, after wages, on the assets of an employer who goes bankrupt.

Budget Slashers Assailed On Cutting Key Programs

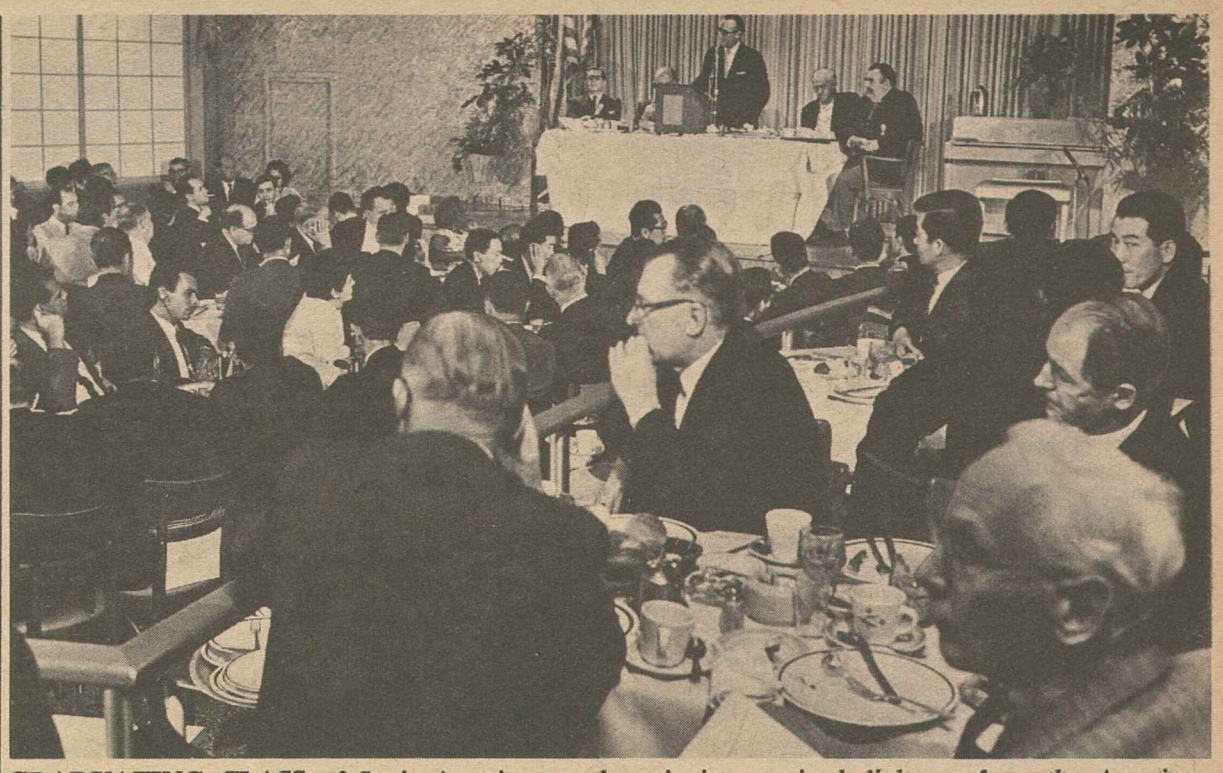
Bal Harbour, Fla.—"The AFL-CIO resents and rejects a drive to slash the budget of important federal programs," the convention said.

Delegates adopted a resolution denouncing the "concerted campaign" both within and outside of Congress "to cut federal expenditures without regard to their merit or their need."

The resolution specifically endorsed Federation Pres. George Meany's statement that "America can afford to continue to defend freedom in Viet Nam and solve the problem of its cities and its poverty-stricken citizens."

The statement said that AFL-CIO's "fair and equitable" emergency tax proposal would provide the funds needed "to fight both the wars for freedom and against poverty."

The convention went on record reiterating that position.



GRADUATING CLASS of Latin-American trade unionists received diplomas from the American Institute for Free Labor Development at a breakfast ceremony during the AFL-CIO convention. AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph A. Beirne addresses the graduates.

Major Improvements Held Urgent In Social Security, Public Welfare

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Major improvements in social security benefits and in the federal-state public assistance programs are still urgently needed, the AFL-CIO convention said.

Delegates adopted resolutions sharply critical of the House-Senate conference agreement on the social security bill.

They deplored the "vindictive" public assistance restrictions and the inadequate increase in social security payments—particularly for those receiving the minimum amounts.

Failure to expand medicare to disabled persons under 65, as recommended by Pres. Johnson, is a "glaring defect" in the bill the convention said. The lag in the taxable wage base puts too low a ceiling on benefits and deprives the program of needed funds, the resolution charged.

The convention reaffirmed labor's goal of a 50 percent increase in social security benefits "as soon as possible."

Once that basic increase has been achieved, benefits should be raised periodically to reflect rising wage levels so that beneficiaries can "share in our increased standard of living."

The wage base should be raised "to at least $15,000," the convention said, "to provide a fairer and more soundly financed social security system."

At the last AFL-CIO convention two years ago, labor for the first time endorsed the concept of financing future improvements out of general revenue as well as the payroll tax paid by workers and their employers.

This convention affirmed that position.

The resolution noted that the social security contribution rate is scheduled to rise ultimately to 5.8 percent. While it remains "an economic bargain" in terms of benefits received for contributions paid, "many low-wage workers are paying more in social security contributions than in income tax."

It urged that the social security law be amended "to establish a flexible zone of retirement between age 60 and 65" with "much less than a full actuarial reduction" in benefits for those who retire early.

The impact of automation and changes in the job market "has created serious problems for the older worker who is not yet 65 and therefore not eligible for full social security benefits," the resolution said.

The convention also asked an "occupational definition of disability for older workers so that any disabled worker after age 50 or 55 who is unable to handle his usual occupation would be entitled to social security disability benefits."

It strongly urged improvement of medicare by covering more of a beneficiary's medical care costs and combining the hospital care and voluntary medical insurance program "in a single fully financed program."

Medicare should be extended to the disabled immediately, the convention said, and "as soon as possible to all social security beneficiaries."

In a separate resolution on public assistance, the convention said the entire program "is in dire need of overhaul."

It expressed labor's firm opposition to punishing or coercing people because they are poor.

"For too many on welfare," the resolutions said, "there are only days of misery without enough food for their children, and nights of fear in slum housing, warding off marauding rats. For those 'lucky' enough to receive assistance, there are complex and degrading investigations.

"For too many, welfare is not only inadequate but appears a reluctant handout designed mainly to screen the poor away from the rest of the community."

The resolution strongly backed the recommendations of the Advisory Council on Public Welfare for a major reform of public assistance programs.

It also urged further study of proposals for providing income maintenance for those unable to support themselves.

HEW Chief Cites Aim Of Better Life for All

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Health, Education & Welfare Sec. John W. Gardner came to the AFL-CIO convention to tell the delegates what their government is doing and trying to do to build "a better America and a better life for all Americans."

His trip was necessary, Gardner said, because when "nothing gets in the papers unless it spells trouble, it is not easy for even well-informed citizens to hear of the good things that are going on."

Gardner summed up the Administration's goals in these words:

"We have set ourselves the task of removing every obstacle to individual opportunity, of eliminating every condition that stunts human growth or impairs human development, of doing away with every insult to human dignity."

Covering the areas of social progress which are the responsibility of his department, Gardner went beyond the massive "social landmarks" of medicare and federal aid to education.

Too few Americans, he said, are aware of "the beginnings of a revolution" in the nation's treatment of handicapped children.

"We value equality of opportunity," he noted. "What kind of equality of opportunity can there possibly be for a child who is born blind or deaf, or mentally retarded or crippled? Yet until recently we did all too little for such children . . . now resources have been made available. Research can be done, clinics can be built, teachers can be trained."

Gardner predicted that the public broadcasting act passed this year will, if it fulfills its promise, be regarded as a "historic" piece of legislation. He said a new education professions development act "may in the long run do more for teacher training than any law in history."

In 1960, Gardner noted, the budget of the U.S. Office of Education was $474 million; now it is $4.9 billion.

Gardner stressed his deep conviction that mankind has the knowledge and resources to create a better life. The main obstacles "are the ones we create ourselves through hatred or greed or lack of vision or lack of courage."

He told the delegates that he had "supported the labor movement all my adult life."

Now, Gardner said, "as Secretary of Health, Education & Welfare I find the labor movement supporting me—and supporting me when it counts. You have been vigorous and hard-hitting allies in every good thing Pres. Johnson has been trying to accomplish."

Histadrut Asks Direct Talks On Mid-East

Bal Harbour, Fla.—A durable peace in the Middle East can be achieved only through direct negotiations between Israel and the Arab nations, Sec.-Gen. Aharon Becker of Histadrut told the AFL-CIO convention.

"There can be no return to conditions which kept the area in terror and turmoil for 20 years and made it a danger to the nations that live there and to the peace of the world as a whole," Becker said, adding:

"Peace, then, is the great challenge and it can be achieved only if we and the Arabs sit down at the table and negotiate directly."

Only in this way, he added, can there be direct commitments to establish a peace "based on mutual respect and recognition, peaceful coexistence and cooperation."

Both Israel and the masses of the people in Arab countries need a genuine and durable peace, Becker stressed in scoring the record of Arab aggression "backed and encouraged by the massive armaments and sinister policies of the Soviet Union."

Histadrut, a labor federation founded in 1920 which played a key role in building the economic and social structure of Israel, now represents about 90 percent of all wage-earners, Becker said.

Israel was aided by others in the course of its development and feels an obligation to help the developing nations, he added. He thanked the AFL-CIO for its assistance to Israel's Afro-Asian Institute, which trains technicians and union leaders, and added:

"We in the international free labor movement must find the way to the hearts and minds of the workers in the countries of Africa, Asia and Latin America. We must continue to explain by word and by deed . . . that the only forces working sincerely for social peace and workers progress are the free labor movements."

Federation Affirms Policy On Affiliation

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO reaffirmed its long-standing policy instructing the Executive Council to give consideration to all applications for affiliation or reaffiliation by unions not in the federation in light of the AFL-CIO's constitution, rules, laws, standards and policies.

The convention adopted unanimously the recommendation of the resolutions committee on four resolutions dealing with the reaffiliation of the Teamster and the affiliation of other unions not now in the AFL-CIO. The policy was first set out in a resolution adopted at the 1963 convention.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany noted that the reaffiliation resolutions "have been coming in for several years and we have disposed of them in this way." He pointed out that there have been no such applications from the Teamsters and that the other unions mentioned in the resolutions have not applied for affiliation.

Responding to a comment from the floor from George Hardy of the Building Service Employes pointing out the raiding activities of the Teamsters in some West Coast areas, Meany said that the question at the moment was reaffiliation, adding "if these people raid our unions, I agree . . . that we should fight back, that everybody should get into the act."

JOB CORPS Gold Award is presented to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany by Sargent Shriver, director of the Office of Economic Opportunity. Shriver, who addressed the convention, told Meany that the plaque "was made by Job Corps kids themselves who wanted you to have it."

Labor Asks Expansion Of Drive to Aid Poor

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO has called on Pres. Johnson and Congress to expand the war on poverty and urged all local central labor bodies to take an active part in local community action programs.

In a related action, the delegates also approved a resolution endorsing the broad outlines of the $100 billion Freedom Budget for All Americans. The 10-year program of the Freedom Budget, prepared by the A. Philip Randolph Institute, would attack the problems of the poor along a wide front, from employment to housing, health and welfare services.

In the war on poverty resolution, the convention commended Congress for extending the Office of Economic Opportunity for two years with an authorization of $4.1 billion. The resolution urged both houses of Congress to appropriate the full amount authorized.

Concerning the local anti-poverty programs and the administrative changes which accompanied the extension, the resolution had this to say:

"The AFL-CIO is aware of the indispensable role that local community action agencies have played in the war on poverty. We feel that every effort should be made to retain a balance in the local community action agency that will permit the poor and other concerned segments of the community to continue their important role in developing new and innovative programs that meet the needs of the poor."

But, the convention added, "to win the war on poverty, much more needs to be done."

The convention called for these actions:

- Continued support of the war on poverty by organized labor at all levels.
- Expansion of the war on poverty by Pres. Johnson and Congress, with a "substantial" boost in the funding of OEO programs.
- Cooperation by local labor bodies with church, civil rights, school, social welfare and other community groups "in safeguarding the integrity of the local community action program to permit it freedom to develop, promote and carry forward meaningful anti-poverty programs."
- Adequate representation on local CAP agencies for central labor bodies, "along with representatives of minority groups and of the poor themselves."

Where possible, the convention said, state and local central bodies should initiate or sponsor programs through OEO.

Genocide Treaty Urged on Senate

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Ratification by the U.S. Senate of the genocide convention adopted by the United Nations in 1948 was urged by the AFL-CIO convention here.

The delegates adopted a resolution pointing out that the U.S. had played a leading role in securing its adoption by the UN and that 65 nations have signed the convention, making the U.S. "conspicuous" by its absence.

The UN document makes a crime of acts "committed with intent to destroy in whole or in part a national, ethnic, racial or religious group as such."

Under Federation Leadership:

Action Plan Pushed To Revitalize Cities

Bal Harbour, Fla.—If the nation's cities are not to move from crisis to catastrophe, the federal government must act immediately to provide the leadership and resources necessary for the long job of rebuilding urban areas, the AFL-CIO declared.

The revitalization can begin with the creation of one million public service jobs for the unemployed and underemployed, financed by a $4 billion program along the lines of the bill sponsored by Rep. James G. O'Hara (D-Mich.) and 76 other congressmen, a convention resolution said.

In resolutions on the urban crisis and on housing and urban development, the AFL-CIO called for rapid expansion of housing programs to achieve and maintain a rate of 2½ million new units a year along with other programs for mass transit, public facilities, welfare modernization and relief of rural poverty.

The convention also endorsed the Urban Coalition, a new and fast-growing grouping of labor, business, church, civil rights and civic organizations. The AFL-CIO, already active in the national coalition, said it would aid efforts by state and urban area labor bodies to initiate and take part in coalitions which support passage of federal and state legislation aimed at solving the urban crisis.

The urban crisis resolution made these chief points:

- Congress must immediately adopt legislation along the lines of the O'Hara bill to create one million public service jobs for the unemployed.
- A level of 2½ million new housing units each year. These would include public housing through new and rehabilitated units for low-income families, with the present rate of 30,000 to 40,000 a year rising to 300,000 in each of the next two years and 300,000 a year thereafter; housing for lower middle-income families ineligible for public housing units; moderate-income housing through an easing of funds; open housing in suburb and city; urban renewal units; model cities and new town housing.
- Mass transit in all metropolitan areas.
- A speed-up in construction of public facilities, with Congress urged to adopt a $2 billion a year grants-in-aid program to state and local governments.
- A substantially expanded neighborhood youth corps.
- Quality education through increased aid to slum schools and fuller use of school facilities.
- Manpower training linked with placement and bolstered by increased allowances.
- A restructuring of public assistance, with aid based on need alone and according to federal minimum standards.
- Relief of rural poverty, primarily in the southern and southwestern states, with full extension of federal aid and protective legislation.

The AFL-CIO pointed out that labor standards are protected in the 1965 and 1966 housing acts and also urged each central labor body to create a housing committee to help carry out housing programs.

U.S. Urged to Spur UN Housing Effort

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO has called on the U.S. representative to the United Nations to offer American leadership in the effort to provide better housing for people everywhere through UN agencies.

A convention resolution noted that the American labor movement has been making notable contributions in cooperation with the American Institute for Free Labor Development, the American-African Labor Council, the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions and the Foundation for Cooperative Housing.

"In order to intensify the international efforts to improve housing conditions throughout the world." it added, "the United Nations Center for Housing, Building & Planning should be expanded and a specialized agency in this vital field be established in the UN."

Shriver Reports War on Poverty Being Won With Active Labor Aid

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The national war against poverty is being won, with the number of people classified as poor now down to the lowest ever at 15 percent, Sargent Shriver told the AFL-CIO convention.

"People are coming out of poverty two-and-a-half times faster right now than ever before in the recorded economic history of our country," reported Shriver, who has headed the Office of Economic Opportunity since its inception.

"We are able to say," he continued, "that minority people are coming out of poverty now at the same rate as white people and that has not happened before in the history of our country.

"We are able to say that after two-and-a-half or almost three years of war against poverty, the percentage of poor people in America is down to the lowest it has ever been—15 percent."

Shriver said the fact of a booming economy has helped tremendously, but the anti-poverty programs have been made to work by the valuable contributions of unions, religious groups, women's organizations and other volunteers.

He paid special tribute to a number of labor-backed projects.

Of the first group of 50 job corpsmen who were trained by the Operating Engineers at Jacobs Creek, Tenn., Shriver said, three went into the Army and the other 47 got jobs in construction. While the average pay for boys and girls after graduation from the Job Corps is $1.71 an hour, the youngsters trained by the Operating Engineers earn $3.55 an hour, he said.

He told the delegates about the case of Juan Fernandez of Snyder, Texas. He said Fernandez was one of 10 children, quit school in the sixth grade, spoke Spanish at home, could not read or write English, couldn't write Spanish. After going through the Operating Engineers' program, Shriver said, Fernandez was placed with a construction firm in New York's Westchester County. He is a member of Local 137 and is earning union wages.

"None of them could have served in the Army; none of them could have gotten a job two years ago. Today, over 700 of them are in Viet Nam; a half-dozen of them, I am sorry to say, have already been killed there. Two of them have been cited for bravery in Viet Nam.

"These kids can now serve their country. They can hold jobs, they can live lives as full-blooded participating Americans. That's the Job Corps, and you have helped to make it."

Shriver also singled out Building Trades programs in St. Louis, where the Urban League and unions turned 11 school drop-outs into full-fledged apprentices, and in Kansas City, where Building Trades unions opened up 500 training slots for youngsters from the Job Corps and Neighborhood Youth Corps. He cited the work of the 11-union Watts Labor Community Action Committee and the Charleston, W. Va., AFL-CIO as evidence of organized labor's grass roots involvement in the war on poverty.

Spells Out Program:

AFL-CIO Reaffirms Drive To Win Full Equality for All

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO strongly reaffirmed its determination to achieve full equality for all minority groups in all aspects of life in America, noting the accomplishments to date and the long distance still to be traveled.

In a far-ranging resolution covering all aspects of the civil rights battle, the convention asserted "there is no question as to the role we must play" in overcoming the "centuries of brutal slavery, discrimination and inequality."

The resolution spelled out specific measures and steps needed in equal administration of justice, voting, public accommodations, education, housing and employment, stressing the "complex and difficult problems" involved in achieving equal opportunity for minority groups in both the North and South.

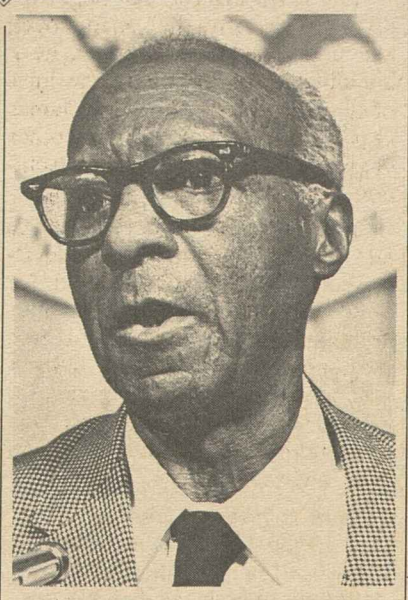
It pointed up also that while Negroes constitute the largest minority group, discrimination is still rife with respect to Spanish-speaking Americans, Indians, Japanese and Chinese Americans.

AFL-CIO Vice Pres. A. Philip Randolph hailed the resolution as "comprehensive in scope" and a "vigorous and compelling" reaffirmation of labor's commitment to equal rights.

Noting that many white liberals have withdrawn their active support from the civil rights struggle and that alienated Negro youth have retreated, disguising their actions "in the language of false militancy," Randolph declared that he would continue to oppose any group that "would substitute escape and withdrawal for democratic struggle."

The "black power" advocates, Randolph warned, are moving down a road that leads to "black impotence and defeat."

Hailing AFL-CIO support of the Freedom Budget—a 10-year program for the elimination of poverty and slums formulated by the A. Philip Randolph Institute—the civil rights leader called for a strengthening of the alliance between the Negro and labor movements in 1968.



A. PHILIP RANDOLPH

Vice Pres. Max Greenberg, urging strong support and backing for the resolution, told the delegates that the "enemies of progress shall not be permitted to use the war in Viet Nam as an excuse to conduct a war against the poor people of our country . . . to cut back or eliminate measures to redress the wrongs that have been done to Negroes and other minority groups for literally hundreds of years."

The convention-adopted resolution noted that the reduction of discrimination in the past few years had raised expectations that minority groups "would move up the economic ladder into the mainstream of American life at a faster pace than before. For many this has happened, but many others have fallen further behind."

The resulting frustration has increased the crisis in America's cities and "has contributed to both riots and backlash which interact on each other and in turn make more difficult the solution of the problems," the resolution declared.

Dealing with each of the key areas separately, the resolution called for:

- New legislation to guarantee the elimination of discrimination in the jury system and the protection of those working for implementation of laws already enacted.
- A greater effort in the voter registration campaign to increase the election of liberals of all races in the South and across the country.
- The elimination of the last visible traces of denial of public accommodations because of race, etc., an area where the best results have been achieved.
- A special multi-billion dollar school fund authorized by the federal government to aid the cities in attaining equality in education. The problem of separate school systems is a major one and must be eliminated, but the existence of defacto school segregation—a complex moral and economic problem—will require even greater efforts to eliminate. The latter poses questions that have no simple solutions.
- Passage of a federal fair housing law, an area in which the nation has made less progress in achieving equal opportunity than in any other. Housing is at the heart of America's urban crisis and the lack of fair housing is particularly acute.
- Intensified programs of employment opportunities for minority groups "without tearing the fabric of union security for all workers. Simplistic racial quota approaches are not an answer to fair and full employment."
- The extension to additional cities and areas of the programs created to recruit, tutor and counsel apprentices in meeting standards for apprenticeship.
- Continuing efforts to eliminate the few segregated locals that remain in existence and adoption of contract clauses to eliminate barriers to equal opportunity in promotion for all workers.
- Negotiating non-discrimination clauses in all collective bargaining contracts, use of bargaining machinery for handling problems of discrimination, and cooperation in retraining information and recruiting programs which will expand opportunities for those previously deprived.

COMEDIAN JERRY LEWIS was serious when he presented a plaque from the Muscular Dystrophy Associations of America "to the men and women of the AFL-CIO." He announced that the muscular dystrophy organization, which he heads, is establishing the George Meany Post-Doctoral Research Fellowship to be given annually to an outstanding young scientist in the field of muscle research. Lewis, who holds cards in 10 unions, earlier quipped that he came to the convention "to talk to you people about getting a break in the dues."

Wilkins Bids Labor Step Up Job Bias Fight

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The rate of progress in eliminating discriminatory practices in organized labor has been "far too slow," Roy Wilkins, executive director of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People told the AFL-CIO convention.

He told the delegates that the NAACP is "proud" of the partnership with labor in the fight for civil rights and noted the "invaluable service" of the federation in the leadership conference on civil rights.

Noting that the priority of the NAACP is "pro-Negro" and that this may give rise to misunderstandings in organized labor about activities on behalf of Negro workers, Wilkins listed some "specifics" to illustrate, he said, the slow progress.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said the federation was "completely aware" of the problem posed by Wilkins, that he did not resent "in any way" his approach and that while the AFL-CIO believed it was making progress in eliminating discrimination it is "not satisfied" with the pace either. Meany said labor would meet the "challenge" presented by Wilkins.

Wilkin suggested that the present need is for new definitions or new standards. For the most part, he said, voluntary compliance does not work either for unions or corporations.

Citing some groups in the AFL-CIO who are not following the "proud policy" of the federation, Wilkins urged the AFL-CIO to rise to the challenge wth new thinking and a fresh formula embracing all Americans in the work force at all levels.

Labor Stresses Role In Community Services

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Labor strongly reaffirmed its commitment to a broad-ranging community services program and called for stepped-up participation of unions and union members in the voluntary health and welfare fields.

The AFL-CIO convention pledged continued support to the voluntary agencies which provide needed services for the entire community, including union members, and stressed the desirability of federated fund-raising.

It's "the most effective and least wasteful method of community-wide planning and financing," the convention said.

A similar approach should be adopted for the voluntary health agencies, a convention resolution declared.

It paid tribute to the accomplishments of these agencies in research, public education and, in some cases, direct services.

But it noted also that "many voluntary health agencies, with their single disease approach and their competition for the contributor's dollar, have not realigned their program goals in relation to the increasingly important role of governmental agencies."

The resolution urged the voluntary agencies to set up a national health fund to coordinate their programs, allocate funds on the basis on need, and join in a single once-a-year fund drive.

It pledged labor's support for experimental single health funds in selected communities as a first step towards national federation.

Other convention resolutions:

- Praised the Vista program—Volunteers in Service to America who work in a broad range of anti-poverty programs—and urged unions to negotiate contract clauses guaranteeing reemployment rights to Vista volunteers and to encourage qualified members, particularly retired workers, to serve in Vista. Vista programs should avoid duplication of efforts or displacement of currently-employed workers.
- Urged the AFL-CIO, through its Community Services Activities and local central labor councils, to continue to press for "broad-based community representation" on the policy-making boards of united funds. It said United Fund boards should establish "priorities of service for the poor" and eliminate fee schedules based upon means tests.
- Stressed the importance of labor's community services program and urged that affiliates establish community services departments and central bodies set up committees, both with full-time staffs wherever possible, and that local unions also establish such committees.
- Asked all affiliates to work with local groups on preretirement planning, centers for retired workers, and opportunities for retired workers to volunteer their skills and talents in community services.
- Endorsed programs designed to train union members as community services leaders.
- Asked expanded programs for the "constructive use" of leisure time resulting from labor's success in collective bargaining.
- Said labor will support "only truly voluntary, wholly nonprofit and fully representative blood bank facilities."
- Urged expanded first-aid training for union members and its inclusion in all apprenticeship programs.
- Praised and endorsed the American Red Cross.

Federal Standards Declared Answer To Poor State Compensation Laws

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The federal government must set minimum standards for unemployment insurance and workmen's compensation because most state laws are woefully weak, the AFL-CIO said.

Convention resolutions praised the "valiant efforts" of AFL-CIO state central bodies to improve existing laws but said "the results have been all too meager."

The "bitter experience," confirmed in the two years since the last convention, demonstrates that a "piecemeal" approach to improvements in state laws "has not done the job in the past and cannot do it in the future."

The convention reiterated labor's support for federal unemployment compensation standards which would include:

- A major expansion of coverage to most of the workers now left out of state laws.
- Benefit ceilings moved up to two-thirds of the statewide average weekly wage.
- An extended benefit program for long-term unemployed workers with a steady work history, and at least 26 weeks of state benefits for all eligible workers.
- Safeguards preventing a state from imposing overly restrictive qualifications for benefits.

On workmen's compensation, the convention reaffirmed the AFL-CIO's support for a federal law or at least federal minimum standards which the state must meet.

It also called on state labor councils to seek to write into state compensation laws a 21-point program to remedy the most common deficiencies of existing laws.

The resolution noted that the workmen's compensation system is nearly 60 years old and that some of the weaknesses in state laws "were recognized right from the start" but have never been corrected.

Benefits generally have never kept up with rising wage scales, coverage for farm workers has been "shamefully ignored," one-third of the states fail to cover all occupational diseases, many fail to provide full medical benefits. The resolution said also that only about half the states provide rehabilitation programs and "many of these are not fully satisfactory."

A good example was set by Congress in 1966 when it modernized the Federal Employes Compensation Act which provides high standards of benefits for federal workers, regardless of the state in which they work.

"Despite the persistent efforts of the AFL-CIO state labor bodies," the convention noted, "few state legislatures have demonstrated a similar concern for injured workmen."

PoliticalAction Role Stressed By Auxiliaries

Bal. Harbour, Fla.—Full participation in labor's political action program was pledged by the AFL-CIO National Auxiliaries, who called on all members to give one day a week of their time from now until the November 1968 elections.

Delegates to a three-day convention, held while the AFL-CIO convention was in session, voted also to emphasize organizing and union label activities in their home communities while continuing other auxiliary programs — legislation, education, community services, civil rights and civil defense.

Officers Installed

Mrs. Marcella Beatty, executive director, obligated and installed the following officers for a new two-year term: Mrs. Beatrice Warwood, president; Mrs. Novella Porter, secretary-treasurer; Mrs. Hazel Utter, first vice president; Mrs. Lillian Ehrlich, Mrs. Maggie Reimann, Mrs. Viola Moss, Mrs. Loretta Craft and Rosine T. McLemore—the two latter vice presidents chosen to fill vacancies.

Mrs. Beatty reported that the steady growth of AFL-CIO unions presents the auxiliaries with a ready-made potential of 3 million new members. The potential is not being realized, she said, for lack of organizing womanpower and an effective communications program — one that "builds interest and enthusiasm and keeps them high."

The auxiliaries, she declared, must "help every trade union mother, wife, sister and daughter realize that the benefits of strong and effective unions flow directly into their homes and their communities."

All-Year Effort

Women in union families "ought to be involved in political work throughout the year" and their traditional role as mothers and homemakers "should put them right alongside their unions and the AFL-CIO in the battles to safeguard and expand the rights of American consumers," she said.

Convention speakers included AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler and Dir. of Organization William L. Kircher; Deputy Dir. Joseph Rourke and Mrs. Margaret Thornburg of COPE; Administrative Dir. Jacob Clayman of the Industrial Union Dept.; Sec.-Treas. Joseph Lewis, Union Label & Service Trades Dept.; Pres. Harry Spedick of the Jewelry Workers; Pres.-Emeritus A. J. Hayes, Machinists; Pres. Herrick S. Roth of the Colorado AFL-CIO; Mrs. Esther Peterson, Assistant Secretary of Labor; and Ena Blood of the Teachers Union, Trinidad.

INSTALLATION CEREMONIES for newly elected officers of the AFL-CIO National Auxiliaries were addressed by President-emeritus A. J. Hayes of the Machinists (right). Seated are Mrs. Marcella Beatty (left), executive director, and Mrs. Novella Porter, secretary-treasurer.

Resources Policy Puts Stress on Conservation

Bal Harbour, Fla.—America's natural resources should be developed, managed and conserved for the long-range good of all citizens, the AFL-CIO has resolved.

The convention approved a resolution on natural resources which made these points:

● Water development: There should be planning and development for the conservation, use and improvement of water quality through regional programs.

● Soil conservation: Programs to conserve the soil on private and public lands should be strengthened, particularly in strip mining areas, farm land and suburban land.

● Electric power: The AFL-CIO endorses the general goals of the proposed Electric Power Reliability Act now before Congress and urges that it be strengthened to achieve the aim of lower consumer bills.

Federal Power Commission controls over interstate wholesale power transactions must be expanded. Federal and non-federal public power yardsticks are indispensable.

State and local labor bodies are urged to work with other consumer groups and with state legislatures to modernize and strengthen utility commissions with the aim of securing fair rates for consumers.

State legislation should be sought to assure bargaining rights for all utility workers regardless of type of utility ownership. Federal power contracts should contain provisions protecting employe bargaining rights.

● Recreation and land use: More adequate appropriations and planning at every governmental level are necessary to acquire land for recreation, especially around urban areas and to block speculation. The national park system also should be expanded.

● Natural gas: Labor continues its support of effective regulation of interstate natural gas pipelines by the FPC. The pipeline safety bill passed by the Senate is a workable bill. But the House should strengthen the bill with criminal penalties.

● Shale oil: The AFL-CIO endorses an oil shale development policy which will include a multiple-use program, competitive methods and anti-monopoly safeguards.

● Federal public domain: Outdated land laws have led to resources deterioration on the 180 million acres of the public domain in Western states and 270 million acres in Alaska and should be modernized.

● Protection against monopoly: Historical federal safeguards against monopoly in natural resources should be strengthened.

● Minerals: Labor continues its support of a national minerals, raw materials and energy policy which would be stimulated by a needed updating of the President's Materials Policy Commission report of 1952.

Stronger Pollution Curbs Pushed

Bal Harbour, Fla.—New air and water pollution control programs should be beefed up quickly to correct the weaknesses in funds and enforcement, the AFL-CIO declared.

"Foot dragging by states, localities and private industry can no longer be tolerated," declared a resolution adoptel by the AFL-CIO convention here.

The 1966 amendments to the Federal Water Pollution Control program and the Clean Air Act of 1967 are blueprints for systematic efforts on a national scale to bring pollution problems under control, the resolution said.

However, control activities will remain weak unless funds are provided in adequate amounts and there is strong enforcement of meaningful standards, it added.

On water pollution control, the resolution urged Congress to restore the full $450 million authorized for fiscal 1968 for grants-in-aid to localities for water waste treatment plants. It also asked that the secretary of the interior be given authority to impose water quality standards on navigable as well as interstate waters and power to intervene to clean up situations where states are remiss.

The resolution also called for a speed-up in the processing of local applications for grants and for an amendment to control oil pollution from shore facilities as well as from vessels.

On air pollution control, the resolution asked Congress to amend the Clean Air Act and set national emission standards on the release of pollutants from stationary sources. Federal enforcement procedures should be strengthened and the timetable on state standards shortened, it added.

The resolution said the federal government should expand assistance in developing efficient electric-powered vehicles to aid in reducing the largest source of air pollution — emissions from gasoline-powered vehicles.

All unions were urged to participate in local and state programs to help win strong pollution control programs.

The resolution also said labor should be represented on the presidential air quality advisory board created by the 1967 laws. Labor continues to oppose any special tax benefits to industry for pollution control costs in its own operations, the statement concluded.

Pure Meat Law Hailed:

Consumer Action Blueprint Drafted

Bal Harbour, Fla. — Delegates representing 14 million union members and their families—the largest organized group of consumers in the nation—gave Congress a blueprint for action to protect the health, safety and buying power of the American public.

The AFL-CIO convention hailed the enactment of the new meat inspection bill, and expressed the hope that it would be followed with similar legislation to assure more effective inspection of poultry and fish.

It welcomed the start of congressional action on "truth in lending," ending a seven-year stalemate. But it stressed the importance of having a strong law covering all forms of consumer credit.

It reminded Congress of the need to tighten the pioneering truth-in-packaging law by substituting mandatory standards for voluntary procedures for setting weight and quality standards for packaged goods.

Formation of the new Consumer Federation of America was welcomed and labor also reaffirmed its support for the cooperative movement.

Delegates adopted a resolution calling for two measures to deal with the high cost of drugs.

For the elderly, it called for including coverage of drug costs under the medicare program.

For everyone, it asked that the Food & Drug Administration establish a National Formulary to give physicians an objective source of information on all prescription drugs. Thereafter, the resolution said, physicians should be required to prescribe by the generic rather than brand name of the drug in all cases where there is no superiority of one brand over another.

The convention also urged Congress to investigate "the insurance industry in all its aspects" and consider legislation to bring the entire industry under federal regulation.

It asked that a separate government agency be set up to give effective representation to the consumer viewpoint within the executive branch of government.

Labor's own consumer counseling program, through AFL-CIO Community Services, was praised and affiliates were urged to cooperate in bringing its benefits to union members and their families.

The convention backed proposals to prohibit distribution of unsolicited credit cards by banks and other financial institutions. It asked legislation to give buyers from door-to-door salesmen a reasonable period in which to cancel their contracts.

Overall, the convention said, "consumers need and should have adequate protection against fraudulent practices, assurance that products are safe to use, and product and price information that is adequate and accurate."

Federal Law Asked To Ban Garnishees

Bal Harbour, Fla.—A federal anti-garnishment law was urged by the AFL-CIO convention.

In approving the convention's wide ranging consumer protection resolution, the delegates called the seizure of personal earnings through wage garnishments an "unjust hardship" on workers.

The resolution also called for a congressional investigation of all "unfair and harsh debt-collection procedures."

Consumer Gains Keyed To Grass-Roots Efforts

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Betty Furness appealed to the American labor movement to generate the grass-roots action that is needed to move effective consumer protection legislation through Congress.

Miss Furness, the President's special assistant for consumer affairs, warned that "we cannot get strong consumer legislation without strong public support . . . things do not happen simply because they should happen. Things are made to happen."

The battle over truth-in-lending legislation will be fought on the House floor early in 1968, she noted and the bill reported by the House Banking & Currency Committee is "still not strong enough."

Unless more people let Congress know they want an effective bill, "you're not going to get it," she warned.

She read the list of other consumer legislation Pres. Johnson has sought and warned that on almost every consumer bill "there is a well-financed lobby working against it."

Labor's effectiveness at the bargaining table has meant bigger paychecks, but "the paycheck could go further" by eliminating "consumer gyps," she stressed.

Miss Furness praised the AFL-CIO Community Services programs and urged that each local union designate and train a consumer specialist to whom members can turn for guidance and help.

She urged also that local unions in urban areas lend technical assistance and facilities to help the poor in the ghetto neighborhoods get the best value for their money.

"The poor pay more for the food they eat, the products they buy, for the credit they use to buy those products, for their rent," Miss Furness said.

"Isn't it crazy," she asked, "that in a time when we are trying to deal in an honest way with poverty in America, much of our efforts are siphoned off in the form of extra exploitation of the poor?"

BETTY FURNESS

'Clearly Warranted':

Further Hike Sought In Minimum Wage

Bal Harbour, Fla.—A further increase in the federal minimum wage is "clearly warranted," the AFL-CIO convention declared.

Delegates approved resolutions reiterating labor's support for a $2-an-hour pay floor, asking coverage for all workers under the Fair Labor Standards Act, and calling for a 35-hour workweek.

The convention also urged more funds for enforcement of the Wage-Hour Law, noting that "in the last five years, violations discovered by government investigators doubled and the amount due workers tripled."

It noted that the 1966 improvements in the law "expand the volume of potential chiselling and enormously enlarge the enforcement task."

It praised AFL-CIO central bodies for responding to federation Pres. George Meany's request to help uncover violations in their communities and assist workers in filing complaints.

This assistance to low-wage workers should be continued, the convention said.

The minimum wage resolution noted that experience with the latest increase "again demonstrated forcefully" that raising the minimum wage helps workers without any serious adverse effect, "contrary to the fear-mongers."

It said the $1.60 an hour, which most workers will be guaranteed in 1968 and newly-covered workers will reach in 1971, isn't enough for a family to live decently.

The $2 minimum sought by the AFL-CIO should be achieved "as soon as possible," the convention said.

It urged that farm workers be put on the same step-up scale as other newly-covered workers. Under the 1966 law, their minimum will go up only to $1.30, while other new groups advance in two additional steps to $1.60.

The resolution also asked that Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands and American Samoa be brought up to mainland minimum wage standards as rapidly as possible.

On reduction in hours, the convention noted that "America is still some distance from full employment." It found joblessness among teenagers, Negroes and the unskilled "appallingly high."

To open up more job opportunities, the AFL-CIO again urged Congress to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act to require double time for overtime.

It asked a start towards reducing the legal straight-time workweek to 35 hours without a reduction in pay. And it urged a major government study of the leisure-time needs of the American people in view of "the inevitable reduction in working time."

In a variety of ways, the resolution noted, unions have been using their bargaining strength to "share productivity gains in the form of increased leisure."

It urged that these efforts continue, declaring:

"By enabling unions and management to choose from a variety of measures — through vacations, holidays, sabbatical leaves, early retirement and three-day weekends, as well as shorter standard workweeks — collective bargaining provides a flexible and effective method of making progress towards reducing working time."

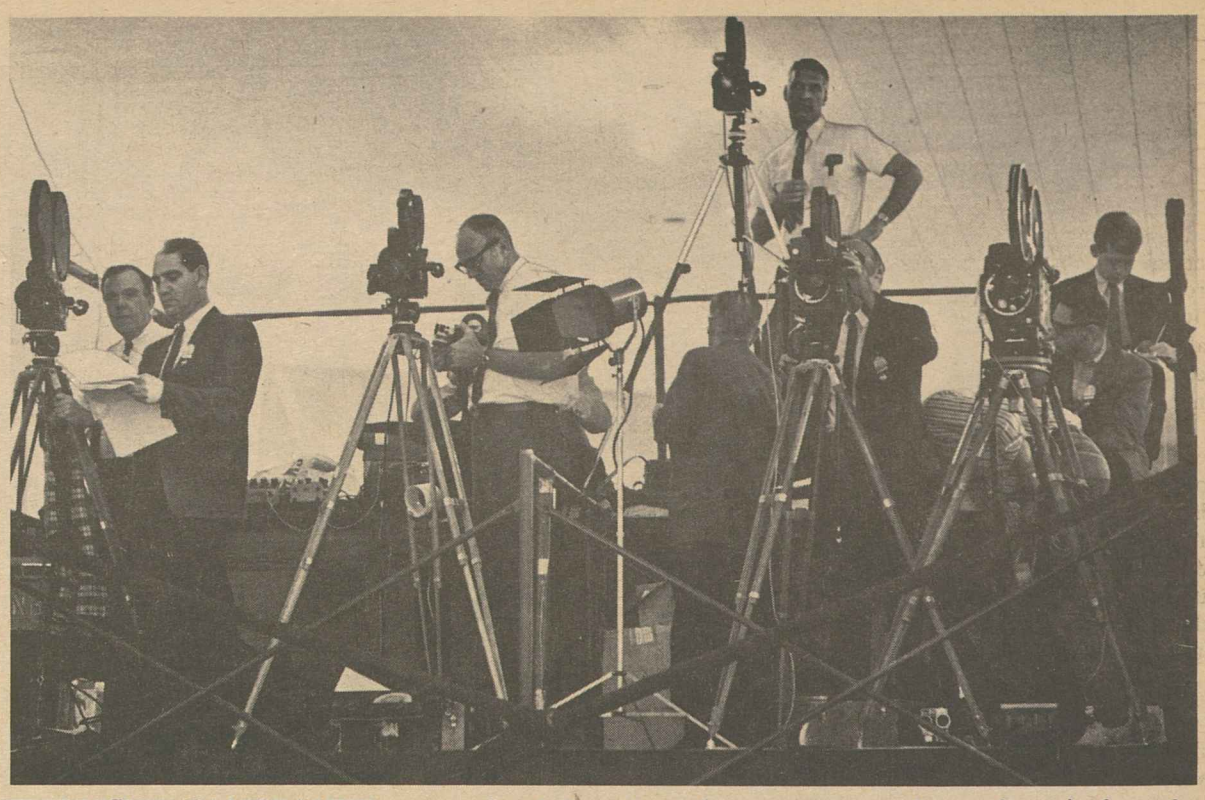
Dailies Opposed On Monopoly Bid

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Strong opposition to a proposed bill—the so-called Failing Newspaper Act—to exempt certain publishers from provisions of the antitrust law was voiced here by the AFL-CIO convention.

A resolution urged the Senate Subcommittee on Antitrust & Monopoly Legislation not to report the bill, on which the subcommittee has held hearings.

The proposed legislation was inspired, the resolution said, by an antitrust suit against the "scab-operated newspaper monopoly" in Tucson, Ariz., where 140 Typographical Union members have been on strike since Nov. 28, 1966.

Instead of preserving a free and independent press, as its sponsors claim, the bill "actually would legalize conspiracies to freeze out small businesses, destroy competing publications and close the door to new newspapers," the resolution declared.



TELEVISION CAMERAMEN were on hand throughout the convention and turned out in force for Pres. Johnson's speech, which was carried in full by the three major networks.

Convention Covered By 350 Newsmen

Bal Harbour, Fla. — Over 315,000 words were moved out over Western Union wires and countless thousands more were broadcast over radio and television in the four days of the AFL-CIO convention here.

The record coverage came from more than 350 members of the general and labor press, radio and television correspondents from all major news outlets both domestic and foreign.

Immediate transcriptions of major speeches and debates, cited by newsmen in a resolution of thanks to the AFL-CIO, aided the extensive reporting of the convention.

U.S. Crackdown Urged On Border Employers

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Elimination of abuses by U.S. employers which strain the long-friendly relationship between the United States and Mexico was called for by the AFL-CIO.

Convention delegates passed a resolution pointing out the low wages paid by firms engaged in "labor-intensive" operations in Mexico in electronics, apparel, textiles, plastics, luggage, toys, furniture, radios, machinery, wigs and processed food.

A resolution cited rates of less than 25 cents an hour to 75 cents in the highly skilled trades for products that would be produced under U.S. minimum wage standards of $1.40 an hour or more.

The products are sold in the U.S. in competition with goods made under U.S. labor standards. These operations, the AFL-CIO said, "result in runaway shops" and undermine wage and other labor standards. It asked the U.S. government to take immediate action to assure that wages and working conditions of U.S. citizens and the operations of employers who abide by U.S. labor standards are not adversely affected by low-wage operations along the border of Mexico.

Corrections Sought

"The Administration and the Congress should explore tax, trade and other appropriate mechanisms to curtail the export of U.S. capital for such purposes," the delegates declared.

They pointed out that the Mexican government's border industrialization program and its NF program encourage U.S. investors to use low-wage Mexican labor in the border areas to produce goods exclusively for imports and that U.S. firms have been moving across the border at a "mushrooming" rate in the past year.

To eliminate another abuse they asked that the U.S. Dept. of Justice act immediately to "end the fiction of permanent residents who actually are not residents at all" but commute to work across the Mexican border. Permanent U.S. resident privileges should be available only to those who are in fact residents, while work opportunities for commuters should be so regulated as to insure that their employment will not undermine U.S. standards, the convention said. It noted that tens of thousands of workers actually living in Mexico now hold "green cards" certifying them as actual U.S. residents.

Several delegates took the floor to relate first-hand experiences with low-wage Mexican competition—Roy R. Evans of the Texas AFL-CIO, Mary Callahan of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, and Sigmund Arywitz of the Los Angeles County AFL-CIO.

Evans said Texas labor has been fighting for years to relieve the "scandalous hours, wages and working conditions" along the Mexican border. Cutting down on visas and extending the minimum wage helped about half the 1.5 million Americans working under poverty-breeding conditions, but the others are harmed by competition with low-wage labor in Mexico hired by U.S. firms, he said.

Arywitz reported growing development of an industrial border strip where the Mexican government has "made it financially attractive" to U.S. employers to open factories and hire "the cheapest possible labor in this hemisphere." Miss Callahan said the IUE favors raising the standards of Mexican workers and working out problems "in fraternity with the Mexican Confederation of Labor."

Safety Needs Stressed for Atomic Plants

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO convention reiterated labor's support for developing the nation's atomic energy resources, but insisted on protective measures for workers and the public.

A resolution called on the Atomic Energy Commission to step up its development of economically feasible atomic energy technology. It also backed an expansion of atomic research for desalination of water.

New Guides Asked

The AFL-CIO statement endorsed legislation to establish guidelines on the issuance of licenses to construct and operate nuclear power plants. This policy would be designed to enable utilities to take part, to safeguard worker and public health and safety, to protect the air and water from radioactive wastes, and to meet the needs of power-short regions.

The convention also called for legislation to set up a standardized federal system of reporting and record keeping on occupational radiation exposure of workers and adequate workmen's compensation programs.

The resolution said a single federal agency should regulate all sources of radiation under a uniform code.

Continuation of the Labor-Management Advisory Committee to the Atomic Energy Commission also was supported.

San Francisco Chinatown Drive Backed

Bal Harbour, Fla.—A drive by the San Francisco Labor Council to end sweatshop conditions in that city's Chinatown section won support from the U.S. labor movement.

The AFL-CIO convention voted to back a local labor campaign to improve Chinatown wages and working conditions. It called on "enlightened employers and other influential residents" of the old Chinese-American quarter to cooperate with labor in seeking improvements. State and federal agencies were urged to insure compliance of Chinatown employers with wage and hour laws and similar statutes.

The convention resolution said workers, many of them recent immigrants, are being forced by their need for jobs to "work under pitifully substandard wages and conditions, often in violation" of state and federal laws.

The situation is particularly applicable, the resolution said, to retail stores, restaurants, bars and garment stores where workers are exploited directly by employers and indirectly by large manufacturers who contract for their work.

Youth Resolution Asks Full Employment Drive

Bal Harbour, Fla.—If the growing and explosive problem of youth unemployment is to be solved, it will require increased efforts to achieve full employment as well as training and education for young people, the AFL-CIO declared.

Despite the economic improvement between 1963 and 1966, the jobless rate remained high for young workers. And it swung upward from 12.7 percent in October 1966 to 15 percent in October 1967, the resolution noted, while the overall national jobless rate stood at 4.3 percent.

High as these youth jobless rates are, they still hide the true severity of much of the problem, the resolution said. For nonwhite youngsters in the ghettos, the jobless rate is about twice as high as for white youths. Surveys in some slum neighborhoods revealed that as many as 50 percent of the youths are neither in school nor at work.

Because young people have fewer skills and less experience, they wind up at the end of the hiring line. For this reason, the resolution said, a full employment policy is required along with education, training and counseling.

The convention appealed for expansion of the Neighborhood Youth Corps and Youth Opportunity Centers. Federal aid to education, including vocational education, should be increased for those in low-income areas. And, it added, the President's Council on Youth Opportunity should be fully backed.

In a related resolution on summer opportunities for youth, the AFL-CIO said it would prepare a program to enable affiliated unions and state and local central bodies to take part in widening summer job openings for young people across the nation.

The convention called on all central bodies to cooperate with the mayor's councils on youth opportunity.

FRATERNAL DELEGATES from the British Trades Union Congress and the Canadian Labor Congress addressed the convention, carrying on a long tradition. From left: H. R. Nicholas, assistant general secretary of Britain's Transport & General Workers' Union; Lord Cooper, general secretary of the National Union of General & Municipal Workers, and the CLC delegate, Vice Pres. William Ladyman of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

ICFTU Policy Backed On Totalitarian Visits

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO has reiterated its endorsement of the free world labor body's ban on exchange visits by free trade unions "with the so-called unions operating under the control of any totalitarian regime."

The convention called on all AFL-CIO affiliated unions "to respect and observe fully this policy" of the 63-million-member Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions.

The convention said in a resolution that it is harmful to maintain such a ban while in actual practice some ICFTU affiliates carry on relationships with organizations which "are actually state company unions."

The AFL-CIO said it hoped the special committee appointed by the last ICFTU executive board meeting would bring in proposals to reinforce the capacity of the ICFTU to follow its founding objectives of strengthening free world labor movements and fostering strong free unions in developing nations.

The resolution adopted by the delegates dealt with safeguarding and strengthening the ICFTU, the associated international trade secretariats and the tripartite Intl. Labor Organization.

The resolution said constructive ICFTU efforts are the best guarantee for defeating "recently stepped-up" moves by the Communist-dominated World Federation of Trade Unions to penetrate and "subvert" the trade secretariats and win control of the ILO.

The AFL-CIO also urged ICFTU action to unify the democratic forces in the ILO and safeguard that body's work in the developing nations. Finally, it appealed to all AFL-CIO unions to join their appropriate trade secretariats and to the ICFTU to devise tactics to defeat attempted Communist subversion.

Labor Condemns Despots of World

Bal Harbour, Fla. — The AFL-CIO convention called for the restoration of democracy in Haiti, Greece, Portugal and Spain.

It said Haiti is led "by one of the most brutal and utterly inhuman tyrants in the history of Latin America."

The resolution condemned the military junta in Greece and asked restoration of democratic rights. It termed the continued suppression of human and union rights in Portugal and Spain "outrageous."

Fund Slashes Seen Periling Aid Programs

Bal Harbour, Fla.—"The foreign aid program is in trouble," declared AID Director William S. Gaud in appealing to organized labor to help win wider support to prevent damaging slashes in aid programs.

Gaud, administrator of the Agency for Intl. Development, told the AFL-CIO convention that "it looks as though the program the President has proposed will be slashed by some 25 percent." He said this means:

"We will have to reduce sharply our programs in India, in Pakistan and in Africa.

"We will not be able to carry out our part of the plans made last spring at the Punta del Este conference to increase efforts in agriculture, education and health in Latin America under the Alliance for Progress.

Areas 'Shortchanged'

"We will have to shortchange our security-oriented and military aid programs in East Asia and elsewhere.

". . . Today, the foreign aid program is in trouble. It is in trouble because too few people understand what it is all about."

In asking for labor's continued backing for aid programs, Gaud stressed the mutual interests of the U.S. and the developing nations in achieving progress and stability. Time is now the critical factor, he said, adding:

"It really comes down to this: more than a billion and a half people—over half the population of the world—no longer accept hunger. They no longer take low wages for granted, or disease, or lack of opportunity. They want change and they want it fast."

New Nations' Progress Tied to Free World Aid

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The future of the developing nations of Africa, Asia and Latin America is threatened by "a steadily greater shrinkage of development aid" from advanced countries, a free world labor leader told the AFL-CIO convention.

"Soon we will no longer be able to call them developing countries unless we can reverse a dangerous trend," declared Gen.-Sec. Harm G. Buiter of the 63-million member Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions.

Buiter, elected this year to succeed recently-retired Omer Becu, made a special appeal to American labor to fight protectionist moves in the U.S. aimed at raising tariff barriers.

He urged that free labor movements help the developing nations diversify their economies and build strong unions to ensure that large numbers of people benefit from economic development.

Buiter, who is from the Netherlands, also called for a "full and frank" discussion on the subject of contacts with trade unions in Communist nations when the ICFTU holds its 9th World Congress in New York City next July.

ICFTU Position

He said the lessening of international tension is welcome, along with steps between governments to safeguard world peace.

"But," he declared, "that does not mean that we have anything in common with those who deny free trade unions, who oppose democracy, who ban free elections, free speech, the right to free assembly, and with organizations where we may find, as in Soviet Russia, that the newly-appointed—not elected—'trade union' chairman was formerly the chief of the state security police.

". . . I do not share the optimism of some of my fellow trade unionists who believe that cracks in the Communist bloc and the possibilities of promoting what, with naive optimism, is often wrongly called the 'detente' justify certain forms of contacts with Communist-led organizations."

Free Labor Goals

Buiter listed a number of tasks for free labor movements: to organize the unorganized, both among the newer white collar and technical groups and among the underprivileged outside the mainstream of labor; to win for unions a greater voice in national economic decisions.

But his stress was on labor in the developing countries, observing "the needs are immense" and "the means are scanty."

The need, he said, is to help these young unions gain strength through the creation of cooperatives, low-cost housing schemes, clinics, adult education and community projects.

From Canada, Britain:

Fraternal Visitors Salute U.S. Labor

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Multi-national unions will evolve to follow the spread of international corporate empires, the Canadian fraternal delegate predicted in an address to the AFL-CIO convention.

"If this is the pattern for the future, our Canadian-American experience will be a valuable and shining example," declared William Ladyman, vice president of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and fraternal delegate from the Canadian Labor Congress.

Two fraternal delegates from Great Britain's 9-million member Trades Union Congress also addressed the convention.

Lord Cooper, general secretary of the General & Municipal Workers Union, said that "Britain is showing an unprecedented awareness of the need for reorientation, reorganization and modernization."

H. R. Nicholas, assistant general secretary of the Transport & General Workers Union, described a series of actions in which the TUC is supporting technological advances while winning safeguards for workers.

Ladyman reported to the delegates that the CLC affiliation with the AFL-CIO is under steady attack from subversive leftwing elements, from nationalistic groups, from economic nationalists and from international corporations.

"The attack has been mounted and is increasing," Ladyman declared in asking U.S. labor to help contain it. Then he turned to the positive aspect, adding:

Global Alliances

"The experience of our Canadian-American trade union relationship will eventually set the pattern for a new and exciting prospect, a worldwide development, and there are already signs that some international unions are beginning to think in terms of much wider global alliances.

"It seems inevitable that, as international corporate empires spread throughout the world, multi-national unions will follow. If this is the pattern for the future, our Canadian-American experience will be a valuable and shining example."

Lord Cooper explained to the delegates the relationship between the TUC and the Labor government in a period which required changes in attitudes and practices.

He said the unions have been trying to work out with the government and the Central Employers' Confederation a new and sensible approach to the role of an incomes and prices policy in a context of planned expansion. Unions, he noted, want to improve real incomes, win a better distribution of incomes and also consider the effect of bargaining on costs and, thereby, on exports and balance of payments.

Voluntarism Favored

The TUC has stressed the need for a voluntary approach to an incomes policy, he said, rather than through laws. Unions are now required to justify their wage claims before the TUC General Council—the equivalent of the AFL-CIO Executive Council. Lord Cooper said the unions are then expected to take account of the council's advice or recommendations.

"Make no mistake about it," he said. "Britain has a great future in the things that really count — in raising the living standards of working people, at home and abroad, and in equipping herself to take an active and progressive part, not only in the European Economic Community but also in the community of nations for the advancement of world peace and prosperity."

Nicholas described how British unions have supported industrial change while building safeguards for workers. He said the TUC won a national plan for severance pay and a system of training programs for displaced workers which is compulsory for employers. Some 20 economic development committees now cover two-thirds of manufacturing, he added, with unions directly involved. The latest initiative is a union-management effort to increase efficiency and raise productivity at all levels.

Latin America's Future Linked to Wage Gains

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The peaceful social revolution which is improving the conditions of life for field workers in Latin America must be speeded up "or all can be lost," warned a leader of the Western Hemisphere's free labor body in a speech to the convention.

Arturo Jauregui, general secretary of the Inter-American Regional Organization of Workers (ORIT), regional arm of the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions, said "ORIT is not pessimistic about the outcome, but more must and will be done."

Jauregui also expressed alarm over the rise of protectionist sentiment in the U.S. Congress and the danger of tariff hikes.

"We live from the exportation of basic minerals, semifinished goods as well as agricultural products," Jauregui said, adding:

"I understand the reasons for these debates, but please remember that if these same Latin nations do not have the revenue from their exports, they cannot purchase your manufactured goods — and Latin America is your biggest market for exports."

ORIT has necessarily focused its efforts in the industrial area, Jauregui said, but has not forgotten that 60 percent of all Latin workers are campesinos or farm workers. The annual earnings of campesinos average under $250, he said, and their conditions are "perfect breeding grounds" for Castro and Moscow and now Peking-oriented propaganda.

The Communist-led guerrilla movements have failed, he said, but these criminal and terrorist efforts will grow again unless conditions are improved radically and quickly.

ORIT programs and alliance for progress work in rural areas are part of a general effort "that must be increased or all can be lost," Jauregui warned. He urged increased U.S. aid in dollars and technical experts.

Compulsory Arbitration Scored:

Labor Reaffirms Insistence On Workers' Right to Strike

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Delegates to the seventh convention of the AFL-CIO voted to reaffirm organized labor's full support for the right to strike as a "fundamental principle of free collective bargaining;" restated their opposition to compulsory arbitration, and adopted a series of resolutions backing the legislative objectives of rail labor unions.

The convention reiterated labor's pledge of all-out support for the "gallant strikers" of Florida East Coast Railway, and called on Pres. Johnson to promote a fair settlement of the strike, which started Jan. 23, 1963, and still continues. Also it urged the President to initiate an Internal Revenue Service audit of the Alfred I. Du Pont estate, which controls the FEC, and its allied businesses.

A resolution on the right to bargain collectively called attention to "increasing attacks on this fundamental principle" in Congress and in the press. Free collective bargaining cannot work, the convention said, when workers are deprived of the right to strike, "their only peaceful economic weapon for winning fair wages and working conditions."

Compulsory arbitration of wages and working conditions under a no-strike law enacted by Congress is "especially unfair and one-sided" when imposed on the employes of profit-making companies, the resolution observed, "since it usually forces these employes to work for worse terms than they themselves could win, for the benefit of their private employers." Congress enacted a forced arbitration law in 1967 against the shopcrafts, it noted, "despite the united opposition of organized labor."

The convention saluted "those true friends of labor" in Congress who "fought to the end against passage" of the forced arbitration law. It vowed "unalterable opposition" to laws that would "thrust a dagger in the heart of free collective bargaining . . . whether in the guise of labor courts, mediation to finality or any other sugar-coated phrases."

The resolution also reaffirmed labor's willingness to consider a voluntary no-strike pledge "if and when the President declares a state of national emergency exists," such pledge to be contingent on the principle of equality of sacrifice including "equally strict controls on prices, profits, dividends and corporate salaries" as well as wages.

The delegates also approved resolutions calling for congressional action to:

- Mandate a one-year delay in railroad mergers, passenger train abandonments and discontinuance of railway mail service pending submission of a master ground transportation plan for the nation by the secretary of transportation; and to provide safeguards for the public when passenger runs are abandoned.
- Give the Dept. of Transportation broader authority over railroad safety programs, with adequate appropriations for enforcement, and double existing penalties for railroads which violate safety regulations.
- Provide needed improvements for beneficiaries under the railroad retirement system "equitably related to any improvements in social security," and enhance changes in the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act set forth in House Resolution 8777.

Another resolution urged Congress to make a "thorough and complete investigation" of railroad finances to dispel the mystery" surrounding the subject.

It asked that "independent outside accountants" be retained jointly by the IRS and the Interstate Commerce Commission for studies of railroad accounting procedures to insure effective tax regulation.

The convention also urged Congress to restore "drastic cuts" in "funds appropriated for the high speed ground transportation program and the national transportation safety board for accident prevention research." It asked a supplemental appropriation for these programs, and called for a "reasonable and forward-looking attitude" by Congress toward the funding of future programs dealing with railroad research and development, safety and service.

Hate-Peddlers Blasted As Threat to America

Bal Harbour, Fla. —"Extremist forces remain a continuing threat to American life," the AFL-CIO declared.

A convention resolution hit at extremists of both the right and the left.

The radical right, it warned, attacks the United Nations, the Supreme Court, civil rights generally, "the whole range" of federal programs for the public welfare "and as much or more than any of these, the labor movement itself."

Its tools are "hate and fear, fomented by simplistic slogans and wild accusations, disseminated by leaflets, newspaper advertisements, periodicals, billboards and more than 10,000 radio broadcasts a week."

By substituting hysteria for reason, the resolution said, the extreme right disrupts "the free marketplace of ideas upon which the survival of democracy depends."

The convention warned that "equally dangerous are the extremists of the left."

"They infiltrate well-meaning peace organizations," it charged, "converting debate into disorder and mindless defiance of law."

The left extremists seek in the ghettos and segments of the civil rights movement to transform "the rightful quest for the redress of ancient grievances into violent civil disorders. They have distorted 'black power' into a symbol not of ballots but of bullets."

It warned of the effort "to destroy the liberal consensus in America by falsely aspersing both the policies and the performance of the labor movement."

The convention urged union members and all Americans to reject both groups of extremists and their tactics.

It called for "an expanded educational effort by the AFL-CIO and its affiliates . . . to alert union members to the evils of extremism and to broaden their understanding of public issues."

Maritime Policy Review Authorized

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO Executive Council was empowered by the convention "to make any changes it deems necessary in present policy" dealing with maritime issues after reviewing 16 resolutions submitted to the convention.

The Resolutions Committee recommendation adopted by the convention noted that there was disagreement on the issues raised by the various resolutions and that the 1965 convention had adopted a comprehensive maritime policy.

Therefore, it recommended that the council review the 1965 policies in connection with the resolutions submitted at the 1967 convention and be authorized to make necessary changes.

174 Visitors Represent Free Unions of World

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Some 174 foreign trade union representatives and visitors from 42 countries were fraternal delegates or guests at the AFL-CIO convention here.

Many were introduced by name by Federation Pres. George Meany. Pres. Johnson specifically greeted them when he spoke at the closing session.

Representing the diverse character of the visitors were three among the many who addressed the convention—Jorge Baeza, member of the executive council of the Mexican Federation of Labor; General Sec. Clement Lubembe of Kenya's Central Organization of Trade Unions, speaking on behalf of 12 colleagues from African countries on visits here; and General Sec. Augus Sodono of the Indonesian Confederation of Labor, speaking for all the Asian visitors.

Baeza said that, in the years that the AFL-CIO and Mexico's CTM have worked together, "all our important actions represent a common interest," and are closely linked with the programs of the Inter-American Regional Organization of Workers (ORIT) and the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions.

Baeza praised the work of the late Serafino Romualdi in coordinating AFL-CIO and Latin American trade unionism, and expressed the hope that the "firm bond of democratic trade unionism will serve to better the living and working conditions of the worker" in all lands.

Lubembe said he brought the "warmest greetings" of the working people of Africa—a continent that is "now growing at a speed equal perhaps to that of a space explorer."

The major problem, he said, is that "we are not able to utilize our natural resources," due partly to a shortage of skilled native manpower.

"Now that most of our African fellow workers are free from colonial rule, thanks in large measure to the support the AFL-CIO gave us in the struggle for independence, we are faced with the most difficult and important fight of all — against poverty, disease and ignorance" and continued assistance will be needed, Lubembe reported.

Sodono said "workers throughout the world know, and history has proved, that the AFL-CIO has played . . . an important role in building up this strong, prosperous and democratic U.S.A. In addition, the AFL-CIO is an important constructive force in the history of the international trade union movement and therefore in the history of mankind."

Asian workers realize, he said, that their countries "still need more capital, technical know-how, skill and experience. But with your cooperation, combined with our will, courage and hard work, we are sure we will meet these challenges and overcome the difficulties" of building strong unions and raising the living standards of Asian workers and others.

Boyd Declares Labor Aid Essential In Solving Transportation Problems

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The federal government will seek the advice of labor in shaping a balanced transportation system on land, sea and air, Sec. of Transportation Alan S. Boyd assured the AFL-CIO convention.

"Quite frankly," Boyd said, "this is a job we cannot accomplish without labor's participation.

The head of the newest department in Pres. Johnson's cabinet asserted that "much of the transportation system seems to be in a conspiracy against the traveler."

In seeking solutions to problems caused by snarled highways, clogged freight movements and stacked planes, Boyd said he will call on all elements of the transportation industry and "let me assure you that this will, in large measure, include the American labor movement." He said "I know of no group more interested in solving social problems than the American labor movement."

The well-being and "even the jobs of your members depends on our being able to avoid the chaos into which our transportation network could easily slip unless we make a determined effort to be sure this will not happen," Boyd told convention delegates.

The aim of the Transportation Dept., he said, is "nothing more revolutionary" than carrying out Pres. Johnson's proposals for "safer, more efficient and better coordinated means of traveling and shipping goods." He cited these opinions:

"We believe that an efficient, coordinated transportation system can be a provider of jobs, and not a destroyer.

"The time has not yet come to sound the death knell over existing local transit systems in favor of such future fantasies" as monorail trains, air-jet capsules "flung into space" or electric automobiles.

"We believe that a total transportation system, wisely conceived and intelligently fitted together, can help revitalize our central cities."

The nation has a "staggering investment" in the present transportation system — many men and more than $400 billion in money —and "we are not at present getting the proper return from it," Boyd said.

He noted that, for the first time in the 1960's, fewer persons were killed in highway accidents during the first three quarters of 1967 than during the same period of the year before. But he said "we do not believe that it is necessary or even tolerable to kill 50,000 persons a year on our highways."

On the possibility of free transit rides in major cities, Boyd said, "we think enough of the idea to have awarded a research contract for a six-month study" of the subject.

On cooperation with labor, Boyd declared, "We are not always going to see eye to eye" but "we have to communicate—we want to hear your views." He added: "We look for you to play an important role in the task we have before us."

Full Holiday Backed For Columbus Day

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The convention "sounded the reveille" to U.S. lawmakers to make Columbus Day—Oct. 12—a national holiday.

With AFL-CIO backing, the Senate in the 88th Congress voted for such a bill but the House failed to act. More bills are pending in the 90th Congress and delegates approved a resolution urging action before adjournment.

Labor Mobilizes for Vital '68 Elections

Anti-Union Attacks Spur COPE Drive

coalition and spearheaded by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the National Association of Manufacturers.

These groups, the resolution declared, "are counting on conservative political gains in 1968 to pave the way for restrictive labor legislation in 1969."

The stakes in the election, the resolution stressed, make it clear that what is involved is "not just the welfare of the trade union movement but indeed its survival as an effective force."

AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph D. Keenan, speaking on the resolution declared that "this is as important as any issue that ever confronted us in the trade union movement," that political action is "the most important single job we have to do from now until November 1968."

He pointed out that after the defeat of liberal congressional members in the 1946 elections the 88th Congress passed the Taft-Hartley Act and that a similar threat looms in 1969 if liberal candidates are defeated.

The resolution enumerated the types of anti-labor legislation being prepared by the conservative coalition including a ban on industry-wide bargaining, replacing the National Labor Relations Board with a "labor court," outlawing joint bargaining, compulsory arbitration, bans on COPE contribution drives and prohibiting the use of card checks in determining representation by unions.

Added to these, said the resolution, is the distinct possibility of a national "right-to-work" law that would outlaw the union shop. Summing up, the resolution asserted:

"This threat to the well-being of the trade union movement is entirely political in nature. If conservatives make political gains in 1968, their program inevitably will be on the front burners in Congress in 1969.

"A political threat demands a political response. An unprecedented threat to the labor movement demands an unprecedented response from the labor movement."

To mount the needed political offensive, the convention called on all unions to generate maximum activity behind register-and-vote drives and on behalf of COPE-endorsed candidates; to assign as many full-time staff members to full-time political education work as early as possible in 1968; to meet and exceed the COPE voluntary dollar quotas; to mobilize every member in the 1968 elections.

Tributes Paid To Fogarty, McNamara

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Two lifelong trade unionists who served with distinction in Congress were memorialized in resolutions adopted by the AFL-CIO convention.

Delegates paid tribute to the late Rep. John E. Fogarty (D-R.I.), an active member of the Bricklayers, who pioneered legislation setting up the National Institutes of Health.

They honored the late Sen. Patrick V. McNamara (D-Mich.), a member and business agent of the Plumbers before coming to the Senate to lead battles for progressive social legislation.

In another tribute to the Michigan senator, Pres. Johnson brought to the AFL-CIO convention legislation providing for the construction of a new federal office building in Detroit, to be named in memory of McNamara. He signed it into law in the presence of the delegates.

Labor Voices Its Thanks For Progress Under LBJ

Bal Harbour, Fla. — American labor said a heartfelt "thanks" to Pres. Johnson—for the accomplishments of his Administration and for his continued striving for a better America.

The convention expressed its appreciation in a formal resolution, unanimously adopted.

And AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany spoke for the delegates in a brief response to Johnson's speech.

Meany told the President directly that the labor movement knows and appreciates what has been done under his leadership.

It is fully aware of the "tremendously difficult task" Johnson faces "in defending human freedom throughout the world and fighting for a better life for all Americans here at home," he said.

"In a word, Mr. President, we support you and we urge you to carry on."

More formally, the convention resolution summed up the legislative record of recent years, declaring:

"We are proud to have had a part in all these accomplishments. But we are also aware that they were made possible by the humane understanding and vigorous leadership of the Administration itself."

The convention expressed labor's "warmest appreciation for the consistent and unflagging devotion" of Pres. Johnson and his Administration "to the cause of progress in America."

The resolution concluded:

"This convention calls upon every affiliated union and every AFL-CIO member to work for the election in 1968 of candidates who will unequivocally support the purposes, the principles and the ideals of the labor movement."

AS MILLIONS LISTENED over nationwide television and radio, Pres. Johnson told the AFL-CIO convention that the United States will hold the line against aggression in Viet Nam until Hanoi is ready to negotiate peace.

Convention Backs Home Rule for D. C.

Bal Harbour, Fla. — Support for home rule and national representation for the District of Columbia was voted by the AFL-CIO convention.

The resolution called on the labor movement to back the efforts being made by the Greater Washington Central Labor Council to achieve self-government and representation in Congress for the people of the Nation's Capital.

General Board Puts Stress on '68 Campaign

Bal Harbour, Fla.—A strong determination to elect a liberal Administration and Congress in 1968 was voiced at the meeting of the AFL-CIO General Board here.

Representatives of the federation's affiliates, its constitutional departments and members of the Executive Council received a detailed briefing on the political situation from COPE Dir. Alexander Barkan and the legislative record of the first session of the 90th Congress and prospects for the second session from Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany summed up the situation declaring that the federation is "neither pessimistic nor optimistic" about 1968 but determined that it result in a victory for labor and liberal forces.

The "hard look" taken by the General Board included a review of the various anti-labor proposals introduced in the 90th Congress and the campaigns by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the National Association of Manufacturers for new, repressive, anti-labor legislation.

The theme clearly emerged that if the liberal forces did not work hard and win in 1968 the 91st Congress would be conservative and anti-labor in direction and legislation.

The AFL-CIO will concentrate its campaign for a liberal Congress in about 90 districts where the seats were last won by narrow margins and which could swing control of the direction of the next Congress.

Johnson Scores GOP For 'Deadweight' Role

the President said, were triumphs for all America.

Johnson reminded the delegates that on most of these issues the vast majority of Republicans in Congress, "lined up like wooden soldiers of the status quo," voted to kill these bills.

The replacement of liberal Democrats who helped write the "historic" legislative record of the 89th Congress by "Republican nay-sayers" has added "deadweight" to the House this year, Johnson said. The result has been that "America's advance has been temporarily slowed."

"We still have to meet the great tests of our time—improving our educational and our medical systems, rebuilding our cities, providing jobs for all who can work, ending lawlessness in our streets, controlling our crime, uniting our people in common and progressive purpose.

"This is our national agenda. It can only succeed if there are men in Congress and the Administration who will make it their personal agenda.

"We must work harder than ever to elect these men. It can be done; it will be done because a nation depends on us not to fail."

The President spoke to labor as he had to business a week earlier of his concern lest inflation be fed by "a wage-price spiral."

For the first time, Johnson said, the nation is engaged in a fighting war without wage and price controls. "Voluntary restraint," he said, "has made involuntary curbs unnecessary. Your government wants to keep it that way."

The President spoke solemnly of "the tragic but vital struggle in Viet Nam," the "torture" of having to send American youth to "risk their lives for liberty and freedom," the "regret" at spending dollars for war "that we want to spend on the works of peace here at home."

He appealed to those who dissent from America's policy to "bring me just one workable solution to end the war," adding:

"It must be a solution that does not call for surrender or for cutting and running. . . .

"It must be a solution that does not call for stepping up our military efforts to a flash point, where we risk a much larger war."

The delegates rose to their feet in a standing ovation as the President told the nation, "I am going to continue down the center of the road doing my duty as I see it for the best of all my country, regardless of the polls or regardless of the election."

The President said he was returning to Washington "strengthened by the powerful testimony for freedom" that American labor gave at the AFL-CIO convention.

"May all the world hear you," he said. "And may God bless you for what you have said and what you have done."

Ban Sought On Tax Lure Plant Piracy

Bal Harbour, Fla. — Organized labor called on the Administration and Congress for legislation to close a federal tax loophole permitting the issuance of state and local bonds to build plants for private businesses, many of them "runaways" from fair wages and conditions.

Plant enticement by industrial bond financing is possible, the AFL-CIO convention said, "by deliberately perverting the privilege granted all states and localities to issue bonds on which interest payments" are freed from federal taxes.

It declared "this federal subsidy was intended" to help governments provide schools and other public facilities. Instead, more than 40 states now sanction an industry-luring scheme which "saddles all taxpayers with the cost of an unjustifiable private subsidy." The convention urged legislation to "end the misuse of tax free bonds" to help an employer avoid building costs and even taxes.

Coalition Grip Key To 90th Congress

Few Gains Posted in First Half

By David L. Perlman

The first session of the 90th Congress ground to a halt on its 340th day—with a meager record of accomplishments in terms of labor's goals.

There was meaningful progress in a few areas, and the nation's meat will be safer to eat and its air purer to breathe as a result.

But the gains were largely overshadowed by an ugly mood of retrenchment set by the Republican-led conservative coalition which took over control of the House.

In large part, labor's legislative battles in the first session were defensive—to keep the coalition from plowing under the achievements of the liberal 89th Congress.

Coalition's Effect

The success story of the House conservative coalition can be read in the tally compiled by Congressional Quarterly, a non-partisan, authoritative publication.

The voting alliance of Republicans and Southern Democrats against Northern Democrats won on 37 of 51 rollcalls, by far its biggest victory total since CQ began keeping tabs on the coalition 10 years ago.

The chief battleground was the President's budget, particularly those parts of it dealing with the hard core problems of slums and poverty.

As AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller expressed it, "The conservatives chant 'economy' each time they vote to mutilate a program."

Most of the budget battles will be renewed in the second session, starting Jan. 15. Also on the agenda in the election-year session will be some of the tough, controversial issues that Congress bypassed this year.

'Immediate Need Is Money':

Copper Strike Aid Spurred by Meany

Every segment of the AFL-CIO has been called upon by Federation Pres. George Meany to join in the fund-raising campaign to support the strikers in the nonferrous metals industry.

Meany's appeal for contributions to aid the 60,000 members of 26 unions, on strike since July 15, was made in a letter to all international unions, state and city central bodies and directly affiliated local unions.

Meanwhile, the Steelworkers, who represent the largest group of strikers, rejected as "completely unrealistic" a settlement offer from Phelps Dodge Corp. It was the first new proposal advanced by any of the struck mining and smelting companies in more than five months.

At the same time, USWA advanced a settlement offer of its own. The rejection and the union's proposal were submitted to federal mediators at Tucson, Ariz., who pressed a bargaining session between the company and the union.

Meany's letter said "the immediate need is for money to aid strikers and their families because "it is clear that the employers who provoked this strike believe they can starve workers into submission."

He noted that the AFL-CIO convention had pledged full support of the strike, the federation had made an initial contribution of $50,000 to the fund, and spontaneous pledges at the convention had brought the fund total to more than $550,000.

AFL-CIO Vice Presidents Joseph D. Keenan and Joseph A. Beirne have been named as a special subcommittee of the Executive Council to conduct the drive for the Nonferrous Metals Strike Fund.

Meany termed the strike "a showdown fight—an open challenge to the ability of organized labor to persevere and win out over powerful, intransigent corporations."

"It is the obligation of the labor movement as a whole," he continued, "to insure that those who man the picket-lines, and their families are protected from economic catastrophe. This is an obligation we will meet."

Phelps-Dodge broke a stalemate in bargaining by offering its 4,200 striking workers in Arizona a settlement it claimed would provide wage and fringe benefit increases totaling 63.7 cents an hour over three years.

But a Steelworkers' spokesman said a study of the proposal revealed that the figure "was completely exaggerated as was the company's pre-strike proposal."

'Falls Short'

Orville Larson, USWA representative in Arizona, said, "We had hoped that after five months the company would have been more realistic. The offer falls far short of the pattern of settlements made in major companies this year."

USWA countered the Phelps-Dodge move by placing its own revised settlement proposal on the table. The offer was still under discussion in sessions with federal mediators as the AFL-CIO News went to press.

Unions involved in the strike, besides the Steelworkers, are: Auto Workers, Boilermakers, Bricklayers, Carpenters, Chemical Workers, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, Iron Workers, Laborers, Locomotive Engineers, Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen, Machinists, Molders, Office Employes, Office & Professional Employes, Operating Engineers, Painters, Pattern Makers, Plumbers, Railroad Trainmen, Railway Carmen, Conductors, Teamsters, Sheet Metal Workers and Switchmen.

Supreme Court Decision:

Strikers' Job Rights Upheld in Key Case

By Duane Emme

The U.S. Supreme Court has strengthened the reinstatement rights of economic strikers by reversing a lower court decision that denied them to workers at Fleetwood Trailer Co., Riverside, Calif.

The AFL-CIO in a "friend-of-the-court" brief, had urged the reversal, warning that the issue at stake was "plainly of the most substantial importance to the labor movement."

In another significant labor case, the court reversed a 9th Circuit Court of Appeals ruling denying vacation and holiday pay to employes of Magma Copper Co. who returned from military service.

The Fleetwood case grew out of a two-week Carpenters strike at the mobile home manufacturer in 1964.

Some workers got their jobs back when the strike ended, but others had job applications passed over during a period in which the firm hired new employes.

Six strikers, so aggrieved, appealed to the National Labor Relations Board. In 1965, the board ruled that Fleetwood had engaged in illegal discrimination and had interferred with its employes' right to strike.

The six employes had subsequently been rehired by the firm, but the NLRB said they must also be reimbursed in pay and given seniority rights for the period in which they were passed over.

Fleetwood appealed the board's ruling and in 1966 the 9th Circuit Court of Appeals reversed the board. In its appeal to the Supreme Court, the NLRB said the opinion would have a "devastating" impact on labor relations if left to stand.

Precedent Cited

The AFL-CIO pointed out that in a case involving Mackay Radio & Telegraph Co. the Supreme Court had previously decided that an employer violates the law when he refuses reinstatement to economic strikers who apply for jobs that are available.

The federation maintained that an employer also violates the law "when it refuses to honor continuing applications for reinstatement as jobs open up and at the first available opportunity."

"Congress specifically provided

Auto Workers Vote on GM Settlement

Ratification votes are under way on a new national contract covering 375,000 members of the Auto Workers at General Motors, the giant of the auto industry.

The settlement, reached after a final bargaining session lasting nearly 30 hours, parallels the economic pattern won earlier in contracts at Ford Motor Co. and Chrysler Corp. It was sent to the membership with approval of the union's GM council and its executive board.

Meanwhile, some 17,000 local issues and grievances at the UAW's 166 local GM bargaining units remained to be settled.

Negotiations were proceeding at the local level and the union said it would receive a report on the status of these talks on Jan. 9. At that time a special committee of

Appeals Court Hits NLRB Timidity In Remedies for Employer Misdeeds

A federal appellate court chided the National Labor Relations Board for being too timid in fashioning remedies to overcome an employer's refusal to bargain in good faith.

In a landmark 2-1 decision, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia said the NLRB has the power to order an employer to grant a dues checkoff to the union representing his workers.

While such an action may be "a minor intrusion on freedom of contract," the court said, in some cases it may also be "the only way to guarantee the workers' right to bargain collectively."

In reaching this conclusion, the court said, it was taking into account the fact that the NLRB's remedial measures in unfair labor cases "have not proved adequate in coping with the recalcitrant employer determined to defeat the effective unionization of his plant by illegally opposing organizational and bargaining efforts every step of the way."

The case involved the Steelworkers and the H. K. Porter Co. at Danville, Va.

The union won a representation election in October 1961—and is still trying to negotiate a contract. Twice trial examiners found the company had failed to bargain in good faith, the labor board affirmed the findings and courts ordered enforcement.

It was a familiar pattern of delay and the appellate court in the spring of 1966 specifically noted that the evidence at the hearing before the trial examiner showed that the "real and only reason" the company refused the checkoff was to "frustrate

PROTEST AGAINST Reader's Digest article which gave a false picture of the social security system as in dire financial condition was dramatized by members of the National Council of Senior Citizens who picketed the magazine's offices and editors in 11 cities. This group, from the Washington, D.C., Area Council, came by bus to the suburban home of the author of the article to express their indignation in person.

Senior Citizens Pickets Protest Digest Article

Thousands of elderly men and women marched in rain and snow to protest a Reader's Digest article on social security which has been denounced as a "misleading" collection of half-truths by government and congressional experts.

The 11-city demonstration, including a march by 1,500 elderly men and women in front of the magazine's New York Office, was sponsored by the National Council of Senior Citizen. The protesters called for an opportunity to refute in print the article, "How Secure Is Your Social Security," which appeared in the October Digest.

It was advertised at the time with an illustration of a torn—and, by implication, useless—social security card.

John W. Edelman, president of the 2 million-member senior citizens' council, said his organization does not object to the magazine publishing its opinions. "But we strongly object to the Reader's Digest policy of refusing to correct errors and misstatements."

Among the social security authorities who have denounced the article as misleading are Under Sec. of Health, Education & Welfare Wilbur J. Cohen and Rep. Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.), chairman of the House Ways & Means Committee.

Union Wins First Vote in Nursing Home

Wheaton, Md. — Employes of the University Nursing Home here set a precedent when they voted 35-9 to be represented by the State, County & Municipal Employes.

The election was conducted by the National Labor Relations Board —the first since the NLRB's decision last month to assert jurisdiction over large private hospitals and nursing homes.

The unit set up at the Wheaton home, in a suburb of Washington, D.C., is made up of custodial and dietary employes. AFSCME Pres. Jerry Wurf hailed the vote as "a major victory for employes in an industry that has been characterized by its notoriously low pay and degrading working conditions."

agreement with the union."

The record showed the company admitted it would not be inconvenienced by a checkoff and that it does in fact check off union dues at some of its other plants.

The issue, the court noted, was a particularly important one at the Danville operation where employes were scattered over a wide area and "collection of dues without a checkoff would have presented the union with a substantial problem of communication and transportation."

Company 'Alternative'

After the 1966 ruling, the company finally presented an "alternative" to the union's checkoff proposal. It said it was willing to discuss the possibility of making available to the union a table in its payroll office.

The Steelworkers contended this did not comply with the court order on good faith bargaining. The NLRB said it did, and the union asked the appellate court to clarify its order.

In doing so, the court made a distinction between bargaining to an impasse in good faith—which meets the requirement of the law—and the need to remedy a pattern of illegal union-busting efforts.

It said the NLRB has authority to order a company which has "repeatedly flouted" the law "to make meaningful and reasonable counteroffers, or indeed even to make a concession," where this "would be the only way for the company to purge the stain of bad faith."

It said the NLRB could have ordered the company to grant a checkoff, either with or without a return concession by the union on another issue.

The checkoff, the court majority said, may be "of life or death import to the fledgling union, while it is of no consequence whatever to the employer."

Chiding the NLRB for its timidity, the court added: "If the board can do no more than repeatedly order the company to bargain in good faith, the workers' rights to bargain collectively may be nullified. The board is empowered to see that this does not happen."

Air Line Unions Reach Aid Pact

Chicago—The Air Line Employes have entered into a cooperative program with the Canadian Air Line Employes in which the two unions will assist each other in organizing, bargaining and improving services for their respective members.

ALEA Pres. Victor Herbert said here that the new joint venture results from meetings between officers of the two organizations over the past year.

In addition to pooling information on organizing and bargaining, ALEA and CALEA will aid each other in the areas of research, public relations and development of special policies, Herbert said.

At ILO Parley:

White Collar Union Rights Reasserted

Geneva—The right of white collar workers to join unions and bargain collectively was strongly affirmed by a 24-nation conference of the Intl. Labor Organization.

The respect of these basic rights is "fundamental to good labor-management relations," the ILO committee on salaried employes and professional workers said.

In their conclusions on the retail sales and other distributive trades, the 144 labor, government and employer delegates stressed the importance in this field of the ILO-sponsored international pact on collective bargaining.

The pact, it was recalled, established the rule that workers must be adequately protected against "acts of anti-union discrimination."

Such discrimination is defined to include the denial of a job to a worker unless he renounces union membership and the dismissal or other penalty against a worker for union activities.

The affirmation of the rights of white collar workers was warmly praised by the U.S. labor delegation headed by J. Oscar Bloodworth, vice president and regional director of the Office & Professional Employes.

This action and the measures the committee recommended for easing the impact of automation on the white collar worker "showed that some areas of the world are more progressive than the U.S." Bloodworth commented.

Dignity Stressed

Wendell Young III, secretary-treasurer of Retail Clerks Local 5933, Philadelphia, said that "all the conculusions reflected the emphasis placed on the dignity of man throughout the session."

The two American worker delegates said it was a deep disappointment when an American employer, Webb Neely of Sears, Roebuck & Co., refused to join in the committee's endorsement of the conclusions on union-management relations.

One of the worker-inspired resolutions adopted by the committee called on the ILO to study the impact of the growing use of recorded music and entertainment on the lives of musicians and other performers.

David Winstein of the American Federation of Musicians, had called the committee's attention to the need for an international study.

Speaking as a technical adviser to the American worker delegation. Winstein stressed the danger for the future of music in the dwindling employment opportunities for musicians because of the growing use of "canned" performances.

The workers won satisfaction on their demand for more frequent meetings of the committee with the adoption of a resolution asking the ILO, a United Nations agency, to schedule them at intervals not more than three years.

Bloodworth, who served as vice chairman of the workers' group, said the decision marked a recognition of the growing proportion of white collar workers in the overall labor force everywhere.

Recalling that the last session was in 1969, Bloodworth stressed that more frequent meetings would "help the committee to keep abreast with the rapid changes being wrought by automation."

In connection with the need to help workers adapt to changing conditions, the committee said that "organized training should be available to all non-manual workers." Special attention should be paid to methods "combining practical training on the job with related theoretical instruction," it recommended.

Auto Workers Vote on GM Contract, Press Bargaining on Local Issues

the board will determine any need for strike deadlines, the union said.

At the same time, UAW continued bargaining for a national settlement at American Motors Corp. and agreements at the Canadian subsidiaries of GM, Chrysler and Ford. Some local contracts remained to be resolved at Chrysler.

The union was still on strike at eight plants of Deere & Co., struck Nov. 17 when management refused to match the pattern won by UAW at Caterpillar Tractor Co. Contracts with other farm equipment makers also remain unsettled.

A UAW local representing 5,500 workers was in its sixth week of a strike against 5 tool and die shops, represented by the Detroit Tooling Association.

The national settlement at GM was reached without the union setting a strike deadline. Instead, it had set a Dec. 14 "target date" for the conclusion of a national agreement, and the accord was reached a day later.

UAW Pres. Walter Reuther and Vice Pres. Leonard Woodcock, head of the union's GM negotiating committee, called the agreement, like those at Ford and Chrysler, "non-inflationary" since "it represents the equity of GM workers as measured against the profitability and rapidly rising productivity of General Motors."

A major new feature of the contract authorizes company-paid union representatives to do union work full time with the number of such representatives to be determined by the number of workers in the plant.

In plants with over 500 workers, GM will provide "work centers" where the in-plant representatives can work on the union's business. Centers will be furnished and located near the work area of the represented workers.

The agreement provides first-year wage increases of 20 cents an hour for production workers and 30 cents extra for the skilled trades, both retroactive to Oct. 16, with additional 3 percent increases in each of the next two years.

As in the Ford and Chrysler pacts, there is a cost-of-living escalator clause, a guaranteed income plan, higher pension benefits, strengthened grievance procedures, additional relief time and stronger safeguards against subcontracting. Additional paid holidays are provided and health care benefits are improved.

The contract also establishes a joint union-management committee to deal with disputes involving the impact of automation.

Trail-Blazing Agreement:

Atomic Safety Pact Ends Hanford Strike

Richland, Wash.—A 100-day strike by the Hanford Atomic Metal Trades Council ended with ratification of a trail-blazing agreement on radiation safety.

It is the first collective bargaining agreement with an Atomic Energy Commission contractor that spells out a standard of radiation exposure more stringent than the maximum allowed by the AEC.

The strike began as a spontaneous walkout by more than 200 workers at a recently opened nuclear reactor operated by Douglas United Nuclear, Inc., under contract from the Atomic Energy Commission.

The general rule at the Hanford operation, although never incorporated into a written contract, was that employes would not be exposed to more than 300 millirems of radiation a week.

Management had ordered eight workers who had already reached the exposure limit to work at a job which would subject them to additional radiation. When they refused, they were sent home, in effect suspended without pay.

The other workers at the reactor walked out in protest and the Metal Trades Council formally voted to strike.

The AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept. contended that the strike was prolonged by the unwillingness of the Atomic Energy Commission to allow a greater margin of radiation safety to be written into a contract than its own regulations provided.

An added complication in the dispute was a disagreement as to whether the Hanford Atomic Metal Trades Council's contract covering other Douglas United Nuclear employes extended to the new reactor. The 10 affiliated unions contended that it didn't and they had been seeking to negotiate a separate agreement.

Management claimed it did, and at the AEC's direction filed a multi-million dollar damage suit against the union council, charging violation of a contract no-strike clause.

Under the settlement agreement, the claim for damages was dropped and the company will only seek a court determination as to whether the existing contract covers both the old and new operations.

The radiation safety standards, applicable to all employes of the contractor, commits the company to plan its work so that no employe will be subjected to more than 300 millirems of gamma radiation a week, or more than 3 rems annually—as compared with 5 rems permitted under AEC standards.

Deviations are permitted in exceptional circumstances, after consultation with the union and subject to regular grievance procedure.

The agreement was overwhelmingly ratified and the strikers have returned to work.

Miami Labor Dedicates New Housing

Miami — Groundbreaking ceremonies—and a gala banquet to celebrate the occasion—were held for Unity Hall, a non-profit housing enterprise sponsored by the Dade County AFL-CIO and Local 349 of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

The 10-acre development, on the banks of the Miami River about five minutes from the downtown area, will have 346 apartments in seven garden-type buildings.

The project will provide housing for low and middle income families and retirees.

Groundbreaking was held during the AFL-CIO convention and some 1,200 persons attended the banquet, which was addressed by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Rep. Claude Pepper (D-Fla.). Four of the area's mayors, all union members themselves, presented Meany with symbolic keys to their cities. E. T. Stephenson, president of the Dade County AFL-CIO, presided at the dinner.

Completion of the project is expected by next December and applications will be accepted after Mar. 1, 1968.

After construction of the apartments, a recreation hall is planned with facilities for crafts and hobbies.

Supreme Court Backs Strikers' Job Rights

that strikers do not lose their status as employes unless they forfeit it," the AFL-CIO brief declared, adding that the law also has "a firm, clear" guarantee against an employer destroying that status.

Writing for the court in its 8-to-0 decision, Justice Abe Fortas agreed. He stressed that the status of a striker as an employe continues until he has obtained other regular and substantially equivalent employment.

"This basic right to jobs," he added, "cannot depend upon job availability as of the moment when the (reinstatement) applications are filed."

Other Views

Justices John M. Harlan and Potter Stewart concurred but only on grounds that the firm erred in claiming that the workers jobs had been permanently abolished "for business reasons" and thus it rehired the strikers as "new employes."

In the Magma case, a 5-to-3 court majority ruled without comment that the firm had violated the Universal Military Training & Service Act in denying returning veterans vacation and holiday benefits covered by a union contract.

The workers had fulfilled all the requirements for vacation and holidays in the pact with the former Mine, Mill & Smelter Workers except those concerning their "availability" prior to receiving benefits.

In effect, the Supreme Court's decision means that reinstated veterans do not have to fulfill such requirements to be eligible for the benefits where military service alone prevents them from doing so.

Justices William O. Douglas, Harlan and Stewart dissented, claiming that the lower court had properly decided that the employes should have been considered on leave of absence and not qualified for the benefits.

Broad Effects

Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz hailed the Supreme Court's decision, pointing out that it "will have far-reaching effects on the entire range of benefits" under the act.

He said the ruling upholds the Labor Dept.'s position "that a man's time in military service is looked upon, when he returns to his employment, as if the employment had continued without interruption for such service."

Meanwhile, in other actions, the court:

● Affirmed a ruling by a special three judge federal court requiring New York State to reapportion its congressional districts by March 1, in time for the 1968 elections.

● Threw out a rape conviction and death sentence of a Georgia Negro because the jury was selected from names obtained from tax rolls that were kept on a racially segregated basis.

● Cracked down on police eavesdropping in a 7-to-1 decision reversing the gambling conviction of a California man because federal agents used a microphone to listen in on his conversations from a public phone booth.

The court ruled that the Constitution forbids electronic eavesdropping by police and federal agents unless a judicial warrant is obtained from a federal magistrate.

Rail Pension Raise Backed By Both Sides

Railroad unions have won a promise from the nation's railroads to support legislation in Congress for a substantial increase in railroad retirement and jobless benefits.

The announcement of agreement was made by Chairman G. E. Leighty of the Railway Labor Executives Association and C. L. Dennis, chairman of RLEA's railroad retirement committee.

They said the agreed-upon measure would increase retirement benefits by about $122 million a year and jobless-sick pay benefits by $21 million annually.

The improvements, if approved by Congress," will mean more money in the pockets of 1.5 million railroad people—those now retired, future retirees and those who become unemployed or sick," Leighty and Dennis observed.

The bill would increase railroad retirement benefits to levels about 10 percent higher than comparable benefits under the social security legislation recently passed by Congress.

Railroad retirement benefits are higher than those paid under social security, but the tax paid by rail workers also is higher. In both cases, the employer pays an amount equal to that paid by the worker.

The railroad bill would boost unemployment-sick pay benefits from the current $10.20 a day to $12.70, the RLEA announced.

Since the railroads have agreed to support the legislation, Leighty and Dennis voiced hope Congress would act on it early in January. Rep. Harley O. Staggers (D-W. Va.), chairman of the House Interstate Commerce Committee which handles rail retirement measures, pledged "every effort to expedite this legislation."

Apprentice Guidance Brought to 3 New Areas

Building trades unions, the Labor Dept. and civil rights organizations have established cooperative programs in three more areas to give minority group youngsters a helping hand towards apprenticeship.

Goals are to provide additional training and guidance for young men who meet the basic educational requirements for apprenticeship, so that they will have a better chance of qualifying for openings as they become available.

The programs, helping Latin-Americans and Indians as well as Negroes, are financed by the Labor Dept. The projects normally have co-directors, one from the area Building & Construction Trades Council, the other from either the Urban League or the NAACP.

New programs involve:

● The North Colorado Building Trades Council and the Denver Urban League, with Leonard Allen of the building trades and Herbert Jones of the Urban League as co-directors.

● The Northeastern Oklahoma Building & Construction Trades Councils and the Urban League, with project directors still to be named. Previously announced was a 55-county apprenticeship project sponsored by the Southwestern Oklahoma BCT Council, in cooperation with the NAACP.

● The Dayton Building & Construction Trades Council, the Urban League and the Associated General Contractors, all working together on the apprenticeship opportunity program.

All of the programs were negotiated by local building trades councils with aid from Robert McGlotten, assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights, and national and regional officials of the Labor Dept. and the major civil rights groups.

Toys, Turkeys Help To Brighten Yule

Chicago, Ill. — Organized labor across the country is pitching in to make sure that the nonferrous metals strikers and their families receive some of the good things that go with Christmas.

Besides contributing to the special AFL-CIO fund to aid the strikers, unions in many locations are providing toys and refreshments for Christmas parties for the strikers' children. In Salt Lake City, the affair is being sponsored by the Utah State AFL-CIO.

And in Butte, Mont., the families of 1,000 strikers will receive turkeys for the holiday dinner, with the best wishes of the Meat Cutters.

Los Angeles Labor Helps Delano Families

Los Angeles — Union members in Los Angeles sent some $10,000 in food, toys and clothing to the Christmas party of the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee in Delano, the County AFL-CIO reported.

Unions throughout the state also joined in shipments of needed food and clothing.

A Greater Share

WE REDEDICATE ourselves to preserve and extend the right of working men and women to organize and freely negotiate agreements with their employers, concerning the conditions of employment. We will continue to utilize the institution of collective bargaining to develop solutions to the great problems of technological change, although we recognize that collective bargaining, alone, cannot fully resolve these nationwide social problems.

We will work for the continued extension of collective bargaining to all wage and salary workers.

We will continue to press for wage and salary increases to offset rising living costs and to advance buying power. We reiterate our conviction that wage and salary earners deserve to share equitably in the rising productive potential of the nation and to achieve a greater share in the distribution of income. The nation's rapidly rising output per manhour and business profitability make such improvements in wages, salaries and fringe benefits possible within the context of a relatively stable price level.

We will continue our drive to achieve a reduction of working hours, through collective bargaining, as well as through legislation. We will continue to seek improved vacations, holidays, and other increases in paid leisure time.

We will seek to advance the security and well-being of workers, through improved health and welfare plans, better pensions, new programs for guaranteeing employment, training and transfer programs, and more adequate supplemental unemployment benefits.

We have consistently opposed and we will continue to oppose the wage guideline of the President's Council of Economic Advisers as an unfair and unworkable imposition of government interference with collective bargaining. Wages and salaries are not the only cost to business. There are a multitude of other factors. But wages and salaries are the sole source of income for most Americans. In addition, there are built-in restraints in the determination of wages, such as employer resistance, that are not present in other economic factors. Rigid application of a single-factor guideline, that adversely affects the incomes of the vast majority of American families while profiits, dividends and other incomes have free scope, is as unfair as it is unworkable.

However, if the President determines that there is a national emergency that warrants extraordinary stabilization measures—with even-handed restraints on all costs, prices, profits, dividends, corporate executive compensation (salaries, bonuses and stock options), as well as employes' wages and salaries—he will have the support of the AFL-CIO. But rigid application of a single "magic number," based on one economic factor alone, cannot be a workable or fair means of wage determination in a country of continental size, with thousands of different markets, industries and occupations.

We are prepared to sacrifice—as much as anyone else, for as long as anyone else—so long as there is equality of sacrifice. But we will never sacrifice nor compromise our right as free Americans to bargain collectively with our employers on the conditions that affect our livelihood.

—Excerpted from the resolution on collective bargaining adopted by the seventh AFL-CIO convention.

Jobs, Training Are Basic Needs In Drive for Equal Opportunity

The following is excerpted from the resolution on civil rights adopted by the seventh constitutional convention of the AFL-CIO.

GOOD JOBS are foundation stones in the edifice of equal opportunity. Great strides have been made in changing the employment practices in many industries in all parts of the country.

The establishment of a national Equal Employment Opportunity Commission has helped to accelerate this process. Although there is still a significant amount of overt discrimination in the employment field, other factors are part of the reasons why tens of thousands of minority group workers, young and old, still suffer unemployment and under-employment.

In the present labor market, changing rapidly under the impact of the technological revolution, achievement of non-discrimination is not the sole goal. Essential strands in the fabric of equal opportunity include information about jobs, training and education to qualify for jobs, and transportation to the employment site.

The question of minority group participation in skilled trades apprenticeship is an example. Although the number of apprenticeship openings is too small to have a major impact on the national rate of minority group youth unemployment, it is an important area.

Prof. F. Ray Marshall and Vernon M. Briggs in a study prepared for the Dept. of Labor entitled "Negro Participation in Apprenticeship Programs" concluded: "Although national discrimination continues to be an important problem, we are convinced that its relative importance has declined in recent years and that measures to recruit, train and counsel qualified apprentices currently are much more important."

The AFL-CIO Civil Rights Dept., with the cooperation of the Dept. of Labor, Building & Construction Trades Dept. and building trades councils throughout the country, have concentrated their efforts in working with the Joint Apprenticeship Committee (Workers Defense League—A. Philip Randolph Education Foundation), the Urban League's Labor Education Advancement Program (LEAP) the Trade Union Leadership Council, the Opportunities Industrialization Center (OIC) and other groups. All of these have developed programs for recruiting, tutoring and counseling apprentices who qualify in meeting existing standards for apprenticeship programs. The U.S. Labor Dept. has already made grants to programs of these kinds in 16 cities. The AFL-CIO endorses this program and recommends that it be studied and emulated in other cities.

Special manpower and education programs can serve similarly on a wider range of jobs in a much larger segment of the labor force.

While the efforts of government and government-sponsored programs in the area of non-discrimination and affirmative action programs should be vigorous in their implementation, they should also be intelligent. Employment opportunities for minority groups must be intensified without tearing the fabric of union security for all workers. Simplistic racial quota approaches are not an answer to "fair and full employment."

ALL NATIONAL OFFICERS assigned by their international unions to the area of equal opportunity are again urged to give prompt attention to the processing of complaints with government agencies and to call upon the AFL-CIO Civil Rights Dept. for aid and assistance and to cooperate with sound affirmative programs.

All government agencies involved are also asked in turn to intensify their efforts to resolve these problems as far as possible in the process of conciliation. The sanctions of the law have to be used where all conciliation fails.

We reiterate our call upon those affiliates with the few segregated locals that remain in existence to continue work on merging such separate locals and to adopt contractual clauses that will eliminate barriers to equal opportunity in promotion for all workers.

We also reiterate our call on all affiliates to develop and accelerate programs to eliminate discriminatory practices within their industries and unions, utilizing and strengthening established machinery of collective bargaining by:

1.—Negotiating non-discrimination clauses in all collective bargaining contracts and utilizing these clauses in all stages of the collective bargaining procedure;

2.—Sensitizing the collective bargaining machinery to the problems of eliminating discrimination and providing equal employment; and

3.—Cooperating in sound affirmative action programs in the areas of retraining information and recruiting which will expand opportunities for those previously deprived.

Rusk Stresses 'Heart of the Matter':

Viet Nam Aggression Today Recalls Parallels from the '30s

The following is excerpted from an address by Sec. of State Dean Rusk to the 7th Constitutional Convention of the AFL-CIO.

ONE CAN SPIN gossamer threads day and night to conceal the verities, the utter realities, but when great nations are talking about issues which determine the life and death of nations, we better brush those gossamer threads aside and look at the heart of the matter.

The heart of the matter is that South Viet Nam is being subjected to an armed attack from North Viet Nam for the purpose of imposing upon the people of South Viet Nam a political decision by force.

And we need not argue whether this is civil war. There is an element of civil war in South Viet Nam to the extent that there are authentic southerners that have been dissidents there and have been trying to change the regime by force. But what is our business is the attack from the North, with more than 20 regiments of their regular forces operating in South Viet Nam, and with the continued movement of men and arms from the North into the South for that purpose.

Now that is aggression, that is the precise situation which was contemplated by the SEATO Treaty when the SEATO Treaty was formed in 1954 and 1955. That is a matter which is of direct concern to the security of the United States.

There is an armed attack on South Viet Nam. We have determined that among the steps that we must take to meet the common danger is to meet that armed attack by force until that armed attack is no longer there.

We have offered to put a schedule of withdrawal of American forces on the table if they would put on the table a schedule of withdrawal of their forces from South Viet Nam. It has been brutally rejected.

Our war aim is peace in Southeast Asia. It is not to obtain a surrender by North Viet Nam of anything that belongs to North Viet Nam; it is not to impose an American colonialism upon the people of South Viet Nam.

It is not easy to act both with firmness and restraint. One can understand, after all that has happened since 1945, that our own people should feel a sense of outrage that it should once again be necessary to have our young men lay their lives on the line in order that a course of aggression not gather its momentum. But that combination of firmness and restraint is still required, the same combination we used in the face of the Greek guerrillas 20 years ago, the Berlin blockade, Korea, the Cuban missile crisis, and these other great crises of the postwar period.

Firmness because we know that a course of aggression which develops momentum by one success after another leads to a great catastrophe. Restraint because we know that there is no point in driving the human race into that catastrophe if an honorable alternative can be found.

I would hope that the members of this great organization would help our people remember some of the things we are in danger of forgetting.

For example, when I see efforts being made by dissident groups not merely to express their dissidence under the normal processes of free speech, but to deprive other people of the public platform, it is rude of me to remember that when I was a student in Germany I saw the original storm troopers take the platforms away from the democratic forces including from the free trade unions of Germany, and that some of us think that that must never happen again, and must never happen here?

Can we help to remember that generation of young people represented heavily in this audience who were told in that earlier decade, "Manchuria is too far away. Ethiopia is none of our business. Give Hitler another bite and maybe he will be satisfied. Don't believe Mein Kampf. He doesn't really believe what he says."

It is rude for us to be skeptical when those same ideas are put forward as new ideas of the '60's when we know they were the ideas that led us all into the catastrophe of World War II? And can we remember that when the tens of millions came out of uniform after World War II, we did so with hope and with a certain gladness in our hearts because we saw there in Article I of the United Nations charter a solemn agreement as to what is required to organize peace:

"The suppression of acts of aggression and breaches of the peace, the settlement of disputes by peaceful means, basic support for the essential human rights, cooperation across national frontiers in the great humanitarian interests of all mankind.

We better hang onto those lessons that are in Article I of the United Nations Charter not just because a frightful price was paid for them, literally tens of millions of lives, but because we shall not have the chance to draw the lessons from World War III. There won't be enough left.

SO PERHAPS we can all agree, young and old, the true liberals and those who call themselves liberals, the true liberals being those who remember that the word liberal has something to do with freedom, that all of us could agree that the central question for mankind is organizing that reliable peace.

And then let us have your differences about how you set about doing it. I would suspect that in that debate there is a great burden of proof that falls upon those who think you can get to peace by letting one treaty after another go down the drain, and one small country after another gobbled up by some stronger neighbor. At least there is a burden of proof on those who have any such notion in view of the experience of the last four decades.

Employers Make Adjustments:

Workers Show Steady Gains In Vacation and Holidays

PAID VACATIONS and holidays are steadily improving for U.S. workers, but they still lag behind those of workers in other industrialized nations, an AFL-CIO economist reported in a network radio interview.

Rudolph Oswald, of the AFL-CIO's Department of Research, said that the United States is "unique in not providing paid vacations and paid holidays by law," as most other countries do. He said that unions in many countries have also negotiated time off beyond that prescribed by statute. Oswald was questioned by reporters on Labor News Conference, a public affairs interview aired Tuesday at 7:35 p.m. EST on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

The labor economist said that "nearly half of the union contracts" renegotiated in the United States today improve vacations and holidays. He said that 20 years ago, two-week vacations were the maximum in union contracts. Many now provide four weeks or more for long-service employes, and shorter-service employes get longer vacations at an earlier time. Workers have been gaining an average of about one week of vacation every ten years, he said.

"Most employers have been able to adjust to the longer periods workers have away from their jobs, so there is no disruption of the work force," Oswald said. He noted that some industries close down during slack periods and all workers take their vacations then.

Oswald said that increased leisure time has not only boosted worker-productivity, but has helped build and expand travel and recreation industries, and those that manufacture for them.

HE POINTED OUT that today's schools give children "many more opportunities for expression in fields other than work" and new generations will have "plenty of opportunity to use their leisure time to expand their personalities and their total lives."

Reporters questioning Oswald on the AFL-CIO produced program, were Alan Adams of Business Week magazine and Harry Conn, editor of Press Associates, Inc.

ONE OF THE FESTERING injustices that prevails today is that some of the most notorious anti-union companies in the United States, repeatedly found guilty of unfair labor practices by the National Labor Relations Board, are still getting fat government contracts.

An obvious example of what is going on is that of the powerful J. P. Stevens chain of textile manufacturing plants which has been found guilty of anti-union practices in no less than four cases, has been fighting adverse decision by the NLRB in and out of court and has now reached the end of the line with the refusal of the U.S. Supreme Court even to hear its appeal against a lower court decision against it.

As the AFL-CIO convention statement on the situation summed it up, the Stevens chain has been found guilty of illegal threats, coercion and discharge of its employes who want a union, yet is getting millions of dollars worth of government contracts.

Nor is Stevens the only offender.

● Since 1950 the Rutter-Rex manufacturing company of New Orleans has continuously been found guilty of using unfair labor tactics in fighting organization by the Amalgamated Clothing Workers. For more than 10 years the union has been trying vainly to get back pay for illegally discharged workers. Yet, the company goes on merrily getting government contracts.

● The M & B Headwear company of Richmond, Va., is the largest military hat maker in the country with 95 percent of its business coming from the U.S. government. For the past four years its workers have wanted to join the United Hatters. They actually won an election, but they can't get a contract. A 22-month strike failed to produce one. The NLRB found the company guilty of illegal labor practices. Yet this company, too, has been rewarded with profitable government contracts.

● For the past seven years, the Machinists have been trying to win decent union working conditions from the United Aircraft Corp. Four years ago the NLRB issued a complaint charging the corporation with illegally provoking a strike and with illegally refusing to reinstate fired workers. This year, again, the NLRB issued complaints against United Aircraft for violations of the law. Yet here, too, substantial military contracts have gone to the company.

Invariably, government procurement agencies declare that they can't get involved in labor disputes. Yet the brutal fact is that by their very act in granting such companies military or other types of contracts they are involved—up to their ears.

By the very terms of the Wagner Act—and specifically repeated in Taft-Hartley—it is the national policy of the United States to encourage the organization of workers and free collective bargaining. By giving contracts to companies which are notorious for thwarting this national purpose, government procurement officers are aiding the thwarting of that purpose.

THERE IS ANOTHER SIDE to the government alibi that it cannot take sides in a labor dispute. Irrespective of union organization, can the government, in all conscience, shut its eyes to the conditions under which contracts are being carried out?

Only recent accounts of what has been happening in Selma, Ala., have thrown a sharp light on sweatshop, speed-up and humiliating labor relations conditions at the local plant of Laura Industries where the Intl. Ladies' Garment Workers has sought recognition.

Workers complained bitterly of a speed-up that has driven them to tears, of being treated "like animals," of getting no holidays and being stood on platforms and publicly humiliated and fired if they took a day off.

Laura management, the workers said, constantly raised the cry that it would lose its government contracts if production were not kept up to a higher and higher level. It apparently had no fears that it would lose its contracts if it opposed organization of its workers and subjected them to 1890 working conditions.

PAID VACATIONS and holidays of U.S. workers lag behind those in other industrial nations, AFL-CIO Economist Rudolph Oswald, center, told Harry Conn., left, of Press Associates, Inc., and Alan Adams of Business Week magazine on Labor News Conference. The AFL-CIO produced public service program is heard Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m. EST on Mutual radio.

How to Buy:

More Price Hikes Due in '68 —Not All of Them Necessary

By Sidney Margolius

FOR 1968 you can expect higher living costs again. A year ago this column forecast for 1967 a hike of 2 to 3 percent. Costs went up exactly 2.6 percent. Over the past two years, the prices you pay have gone up about 6.5 per cent on the average.

This has caused the average working family to run hard just to stand still. Despite pay increases, by late fall a worker with three dependents actually had lost 14 cents in purchasing power from a year ago.

This coming year the indications are that you face an even sharper rise in living costs — close to 3 percent.

Frankly, many of the recent price increases are not necessary at all and are due to businessmen taking advantage of the war and "tight money" situation.

The problem your family must deal with is that the sharpest increases currently are in the most basic necessities; food, housing, medical care, transportation and clothing. These increases hit the younger families hardest, especially those looking for houses.

You still have to fight these price rises to protect your family's living standard and there are some ways left to do it.

One way is to time your buying to take advantage of seasonal price fluctuations. Another is to compare values closely, especially in buying food, and to avoid the costlier TV-advertised processed foods, soaps and toiletries. The manufacturers and retailers like to say that consumers vote with their dollars. So study the candidates in the stores and vote for the best buys. Every time you save a buck you help your own family and everybody else.

Another important policy for 1968 is to avoid any borrowing or installment buying that is not truly essential. Lending money will be even tighter this year, and interest rates and finance charges higher.

This January itself will provide some unusual buying opportunities. Not only is this a big month for sales anyway, but this year merchants and manufacturers are stuck with unsold Christmas goods.

Now, with farm prices expected to rise this year, the prices you pay at the supermarket will jump sharply. Your relatively better values this year will be poultry and eggs, although eggs will not be quite the standout bargain they have been in recent months.

Pork too is relatively good value this winter but prices will increase later in the year. In general, meat will cost you more in 1968.

Clothing prices recently made their largest jump in the past 17 years. Retailers have taken noticeable advantage of the delayed price increases on clothes, and have marked up their tags almost 5 percent over the past year, twice the actual increase at wholesale, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reports.

Shoe prices have become the toughest problem. On top of last year's general price increase of 5 percent, you can expect to pay another increase of about 4 percent this year.

OUR ADVICE: Shop the January shoe sales for immediate needs; also the January and February coat, suit, shirt and other clearances. Don't wait until March to buy shoes and other clothing items you will need soon. Prices will be higher.

One bright spot is the lower prices and improvements in durable-press shirts, blouses, slacks and dresses made of polyester-cotton blends. More of these garments now are improved by the addition of soil-release finishes which help solve the tendency of polyester to retain soil.

If you have been hoping to buy a house in 1968 you will pay doubly extra. Prices of houses have reached historic peaks, with the average now costing close to $20,000. Resale prices of existing homes jumped sharply this year, now averaging $19,538 compared to $18,265 a year ago, the National Association of Real Estate Boards reports.

On top of that, mortgage interest rates are going up again.

If you must buy a house this year, you may do better buying it in the winter before the spring rush starts. Price tags on houses sometimes are $1,000 less in midwinter than in spring and early summer.

Vaccine Miracle:

Shots Can Ward Off Dangerous Diseases

THE SEASONAL Public Health Service announcements urging flu vaccination for adults and children in certain vulnerable groups are a reminder of the miracle of immunization. But there are other dangerous diseases, too, against which continued protection is possible—if children are properly immunized and if they and adults get the periodic booster shots that are recommended.

A brief story of how the human body resists infection and an outline of the immunizations currently available are provided in Immunization For All, a new Public Affairs Pamphlet by Jules Saltman. It is available for 25 cents from the Public Affairs Committee, 381 Park Avenue South, New York, N.Y. 10016.

The human body has a number of defenses against disease. "An unbroken skin is one," Saltman explains. "White blood cells and other elements that can engulf and destroy invaders are another. A third are the harmless bacteria and viruses . . . that interfere with harmful ones. . . . But all this natural resistance may be of no avail when it has been weakened by illness or when invading germs are too virulent or too numerous for it."

It is then that specific immunity must take over—sometimes from the disease itself, against which the body then builds up antibodies that protect against a later onslaught of the same disease; or, more safely, immunity can be achieved from a vaccine.

SALTMAN GIVES major attention to seven of the infectious diseases than can now be prevented by immunization: smallpox, tetanus, polio, measles, influenza, whooping cough, diphtheria. He also reports on protection against typhoid, tuberculosis, and mumps and German measles, and on the search for other vaccines—partcularly against respiratory diseases and hepatitis. A two-page chart on immunizations tells when to begin, the dosage given, the booster schedule for both young people and adults.

Additional immunizations are necessary for foreign travel. "Yellow fever and cholera," Saltman writes, "disappeared from the United States many years ago, smallpox more recently. But in several areas of the world these diseases still exist and can cause severe epidemics if introduced elsewhere." Jet travel increases the danger, for it is now possible for someone without outward symptoms to arrive in a country "while incubating a disease contracted in another part of the world."

To protect ourselves and others, the immunizations recommended for various areas of the world are extremely vital. From the point of view of travel, Saltman covers smallpox, yellow fever, cholera; also, among others, typhus, plague, malaria. He concludes with information about where to get immunizations and a plea for everyone to keep good, up-to-date records of his immunization.

Immunization For All is the latest in the Public Affairs Pamphlet series, now in its 32nd year. The series includes many other titles covering health and science, family relation, social and economic problems, intergroup relations.

Soup to Nonsense:

Packing for a Trip Boils Down To What You Shouldn't Pack

By Jane Goodsell

A COMPLEX MYTHOLOGY has grown up around the art of packing for a trip, and part of the myth is that packing is an art. In truth, packing is no more esoteric than washing dishes. It is simply a matter of stuffing as much of what you'll need as you can get into as much luggage as you can take. Well, maybe it isn't quite that simple, but it isn't nearly as complicated as most travel experts would have you think.

I have been giving this subject some thought lately because I am about to take my second trip to Europe. While I can't pretend that my one trip qualifies me as an authority, I have learned a thing or two which may benefit other travelers:

There is nothing in the customs regulations which requires all lady travelers to uniform themselves in knit suits and stout walking shoes. Some females aren't comfortable in shoes that are all that comfortable.

A travel wardrobe is not so different from a stay-at-home wardrobe that you must outfit yourself from scratch, as though you were buying a layette for a new baby. On the contrary, there's a lot to be said for taking old clothes because (a) knowing their faults beforehand, you can be more philosophic about skirts that hike up and blouses that won't stay tucked in; and (b) after a nine-hour plane trip, anything looks like you bought it at a rummage sale.

One wash-and-wear outfit probably makes sense in case all your clothes get dirty all at once, which can happen if your makeup leaks all over your suitcase (next time put it in a leakproof cosmetic bag) but an entire wardrobe of drip-dries is pure folly. For one thing, if you can wash it yourself, you'll feel compelled to do so.

SATIN CASES for hosiery and lingerie, and leather kits containing six wee clothespins and a portable clothesline (or ten spools of thread and a jeweled thimble) make lovely and thoughtful gifts to give to travelers, who should leave them safely at home, wrapped in tissue paper. At some future date, they will make lovely and thoughtful going-away presents to give to other travelers.

If you don't use it at home, don't take it with you. This ought to go without saying, but it doesn't because many travelers tend to expect a sea-change to transform them into somebody else. Hence, the sale of diaries, movie cameras, shoeshine kits, body lotions, ice bags and hot water bottles to people who have never used such things in their lives.

Soaring Car Insurance Rates Underscore Need for Reform

The soaring cost of auto insurance has hit working people especially hard in an age when a car often is a worker's "lifeline to his job," declares consumer expert Sidney Margolius in urging reform of the industry.

In an article titled "Auto Insurance: The Need for Reform," running in the December issue of the AFL-CIO Federationist, Margolius blasts the worst abuses of auto insurance companies and lists reforms now gaining support as congressional committees open their investigations.

"One of the most worrisome and costly problems for wage earners is the soaring price of auto insurance and the arbitrary risk selections and cancellations that often create as severe a dilemma as the cost," writes Margolius, adding:

"In various metropolitan areas, auto insurance bills have jumped anywhere from 30 percent to as much as 200 percent in the past decade. In six cities across the country, taken as a sample, rates have been rising about 5 to 6 percent a year or two to three times as fast as the cost of living in general."

Margolius says "working people have been hit especially hard" in an era of widely dispersed factories and obsolete public transportation when "a worker's car often is his lifeline to his job."

It is not unusual today for a working family to pay premiums of $200 to $300 and sometimes even $400 a year to insure a car worth perhaps $200, he observes.

Workers also are discriminated against, he adds, noting:

"Because many auto insurors have become ultra selective, they have tended to avoid selling insurance to blue collar workers in some industries, especially unskilled workers but also some skilled crafts."

The discrimination also extends, says Margolius, to the practice of higher rates for those living on the edge of low-income or deteriorated neighborhoods, for those who may have moved frequently or who may have been involved in a minor scrape or accident.

The problems are further compounded for Negroes, for those under 25 and for the elderly, he writes.

Margolius reports that three congressional committees are investigating the problem.

Abuses Cited

He says the counsel for a Senate anti-trust subcommittee lists the major complaints, in addition to high rates, as follows: cancellation, non-renewal and rejection practices of many companies; rate hikes without public hearings; profit formulas based on sales and excluding investment income earnings; company accounting methods; use of private credit firms to investigate policyholders; tight claim settlement practices; tie-in sales of auto insurance with home and other policies.

Margolius feels that by now some companies really may not be making money, given the inefficient practices followed over the years.

"All parties have contributed their share to the problem: the cars, the drivers, the roads, the oil companies who promote the idea of increased power and speed and the insurors with their expensive operating methods," he writes, concluding:

"The time has arrived for thorough reforms before the public comes to feel that auto insurance in an auto age needs to be treated as a public utility, with the rates, profits and number of sellers all regulated."

He notes in the article that a successful auto insurance plan has been run for years by the government in the Canadian province of Saskatchewan.

Margolius describes a number of proposed reforms. He explains the advantages and drawbacks of a major proposal, the Keeton-O'Connell plan drafted by two law professors, that would offer a system of automatic payments as in workmen's compensation. These would be payable no matter who was at fault and would aim at eliminating lawsuits that clog the courts and try to cut needlessly high costs.

Another major improvement would be through group purchasing of auto insurance, an area already pioneered by unions seeking to bring down the high administrative and sales expense of auto insurance firms. However, Margolius writes, rigid regulations of state insurance departments have so far blocked this remedy.

Other reforms that Margolius sees as desirable include counting of investment income in considering a company's request for rate hikes, more uniformity in payments to reduce costly awards, greater competition to boost efficiency, more control by public agencies over the present abuse of arbitrary cancellations, federal guarantees against company bankruptcies, and required deductibles to cut costs.

A WORKER'S CAR IS HIS LIFELINE to his job and other needs and it is threatened by the soaring cost of auto insurance, discrimination in coverage and arbitrary cancellations, writes consumer expert Sidney Margolius in calling for reforms. Margolius's article appears in the current American Federationist.

Labor Helps Launch State Consumers Unit

Chicago—The Illinois Federation of Consumers was launched at a two-day founding convention and education conference here with labor playing a prominent role.

Some 150 delegates representing more than 50 organizations adopted a constitution and budget, elected 36 directors and alternate directors and initiated a membership drive. They also attended workshops on consumer problems.

Illinois AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Robert G. Gibson was elected secretary of the board of directors. Other labor representatives on the board are Thomas Kelley, Auto Workers regional organization director, Pres. George Smith of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers' Illinois Council and Stanley Rosen of Teachers Local 89.

Alternate directors from labor include Paul A. Iaccino, assistant to the president of the Chicago AFL-CIO, Pres. Cecil Qualls of Quad City AFL-CIO, Sec. Charles Midden of the Springfield AFL-CIO, Mrs. Helga Nisbet, Communications Workers Illinois director and Sec.-Treas. James Coli of Teamsters Local 727.

Voorhis Elected

Board officers, in addition to Kelley, are Jerry Voorhis, former executive director of the U.S. Cooperative League, president; Thomas Moore, general manager, Association of Illinois Electric Companies, vice president; and James Erickson, Illinois Farmers Union director of organization, treasurer.

Main convention speakers included Jacob Clayman, administrative director of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. and Charles Cavagnaro of the President's Committee on Consumer Interests.

Clayman also is president of the Consumer Federation of America with which the new Illinois federation is affiliated.

He called interest charges on credit the "silent thief" in the marketplace and asked Illinois consumers to write congressmen for passage of pending truth-in-lending legislation. Clayman also urged letters for other consumer bills.

Cavagnaro told the convention that Pres. Johnson is dedicated to securing four rights for consumers —the right to be honestly informed, the right to choose, the right to safety and the right to be heard.

Bargaining Rights Won For 60,000 in Quarter

AFL-CIO unions won 709 of 1,214 representation elections during the July through September period, the National Labor Relations Board said in its quarterly report.

The election victories gave affiliated unions bargaining rights for 60,576 workers.

Overall, the NLRB said, it conducted 1,846 secret ballot representation elections during the quarter, with unions—both AFL-CIO and unaffiliated—winning 61 percent.

There were 82,718 workers in units which voted for union representation and 59,468 in units in which no bargaining representative was chosen.

In 57 decertification elections held during the period, 35 resulted in decertification of the union but the 22 in which the union was retained included the larger units. Of the 3,328 ballots cast in decertification elections, 2,311 were to retain the union.

At the close of the quarter, the NLRB had 10,225 cases pending—slightly under the level of the previous quarter, but slightly above the previous year.

The prinicpal groups were 7,192 unfair labor practice charges and 2,939 petitions for representation elections.

During the quarter—the first of the 1968 fiscal year—NLRB trial examiners conducted 228 hearings.

The five-member board issued formal decisions on 110 unfair labor practice cases during this period.

There were 2,825 unfair labor practice charges filed against employers during the quarter and 1,495 against unions—of which 404 alleged secondary boycott violations.

Most of the charges filed on both sides were dismissed, withdrawn or settled voluntarily, the NLRB said. A total of 563 formal complaints were issued by the general counsel.

Auto Insurance Group Adopts Voluntary 'Code'

A major segment of the auto insurance industry, reacting to mounting consumer criticism and the possibility of federal regulation, has adopted a voluntary code of principles aimed at some abuses in policy coverage.

The code has no teeth, however, and industry officials admitted the new principles involved "very little change as a matter of fact" in current practices.

The National Association of Independent Insurers, a Chicago-based group of 350 companies which write about $4.5 billion or more than half of all private auto liability insurance in the nation, announced the code at a press conference in Washington, D. C.

A key principle in the new code was summed up as stating a person is to be accepted for coverage "regardless of race, color, creed, occupation, whether previously rejected or cancelled, whether divorced, whether a senior citizen."

Three congressional committees have been investigating a floodtide of complaints about auto insurance abuses. These include rapidly-rising costs of coverage; high rates or obstacles to coverage for Negroes, servicemen, divorced persons, those living in or near slum areas; arbitrary and mass cancellations.

Reacted to Criticism

The NAII, while denying that these practices exist, said it acted "in response to congressional and public critcism in recent months and . . . to eliminate sources of irritation and misunderstanding."

NAII Pres. Vestal Lemmon told reporters the industry recognized it had to do something "positive and affirmative." Lemmon said no company will be expelled for violating the code, adding:

"We don't have a police stick."

Lemmon said NAII surveys indicated companies are not guilty of the abuses charged, though there may be isolated cases of unfair practices.

Under questioning, Lemmon said the new code will mean "very little change as a matter of fact."

Rail Merger Job Protection Won by BRC

The Railway & Airline Clerks has negotiated an agreement to protect 16,000 members who could be affected by a merger of five western railroads next year.

The pact is with the Great Northern, Northern Pacific, Chicago, Burlington & Quincy, and Spokane, Portland & Seattle Railway Companies. The Interstate Commerce Commission has approved their merger but has not issued its final order.

The agreement, according to BRC Pres. L. C. Dennis, provides that an employe of the railroads in the union's jurisdiction will be listed as "protected" if he has seniority to Jan. 2, 1966, and has paid service between then and the merger.

Such a "protected" worker must be continued in employment until retirement, resignation, death or a "proper" discharge or dismissal, he pointed out.

The agreement also provides guaranteed minimum earnings for "protected" employes, according to the union. Also under the agreement employes generally do not have to move. However, if they do choose to transfer upon request, they receive transfer allowances and protection against loss from selling their houses.

Meager Gains Mark Congress Session

Cuts in Basic Programs Forced By House Conservative Coalition

Here is what Congress did and didn't do in some of the major areas of AFL-CIO concern:

CITIES—Voted only $312 million for the mammoth task of helping cities rehabilitate entire slum neighborhoods. This is less than half the amount Pres. Johnson had asked for the model cities program.

RENT SUPPLEMENTS—Grudgingly voted $10 million of the $40 million the President had asked to provide better housing for low-income families. At one stage, the House had voted to kill the program entirely.

SOCIAL SECURITY—Pared down the higher cash benefits proposed by Pres. Johnson and imposed a series of punitive restrictions on public welfare—including a ceiling on the number of children who could be helped. Refused to extend medicare to disabled persons under 65.

COMPULSORY ARBITRATION—Barred rail shopcraft workers from striking and rejected a labor-backed proposal to balance this by freezing part of rail management's profits until a voluntary agreement was reached.

ON-SITE PICKETING—Put off House action on bill to allow building trades unions to picket multi-employer construction sites until after the Senate acts. House leadership claimed congressmen were gun-shy about voting for a labor bill before the Senate acts in view of filibuster which blocked 14(b) repeal in the 89th Congress.

RAT CONTROL — Approved $40 million for rat control as part of an omnibus health bill in a rare setback for House conservatives. The House had originally refused to take up a rat control bill in a debate marked by callous jokes. But outraged public opinion brought about a change of heart.

CIVIL RIGHTS—Enacted only a routine extension of the Civil Rights Commission—coupled with a strict budget ceiling. The remainder of the President's broad-ranging legislative package awaits second session action.

In the Senate, Majority Leader Mike Mansfield made the pending order of business at the start of the second session a bill setting stiff penalties for interference with anyone exercising his civil rights. The need for further civil rights legislation, Mansfield said, is "a question we can't avoid, one we shouldn't avoid."

POVERTY—Approved after a long, bitter fight continuation of the anti-poverty programs of the Office of Economic Opportunity—but with less funds than the Administration had sought. Some concessions had to be made, but the major attempts to dismember the program were defeated. However, some projects ran out of funds and had to close down before Congress finally acted.

MEAT INSPECTION—Enacted a strong, labor-backed bill after an aroused public protested a weak, voluntary measure passed by the House. The result will be to require states to match federal meat inspection standards for plants that are now exempt because their products are not sold across state lines. A major victory for the consumer.

SCHOOL AID—Voted a two-year extension of federal aid to elementary and secondary schools and authorized Congress to appropriate funds a year in advance to ease budget-making for schools. However, control over allocation of funds for supplementary education centers will be gradually shifted from the federal government to the states.

FEDERAL PAY—Enacted a three-step pay raise for salaried federal and postal employes, starting with a retroactive 6 percent boost for postal workers and 4.5 percent for classified employes. Additional fringe benefits were also in the bill.

TEACHERS CORPS—Approved continuation of the Teacher Corps for an additional two years and authorized new teacher training programs to start next year. However, the actual appropriation for this year for the Teacher Corps was only $13.5 million of the $33 million requested by Pres. Johnson.

TAXES—Restored the 7 percent investment tax credit and ended up giving a bigger windfall to corporations than the Administration had proposed. Took no action, beyond House hearings, on the President's request for an emergency surtax on incomes to help pay the cost of the Viet Nam war.

CAMPAIGN FUNDS — Repealed, in effect, the law it had passed just the year before to provide up to $30 million to each major party for presidential campaign through voluntary taxpayer checkoffs of $1 on income tax returns. The fight over campaign financing tied up the Senate for more than five weeks.

FOREIGN AID — Slashed to its lowest level America's foreign aid program. Pres. Johnson said $3.46 billion was needed; Congress appropriated $2.3 billion. Deep cuts were made in development loans and the Alliance for Progress. On the plus side, Congress did authorize increased U.S. contributions to the Inter-American Development Bank's special operations fund.

TRUTH-IN-LENDING — The Senate passed a compromise "truth-in-lending," bill, something labor and former Sen. Paul Douglas (D-Ill.) had campaigned for over the years. Efforts to strengthen the bill will be made when it reaches the House floor early in 1968.

PUBLIC BROADCASTING—An important first step towards strengthening non-commercial television and radio was taken with the establishment of a Public Broadcasting Corp., to channel federal funds into better programs and facilities, without federal censorship or control.

FOOD STAMPS—Extended the food stamp program enabling needy families to expand their purchasing power for another two years and voted most of the money sought by the Administration. In a related area, it approved emergency food and medical aid for starving persons.

CONSUMER SAFETY—Established a National Commission on Product Safety to identify hazardous household products, expanded protection against flammable fabrics, and enacted a Gas Pipeline Safety Act.

PUBLIC POWER — Refused funds to complete planning of the Dickey-Lincoln public power project in Maine to bring low-cost electricity to a New England area where power rates are among the highest in the nation. The Senate voted funds, but the House repeatedly rejected the appropriation.

FARM WORKERS — Held hearings on extension of collective bargaining rights to farm workers, and a House Labor subcommittee approved a bill shortly before adjournment. No floor action has been taken.

AIR POLLUTION—Enacted an Air Quality Act which substantially increased federal controls over air pollution and increased funds for pollution control programs. However, it did not authorize the federal government to set national emission control standards as the President had requested.

HEALTH — Approved the Administration's major Partnership for Health program of grants to states and extended other health programs.

UPTON SINCLAIR aroused the nation to the need for federal meat inspection in his 1906 novel, "The Jungle," an expose of the meatpacking industry. The 85-year-old crusader was a guest of honor when Pres. Johnson signed the legislation which expands federal meat inspection standards to plants previously exempt. The dog who jumped into the picture is Yuki, a White House pet.

LBJ Says Government Must Offer Jobs for All

America must find jobs for its unemployed, Pres. Johnson said in a television interview, and if private industry can't or won't the federal government has an obligation to "offer every one of them a job."

Here's what the President said when questioned by newsmen from the three major networks on Dec. 9:

"There are some half-million unemployed—hard-core unemployed—in our principal cities. We just have to go and find jobs for them.

"I am going to call in the businessmen of America and say one of two things have to happen: You have to help me go out here and find jobs for these people, or we are going to have to find jobs in the government for them and offer every one of them a job. . . . I think that will have to be done, as expensive at it is."

The AFL-CIO has urged that the federal government must become "the employer of last resort and the landlord of last resort" to overcome the crisis of the cities.

Musicians Merge Louisville Locals

Louisville—The Musicians' continuing campaign to end racial segregation should result in all locals being totally integrated by the middle of 1969, AFM Pres.-Emeritus James C. Petrillo predicted here.

On hand for a meeting of Local 11-637, formed by a merger of the city's former Negro and white locals, Petrillo also voiced confidence that merged locals will be stronger and more successful than were previously segregated units.

Petrillo emerged from retirement in 1963 to take on the role of heading up the union's civil rights department and the merger program.

Survey Tallies Jobless In 15 Big City Areas

More than 30 percent of the nation's unemployed—and nearly 40 percent of jobless Negroes—live in the 15 largest metropolitan areas, a new Labor Dept. survey revealed.

The two largest areas surveyed—New York and the Los Angeles-Long Beach metropolitan area—accounted for 12 percent of total U.S. unemployment, each with about 180,000 jobless. But for New York, this amounted to an unemployment rate of 4.1 percent for whites and 5 percent for non-whites, while the Los Angeles jobless rate was 6 percent for whites and 9.1 percent for non-whites.

Overall, in the 15 areas, Negroes made up only 14 percent of the labor force but about 27 percent of the unemployed.

For the 15 big city areas, unemployment averaged 3.5 percent for whites and 7.7 percent for Negroes.

In nine central cities studied separately, Washington, D.C., had the lowest nonwhite unemployment rate —2.5 percent—while San Francisco-Oakland had the highest, with 9.8 percent. Among metropolitan areas the highest Negro unemployment rate was 12.7 percent in St. Louis, followed by 10.7 percent in Detroit and 10.5 percent in Newark. In all three areas, white unemployment was under 4 percent.

Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz termed the Bureau of Labor Statistics study "the first intensive, reliable survey" of unemployment in the big metropolitan areas.

He said it will be repeated periodically—perhaps every six months—and will be expanded later to cover data from inner-city ghettos where joblessness is higher than the city as a whole.

Data uncovered by the surveys, Wirtz said, will help the government and private groups "focus on the remaining pockets of hard-core unemployment."

Canada Jobless Rate Shows Sharp Jump

Ottawa—Unemployment in Canada rose to 289,000 in mid-November, the Canadian government reported. That's 35,000 more than in October and 51,000 more jobless than a year ago.

On a percentage basis, the unemployment rate is 3.8 percent, compared with 3.2 percent in October and 3.1 percent a year ago.

Labor Press Postage Hike Is Modified

Union newspapers and publications of other non-profit organizations will have to pay a 60 percent postage increase—but it will be spread over three years.

As finally enacted, the minimum per-copy postage rate for non-profit publications with less than 10 percent advertising will be .13 of a cent in 1968, up only slightly from the present one-eighth of a cent.

It would move up to .15 in 1969 and jump to one-fifth of a cent in 1970.

All categories of postage rates were increased by Congress. As of Jan. 1, the 5-cent rate for first-class letters goes to 6 cents; post card stamps will cost a nickel instead of 4 cents, and the airmail rate moves up from 8 cents to 10 cents.

The 6-cent stamp will show the profile of Pres. Franklin D. Roosevelt.

Meany Pledges '68 Drive To Assure Liberal Victory

LBJ Urged To Battle Welfare Cut

Pres. Johnson was urged by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany to make clear his determination to "remedy the evils" in the recently-passed social security bill if he feels "impelled" to sign the legislation.

In a letter to the President, Meany noted that Johnson might "feel impelled to sign this bill, because of the great need of social security recipients for a prompt increase," even an inadequate one.

"But we most earnestly suggest," Meany wrote, "that if you decide to sign the bill, you simultaneously inform the Congress of your determination to seek, in the next session, swift and decisive action to remedy the evils that have been done to the principle and practice of public assistance in America . . .

"We assure you of our fullest support in any endeavor to restore humanity and compassion to the nation's welfare laws."

In his letter, Meany pointed out that the measure "falls far short of the improvements you recommended to Congress," and worse than that, "contains a series of new and indefensible restrictions on public assistance."

In effect, Meany added, these restrictions "penalize the poorest of the poor for their poverty."

Noting that the final bill is "very similar" to a measure first passed by the House, the AFL-CIO president recalled that the federation had appealed to the Senate to correct inadequacies and remove "attacks on public assistance."

The initial response of the Senate was "pleasing" to labor in that it enacted a measure that was "in line with our concept of a 'down payment' toward the ultimate objectives of the social security system," Meany said.

"Unfortunately," he added, "the bill that emerged from the Senate-House conference was little better than the House version."

The basic benefit increases in social security, "the least obnoxious phase of the bill," Meany said, are

J.P. Stevens Bows, Acts To Rehire

Greenville, S. C.—The law, in the person of the U.S. Supreme Court, finally caught up with J. P. Stevens & Co., Inc., long-defiant textile giant.

Management of the world's second largest textile chain sent notices to 69 workers it fired as long as four years ago that they can come back to work now, even if they are union members.

Stevens fired the workers, the National Labor Relations Board found, to smash an organizing drive begun in 1963 by the Textile Workers Union of America. Then it staged a legal fight to prevent their reinstatement despite orders from the NLRB and U.S. courts.

Just before Christmas the Supreme Court refused to review a lower court finding that Stevens interfered with the rights of 71 workers "flagrantly, cynically and unlawfully." That spelled victory for the workers—except one who died and one who left for parts unknown.

TWUA offices in Charlotte, N.C., said the word of top management's decision to throw in the towel spread like a brush fire from

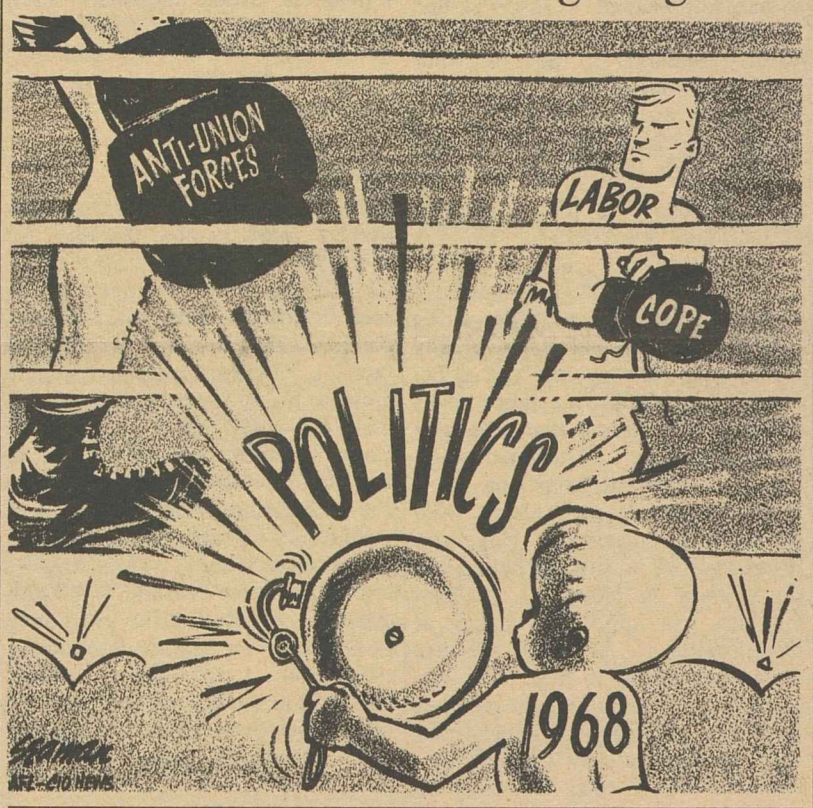
'. . . And Come Out Fighting!'



Sees Vital Labor Role In Election

A choice between "liberalism and reaction" confronts the nation in the year ahead and labor must assume a major role if liberalism is to win out, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared in a New Year's statement.

The choice, Meany stressed, will be not only at the presidential level, but in every congressional district.

There "is no question," he said, that the AFL-CIO must take the lead if the nation is to sustain "the unmatched gains of 1961-1966" and renew "a surge of progress toward the perfection of American life."

"This means," he declared, "the election, next November, of candidates who share with us the dream of America as it can and should be, and who share our confidence that the dream can be realized." (Excerpts from statement on Page 4.)

Noting that "pivotal" years of decision come with growing frequency in this age of ceaseless change, Meany said that a factor far more significant than change is "that old victories do not stay won."

Liberalism—"the cause of social justice"—must fight for its survival in the 1968 election just as it has had to do in the past, the AFL-

CPI Continues Rise, Buying Power Holds

The purchasing power of the average worker in November remained unchanged in October but was slightly above November 1966, the Labor Dept. reported. It was only the second time in 14 months that buying power exceeded year-earlier levels.

The department's report on earnings was released along with its monthly report on consumer prices showing that the cost of living continued a steady rise, climbing by three-tenths of 1 percent in November.

The advance, caused by higher prices for apparel, gasoline and a wide range of other items and services, sent the Consumer Price Index to a record 117.8 percent of the 1957-59 average, 2.8 percent above a year ago.

That means it cost the average city family $11.78 in November to buy goods and services that would have cost $10 in the 1957-59 base period.

The earnings report showed that take-home pay—gross earnings less social security and federal income tax deductions—averaged $84.95 a week for the single production worker and $92.50 for the worker with a wife and two children.

These after-tax earnings for the worker with three dependents were

Cash, Pledges Mount:

Copper Strike Fund Exceeds $600,000

The AFL-CIO's copper strike support fund passed the $600,000 mark in response to Federation Pres. George Meany's request for all-out labor support for the 60,000 workers on strike for a fair contract since July 15.

The fund includes more than $400,000 in cash or checks and in excess of an additional $200,000 in pledges, with new pledges arriving daily, Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler said.

The Steelworkers and 25 other affected unions reported that, while little meaningful bargaining has taken place, one of the struck firms — Phelps Dodge Corp.—agreed to resume talks Dec. 27 at Douglas, Ariz., and another — Kennecott Copper Corp.—said it would meet on the same date at Salt Lake City, Utah.

The strike originally involved the big four of the nonferrous metals industry, four smaller firms, and unions that coordinated their bargaining in a joint committee at each property. Since then it has grown to involve 26 unions and 11 companies—four large producers of copper, zinc and lead, and seven smaller smelting and refining companies.

Besides Phelps Dodge and Kennecott, the big four firms include the Anaconda Co. and American Smelting & Refining Co. Allied with the major producers are American Metal Climax, Inc., Cerro Corp., Hecla Mining Co., Inspiration Consolidated Copper Co., Magma Copper Co., Miami Copper Co. and White Pine Copper Co.

The 11 firms own 61 mines, mills and smelters in 23 states. All the properties have been closed, and orders have been filled from stockpiles or from supplies imported from abroad and sold at premium prices.

At the recent AFL-CIO convention in Bal Harbour, Fla., Meany told the delegates "it is

New Court Ruling Hits Stevens Firings

New York—J. P. Stevens & Co. lost another round in its running court battle against Labor Board crackdowns on its illegal anti-union activities.

The 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals here upheld an NLRB ruling ordering the company to reinstate with backpay 17 workers fired for activities supporting the Textile Workers Union of America and one other for testifying at a board hearing.

Other details of the court decision were not available as the AFL-CIO News went to press.

1967 Produces Mixed Gains, Setbacks

Struggles Viewed as Build-Up To Ballot Box Showdown in '68

By Harry Conn

Some years hence when labor historians look back on 1967 they will probably categorize it as the year of the build-up for the great showdown in 1968.

There were significant victories and some defeats in collective bargaining, in organizing and on the legislative front, but whatever struggles took place this year the participants seem to be shoring up their positions for the year ahead.

The first session of the 90th Congress stood poor in comparison to the accomplishments of the 89th; still some victories were achieved and lines were held in other areas. But a liberal-labor defeat in the 1968 presidential elections would even rule out a holding action in the 91st Congress.

The following highlights of the year were taken from the files of Press Associates, Inc.

January

In a New Year's message, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany calls for "no retreat" in the war on poverty . . . anti-labor groups eye new 90th Congress for chance to hamstring unions . . . Rubber Workers' Buckmaster dies at 72 . . . 90th Congress opens with House denying Rep. Adam Clayton Powell (D-N.Y.) his seat . . . Rep. mill town to town. Union supporters smiled a little, and organizing prospects brightened.

With its biggest roadblock out of the way, the TWUA said it would launch a new organizing effort in the wake of the court action assuring Stevens workers of their right to form unions.

But the union warned that Stevens' capitulation in one case did not mean a total about-face by the company. It cited three other NLRB decisions against Stevens that await final court rulings. And, it noted, backpay for the wrongfully fired workers has to await months, perhaps years, of tedious backpay hearings.

A union spokesman said total backpay may reach $1 million. The NLRB will assign an examiner to hold public hearings and then recommend how much should be deducted from backpay for earnings while the fired workers were on layoff.

The 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, in the decision upheld by the Supreme Court, wrote that there was no room for doubt of the board's ultimate conclusion.

(The company) "through its plant superintendents acting in collaboration, initiated and pursued a pattern of conduct the purpose of which was to crush the union movement.

"With scant regard for the means employed other than their effectiveness, it interfered with, restrained and coerced its employes in the exercise of their rights under the act, flagrantly, cynically and unlawfully."

Pollock Hopeful

The high court's action was reported by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany to the recent federation convention in Bal Harbour, Fla. TWUA Pres. William Pollock told the delegates he hoped the decision would "bring an end to this company's vicious campaign of terror."

The convention urged Pres. Johnson to issue an executive order denying federal contracts to "willful and repeated violators" of federal labor laws, such as Stevens. The firm is headed by former Army Sec. Robert T. Stevens and is a major Defense Dept. supplier.

A convention resolution charged that thousands of workers in other industries have likewise been denied the right to organize by "venal employers who boldly and flagrantly violate the law, knowing full well that the procedures of the NLRB are so time-consuming and its remedies so ineffectual that a board order, endlessly delayed, amounts to no more than a slap on the wrist."

quite evident" that the giants of the copper industry provoked the strike because they "believe they can starve their workers into submission."

The convention pledged full support of the strikers.

After the convention adjourned, Phelps Dodge broke a stalemate that had existed for more than two months by offering 4,200 workers at its Arizona properties a settlement whose value it pegged at 63.7 cents an hour over three years.

The unions put the value at "significantly less than 50 cents" but made a counter-offer which management agreed to comment on after a Christmas recess in talks.

Kennecott returned to the conference table for the first time in two months but a management spokesman indicated the company had no new proposals in mind.

In addition to the USWA, the striking unions are the Auto Workers, Boilermakers, Bricklayers, Carpenters, Chemical Workers, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers; Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers; Iron Workers, Laborers, Locomotive Engineers, Locomotive Engineers, Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen, Machinists, Molders, Office & Professional Employes, Office Employes Independent Union, Operating Engineers, Painters, Pattern Makers, Plumbers, Railway Trainmen, Railway Carmen, Railway Conductors, Sheet Metal Workers, Switchmen and Teamsters.

All but four are AFL-CIO affiliates.

up by about $3.03 over the year, the Labor Dept. said.

But when measured in 1957-59 dollars, the report added, the take-home pay for the worker with three dependents averaged $78.52, about 45 cents over November 1966.

Aggregate purchasing power also increased in November because of rising job totals, the earnings report said. Some 750,000 production and nonsupervisory workers were added to payrolls over the year, raising their number to 45.9 million.

The report on the cost of living showed that retail prices of food and beverages rose in November by two-tenths of 1 percent in November but declined over the year by about one-tenth of 1 percent.

It was a different story on apparels, gasoline, motor oil, furniture and such consumer services as insurance, rent, public transportation, housekeeping and medical care costs. They were all up for the month and the year as well.

Medical care costs rose six-tenths of 1 percent in November and nearly 8 percent over the year. Doctors' and dentists' fees were up 6.4 percent from November 1966 and hospital costs rose by 16 percent over the year.

Arnold Chase, assistant commissioner for the Bureau of Labor Statistics, predicted that the cost of living would rise again in December, based on preliminary data showing the wholesale price index increased by five-tenths of 1 percent this month.

The rise in November's Consumer Price Index means that more than 215,000 workers will receive pay increases through cost-of-living escalator clauses. For 110,000 aerospace workers it means a 2-cents-an-hour increase based on a quarterly adjustment. About 85,000 meat-packing workers will get a 6-cent increase based on the six-months change. Other workers will get raises ranging from 1 to 5 cents an hour.

Unionism Seen on Rise Among Professionals

New York—Professional and scientific workers seek a greater role in management policy-making along with improvements in inadequate salaries, it was generally agreed at a conference here.

Most of the participants also concluded that such employes will increasingly turn to trade unionism to achieve these and other goals in the work.

The one-day meeting was sponsored by Cornell University's School of Industrial & Labor Relations in cooperation with the AFL-CIO Council for Scientific, Professional & Cultural Employes, made up of 18 international unions.

The conference was attended by more than 75 representatives of unions in New York and New Jersey, educators and members of professional associations.

Panels and speakers discussed problems related to professional autonomy, professional standards and the role of professional employes' unions. Among topics taken up were the professional employes' utilization of grievance machinery, methods of insuring full use of union services by professional workers, and job standards.

Problems Ahead

Prof. Robert E. Doherty of Cornell told the meeting that professional unions must particularly concern themselves with improving the job standards.

"The problem of reconciling the traditional trade union objective of protecting and advancing the interests of these members . . . will be a difficult one to resolve," he said.

One discussion group agreed that professional employes want a greater voice in policy-making in their employment because—as one participant put it — "they want to feel they count, they want to get greater satisfaction out of their work."

Prof. James Kuhn of Columbia University emphasized the need for unions to attract younger workers. He said young employes often regard unions as unnecessary because they generally get regular pay increases in their first years on the job and also are susceptible to management's flattery.

Teachers Pres. Charles Cogen, who spoke at a luncheon meeting, said the conference proves that "professional unionism, coordinated by the council, is setting a good pace" in growth and in achieving objectives.

The movement of professional unionism, he predicted, "is destined to carry us all toward the new horizon of higher social and cultural values that are inherent in a progressive national character."

James D. Burke Dies, Postal Union Leader

New York — Sec.-Treas. James D. Burke of the Post Office & General Services Maintenance Employes was buried here after services in St. Theresa's Church, Brooklyn. He died at 57 in Providence Hospital, Washington, D.C., after a long illness.

Burke was elected to his post in 1954 after 15 years of service as an electrician in the New York postal system, and as an officer of his own union, Local 190. He was president of the local for 10 years.

The national union's executive board will name a successor at a meeting in Washington Jan. 2, Pres. Edward M. Diekemper said.

Bus, Subway Workers Set N.Y. Deadline

New York—City bus and subway workers, jamming Manhattan Center, voted to enforce their union's "no contract, no work" policy at 5 a.m. Jan. 1 unless city and private employers make an acceptable contract offer by that time.

Management negotiators have made no offer at all in talks that began 10 weeks ago, Pres. Matthew Guinan of the Transport Workers reported.

The agreements cover 34,500 city employes and 1,700 drivers and mechanics for five private bus lines—the latter represented by the Transit Union, which is coordinating its bargaining with the TWU.

"Not one of these employers has put so much as a fraction of a penny on the table," said TWU Local 100 Pres. Daniel Gilmartin.

After a roaring vote of approval, union negotiators left to resume talks at the Americana Hotel convened by a mediation panel named by Mayor John V. Lindsay (R). The mediators are Theodore W. Kheel, State Mediation Board Chairman Vincent D. McDonnell and former City Transit Authority Chairman Joseph E. O'Grady.

TWU's contract expires at midnight Jan. 1 but the expiration deadline was extended to 5 a.m. to accommodate New Year celebrators. ATU members also extended their pacts with the private lines — Jamaica Buses, Steinway Transit, Queens Transit, Triboro Coach Lines, Avenue B-East Broadway lines.

More than two months ago the unions submitted contract proposals asking wages comparable with those in other major cities and pension improvements.

In testimony before the mediators, Economist Leon H. Keyserling reported as a TWU witness that wages of transport workers in the five largest job groupings are from 16.5 to 31.6 percent below those for comparable city jobs.

TWU asserted that its contemplated action would not be a strike under the Taylor Act, which outlaws strikes by public employe unions.

30,000 IUE Members Vote on New GM Pact

Detroit—The Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers reached agreement with General Motors Corp. on a new three-year contract and sent it to a referendum vote among 30,000 IUE members.

The settlement was described by union negotiators as the "richest" and best ever made in IUE-GM bargaining. Members of five union locals have until Jan. 8 to vote—in New Brunswick, N.J., Rochester, N.Y., Warren, O., and at two Dayton, O., locations.

The members, who are employed at GM's Delco, Packard Electric and Frigidaire plants, had been working without a contract since Sept. 6, when the old pact expired and management refused to extend it.

IUE Pres. Paul Jennings described the contract as the "best ever" in terms of wages and fringe benefits, and one "tailored" to the needs of IUE members at GM. The union's negotiating committee recommended acceptance.

The package closely resembles those won in the auto industry. It features general wage hikes of 20 cents an hour for all workers during the first contract year, plus an additional increase of 30 cents an hour for skilled tradesmen. Pay boosts in the second and third years range from 9 to 18 cents an hour effective Nov. 25, 1968, and Nov. 24, 1969.

Unlimited protection against cost-of-living increases continues in the new pact, according to IUE-GM Conference Board Chairman Homer Pierce.

The settlement provides that pension benefits will be raised to $5.25 a month per year of service, graduating during the contract term to $6, depending on the retiree's wage rate at retirement.

Other Benefits

Provision was made for those who lost service credits since Oct. 1, 1950. Survivor benefits were sharply improved. Supplementary unemployment benefits were bettered to cover 80 percent of pay for short workweeks.

The new pact has added hospital and medical care protection, improved sickness and accident benefits, a prescription drug program, two additional paid holidays for a total of 11, and other betterments.

The union listed seven major non-economic gains, including strengthened grievance procedure, specified lines of demarcation between skilled trades, and a more meaningful apprentice training system.

The Task for Labor

FOR THE LABOR MOVEMENT and for the American people as a whole, 1968 will be a pivotal year—another year of decision.

Such years come with growing frequency in this age of ceaseless change. But they do not arise from change alone; a far more significant factor is that old victories do not stay won. The same battles must be fought again and again.

The year ahead is a classic case in point. It will culminate in a national election that will unquestionably be a choice between liberalism and reaction—not only at the presidential level, but in every congressional district.

Obviously this choice has been made by American voters time after time, ever since the election of 1800.

Why is it that liberalism—the cause of social progress—must so often fight for survival? Three major factors are involved.

One is confusion. As old issues arise in new forms their outlines are often blurred. Civil rights was a clear-cut question in 1964; but now civil rights means open housing, too, and urban renewal, and jobs for the hard-core unemployed, and much else. This was inevitable as well as right; but there are many who, though free of bigotry, are nevertheless troubled by it.

This arises from the second factor, inadequate communications. American society is growing in complexity even faster than it is growing in size. The time has long since passed when there were simple answers to public questions. Too often, slogans are substituted for clear and logical thought.

The second factor also affects the third—apathy. Millions of Americans do not vote. A few are indifferent, and a few more are lazy. But most of the non-voters are confused, uninformed or discouraged.

Involved in all three factors is the essential, but unpopular war in Viet Nam—a war that is used by both "liberal" appeasers and reactionary jingos as a weapon against domestic progress.

The overriding task of the AFL-CIO in the months ahead is to overcome these three barriers—confusion, poor communications and apathy. There is no question that we must undertake the major role in defending the unmatched gains of 1961-1966 from destruction, and in renewing a surge of progress toward the perfection of American life.

This means the election, next November, of candidates who share with us the dream of America as it can and should be, and who share our confidence that the dream can be realized.

We must wage an unremitting attack on confusion, through our own publications, through union meetings and in every available public forum.

We must combat apathy more effectively than ever before, through our register-and-vote machinery. We of the AFL-CIO sincerely believe that a large voter turnout favors liberal causes. But aside from this, a great national decision in a democracy should properly be made by all the people, not just by half of them.

And throughout all this we must face up squarely to the issue of Viet Nam. The AFL-CIO convention left no doubt where union members stand, and we are sure the convention spoke for the vast, silent majority in the nation. The fight for freedom in Viet Nam must continue until the aggressors are willing to negotiate peace. But that fight must not be distorted into an excuse for the surrender of progress at home.

All this will not be easy; but for the well-being of America and the cause of freedom everywhere, it must be done.

Convention Resolution:

Labor's Program Spelled Out To Protect Consumer Interests

The following is excerpted from the resolution on consumer protection adopted by the 7th AFL-CIO Constitutional Convention.

WE WILL CONTINUE to seek fair standards and adequate consumer protection in the market place, to prevent exploitation of consumers.

We hail adoption by the Congress of the new meat inspection law, which will assure effective inspection of meat sold in the United States. It is our hope that enactment of this important measure is the harbinger of needed federal legislation to provide effective inspection of poultry and fish.

We call for enactment of an effective truth-in-lending bill, requiring complete disclosure of finance charges on all forms of consumer credit, both in dollar costs and in terms of true annual percentage rates.

We call for effective enforcement of the federal "truth-in-packaging" law, and amendment of the law to replace voluntary procedures for setting weight and quality standards for packaged products by mandatory provisions.

We urge the Congress to undertake or authorize a complete study of consumer credit laws and practices as well as unfair and harsh debt-collection procedures. We welcome federal action to abate abuses in this field. As an immediate measure, we urge federal legislation to give buyers from door-to-door salesmen a reasonable period in which to cancel their contracts.

We urge enactment of a federal anti-garnishment law.

We support proposals to prohibit distribution of unsolicited credit cards by banks and other financial institutions.

We oppose proposals to deny wage-earners a clear right to a discharge in bankruptcy under the Federal Bankruptcy Act by forced participation in debt-repayment arrangements under Chapter XIII of the Act.

Congress should undertake a general investigation of the insurance industry in all its aspects, with a view to enacting remedial legislation for abuses and bringing the entire industry under federal regulation. In the automobile-insurance field, proposals for revising the liability basis for insurance payments should be given definite consideration along with other possible remedies.

We support legislation to curb the excessive costs of prescription drugs to the buying public, through patent reform and through encouragement of drug prescriptions by generic name rather than brand name. Special legislation is needed to prohibit physicians from selling products they prescribe.

Congress should maintain a continuing review of the food-price situation, with special attention to the cost effects of advertising excesses, games, trading stamps and other promotional devices. Congress should investigate discriminatory pricing practices against the poor in ghetto areas.

WE SUPPORT legislation to provide consumers with unbiased product information and to end misleading, false or fraudulent information about consumer products, including the sale of land.

The Food, Drug & Cosmetic Act should be tightened to insure that all drugs sold for human use actually meet prescribed standards of safety, quality, and efficacy; that cosmetics are tested for safety before sale to the public; and that medical equipment and devices are safe and effective before use on patients. We support Food & Drug Administration efforts to curb industry's advertising and promotion excesses.

We commend the Congress for adopting amendments to the Flammable Fabrics Act, to increase its coverage and effectiveness.

We urge the establishment of formal governmental machinery to give effective representation to the consumer viewpoint, through a Dept. of Consumer Affairs, a statutory Office of Consumers, or other independent agency within the Executive Branch.

We welcome the growth of consumer associations to promote consumer education, information and legislation. We salute the formation of the new national consumer association, the Consumer Federation of America and we urge the Executive Council to work out satisfactory procedures for cooperating with this new group in the promotion of common legislative objectives.

The AFL-CIO reaffirms its support for the cooperative movement and commends its work in behalf of consumers.

We reaffirm our support for consumer education, favor increased governmental effort to make consumer information available, and pledge continuation of our own efforts in the consumer-education field conducted through the AFL-CIO Community Services Dept.

Metcalf Sees 'Step Backward':

19th Century Welfare Approach Scored in Social Security Bill

The following is excerpted from comments on the Senate floor by Sen. Lee Metcalf (D-Mont.) on the public welfare amendments to the social security bill.

I RISE TO TALK on the subject of the social security bill immediately after the passage of one of the most important educational bills that has ever been passed by the Senate . . . a bill that is truly landmark legislation.

But the education bill that we passed today will be of little avail if we adopt the philosophy incorporated in the social security conference report.

I have been in Congress for 15 years. As a member of the House of Representatives, I introduced legislation for education. If some of that legislation had passed in those days, some of the social security problems we have today would not be before us. However, if we adopt the philosophy that is inherent in the social security conference report, it will make no difference what kind of education bills we pass, and it will make no difference what we do in various aspects of our domestic legislation, because we will have taken a step backward into another century.

Everybody recognizes that a very bad bill came over from the House of Representatives, a bill that was bad in concept, a bill that destroyed our whole philosophy of welfare, a bill that the appeal procedure of the Senate should operate upon.

So, we held hearings. We had about 2,000 pages of hearings. We held hearings day after day, and the distinguished chairman of the committee did exactly the job that the Senate is supposed to do. He called people in to testify about the House bill, and they did testify about most of the provisions of the bill.

Largely, the amendments that were offered were offered as a result of those hearings on the special bill that originated in the House of Representatives.

We met for many days in executive session in the committee, and amendments were offered. Some of those amendments were adopted unanimously. Other amendments were voted upon on a party basis. Dozens of committee amendments, however, were adopted.

We then came to the floor of the Senate and discussed the social security legislation and the bill that the Senate had reported. Other amendments were adopted.

In a couple of days of conference, those hearing sessions, those thousands of pages of transcript, those debates in the committee, and the debates on the Senate floor, and the rollcall votes where we had adopted amendments by 2 to 1 and 3 to 1 were appealed. And the Senate abdicated and we went right back to the House bill, the bad bill that came over. We went right back to the bill that the appeal procedure had operated on.

I wonder whether the Senate is going to be a coequal legislative body or whether we are going to relegate ourselves to the position of the House of Lords, so that we register our objections and we tell the House of Representatives that we do not agree with the measures they send to the Senate, but when we go to conference, we go back to the same measures.

After weeks of hearings, weeks of debate, weeks of discussion, we are asked to adopt this bad, evil House bill.

IN ALL THE YEARS we have adopted a philosophy that there should be some dignity, even if people are poverty stricken; and we have adopted a philosophy that people should have an opportunity to eat and have a home; and that they should have a minimum of benefits. We have especially adopted a philosophy that children should grow up and have the care of their mother if it is at all possible.

This bill, after all these years—more than 30—and after all the Congresses which have voted upon social security legislation, has said that we will not permit the children to have the care of their mothers and that we can force the mothers to go out and work in the streets. We can force her to take any job that is offered to her. We can make her take training and put her children in daytime nurseries.

The Senator from New York on the floor of the Senate offered an amendment which was overwhelmingly adopted that would have taken care of mothers and would have provided that mothers who are taking care of children in their homes would not have to abide by the work provisions of the bill. That measure was eliminated in conference.

Mr. President, this is a bill that goes back to the pre-Revolutionary idea that if you do not work you do not eat. I can remember back in the days of the depression when you did not have jobs, you did not have training, and you did not have the background necessary to get even the kinds of jobs that were offered.

We said that people should have the opportunity to continue to live on a dignified basis. All through the years since then we have adopted that philosophy. To my mind it was a good philosophy then, it is a good basic tenet today.

'A Fair Share':

Labor's Age-Old Motives Spur Unionization of Professionals

THE SAME MOTIVES that spurred blue collar workers to form unions are drawing growing numbers of professionals in the arts and sciences toward the principles of collective bargaining, the executive secretary of the AFL-CIO Council of Scientific, Professional & Cultural Employes observed in a network radio interview.

Professionals have many of the same problems and concerns about hours, working conditions and pay that blue collar workers have, said Jack Golodner on Labor News Conference. "They feel," he said, "particularly with increasing innovations and the way technology is developing, that they are not getting a fair share" of the wealth they are producing.

"And they know that they are not getting their fair share, simply because they are not as well organized (as blue collar workers) on the economic front," he said.

Golodner suggested that changing work patterns and developing technology have lessened the professional's "individuality, sense of dignity and status" on his job. He said the professional is organizing "to lengthen his shadow" and to "combat the dehumanizing effects" of being the employes of large, impersonal organizations.

HE SAID the "prime concern" of the council, formed last spring by 17 AFL-CIO unions, "is to encourage professional employes to employ the benefits of collective bargaining." He added, "there are many benefits which the professional, in particular, gains from being a part of an organization which is of such national and international importance."

Reporters questioning Golodner on Labor News Conference, AFL-CIO produced public affairs program aired Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EST, on the Mutual Radio Network, were William Eaton of the Chicago Daily News and Alex Uhl of Press Associates, Inc.

By Press Associates, Inc.

WHEN YOU FIND that your auto insurance premiums have been suddenly raised or you are bluntly denied insurance or your policy is arbitrarily cancelled, you know you've been clobbered.

All this is not so clearly seen in credit life insurance.

For one thing, credit life is almost "hidden insurance." It is usually required to obtain loans to buy automobiles and major household goods on the installment plan. The idea is that if the borrower dies or is otherwise unable to repay the loan he is covered by insurance.

Many people do not even realize that when they make loans they are taking out such insurance, yet credit life has become a big and fantastically profitable business.

Just how big the business is was explained recently by Kenneth C. Nichols, senior vice president for Prudential Insurance Co. He said that "at the end of 1966, the total credit life insurance in force in the United States amounted to $62.7 billion of protection. This represents 64 percent of the total life insurance in force in this country and approximately 84 percent of the total consumer installment debt."

Those who understand the complexities of the financial world have long complained that credit life firms are gouging the public. They demanded some searching investigations.

The Senate Anti-Trust & Monopoly Subcommittee has done exactly this at hearings just concluded under the chairmanship of Sen. Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.). Among the witnesses who testified were some of the top financial executives of the nation.

The Senate investigators found that only 40 cents out of every dollar collected by personal finance companies in long-term credit life was actually used to cover costs.

This left 60 cents to be shared by the finance firms and the insurance companies which underwrite the policies. Subcommittee staff members say that some is kicked back to the lending companies in the form of commissions from the insurers.

The rates for credit insurance range from 37.5 cents per $100 of outstanding debt per year to $1 or more per $100. What is a fair rate is in dispute. Prudential says that anything beyond 60 cents is extreme. The subcommittee staff points to the 37.5 cent rate as bringing high profits.

Hart noted that James Hunt, Vermont's insurance commissioner, has charged that 50 million Americans are being overcharged $175 million annually for credit insurance.

A PARTICULAR PROBLEM is that regulation of credit life, like that of auto insurance, is handled by the states, and state agencies too often are dominated by the industry.

"One question we must resolve," Hart said, "is whether state regulation is adequate."

The subcommittee staff also reported that some of the biggest banks in the country wind up keeping more than $1 out of every $4 they collect for life insurance they sell in connection with automobile loans.

Ten of the largest banks in New York City, including First National City Bank, the Chase Manhattan and Manufacturers Trust Co., the staff said, collected $4.7 million over a four-year period for short-term credit life insurance sold as automobile loans were made.

Some of the "hidden" aspects of credit life were brought out in an exchange between Jerry Cohen, subcommittee counsel, and Robert S. Olson, chairman of the board of directors of Financial & Industrial Subsidiaries of Ford Motor Co.

"After they get talking about how much the car is going to cost," Cohen asked, "from a practical standpoint do you really think a consumer goes out and shops for credit life to see whether it is 38 cents or 65 or 75 cents? Does he really know?"

Olson acknowledged that the consumer doesn't really know "a single item."

GROWING NUMBERS of arts and sciences professionals are being drawn to trade unionism by the same motives that spurred blue collar workers, Executive Sec. Jack Golodner (center) of the AFL-CIO Council of Scientific, Professional & Cultural Employes told Alex Uhl (left) of Press Associates, Inc. and William Eaton of the Chicago Daily News on Labor News Conference.

How to Buy:

Foreign Car Buyers Warned Against 'Leftover' Old Models

By Sidney Margolius

CONSUMERS WHO BUY new foreign cars have no way of knowing whether they are actually getting this year's model or not. Unlike American-made cars, foreign-car distributors are permitted—apparently in all states—to designate leftover last year's cars as this year's model.

One wage-earner bought a foreign car in 1965 and later discovered that it was really manufactured in 1964. He has carried on a two-year campaign not only to secure some redress for himself but to call public attention to this fact.

As far as redress for himself is concerned, all he has gotten from various state and federal agencies is the bland brushoff that consumers with grievances often get.

The state and federal officials I talked to about this juggling of the model year, all are aware of the practice. But they tend to excuse it on the grounds that it has been going on many years, and that foreign cars do not undergo the noticeable annual model changes of American cars. So, the defenders of the practice say, the foreign cars do not suffer the same degree of loss in market value after the new model year that an American-made car does.

But there are enough holes in that argument to drive one of those foreign cars through:

For one, even if a new car has merely been sitting around and not used, age does deteriorate some of its components, such as the electrical wiring and body finish.

Too, there is no way of knowing how many miles the so-called new car actually has been driven. The distributors disconnect the odometer cable while the car is driven from the port of entry. There also is frequent exchange of different models between dealers.

In this case, the "1965" model the worker had bought in late October 1964, actually had arrived in the U. S. the previous April, and no one knows when it was really manufactured.

While the distributors claim the model year does not affect the value of a foreign car significantly, the dealer said his car had to be considered a 1964 model, when he explored the possibility of trading it in.

Finally, there may be significant model changes some years. If state motor vehicle departments continue to permit foreign cars made in previous years to be designated as the current model, buyers may not know whether they are getting the latest improvements.

THERE IS NO DOUBT that even though legal, this is a shoddy practice. It becomes a matter of increasing concern with the growing sale of foreign cars in this country. Over 8 percent of all cars sold here are now made abroad.

Curiously, most of the legal authorities I asked about this practice, believe it is permitted by state laws, and that the laws would have to be changed. But this may not be true at all in your own state.

In New York, for example, this is not a state statute, but the department's own regulation. This type of regulation can be changed by a state motor vehicles commissioner by his own decision.

The odometer problem is even more important because it affects American as well as foreign cars, and used as well as new. At least two states, Massachusetts and California, now have laws making it illegal to tamper with odometers, although in Massachusetts used-car dealers are trying to get the law repealed.

Now proposals have been made at the federal level to forbid any tampering with odometers, by requiring that they be sealed.

One of the most revealing sidelights of the effort to get redress is the way the bland brushoff has been developed into a real art. Often various officials tell a buyer this is a personal matter and he should sue the company . . .

The car in the case above was a Volvo, so the buyer even wrote to the King of Sweden. He might have done better to write the Chrysler Corporation, which really owns the Volvo company.

We have nothing against or for the Volvo. All the foreign car manufacturers are given the same leeway in designating the model year. Our criticism is directed against the state motor vehicle departments for permitting such changes in designation.

But you at least better make sure beforehand that any foreign car you are considering is not a little older than you may be told.

New Margolius Book:

'Innocent Consumer' Loses $920 a Year

THE TYPICAL FAMILY wastes about $920 a year or about 12 percent of its income if it has such bad consumer habits as relying too much on credit, succumbing to TV advertising and buying on impulse. This is the shocking conclusion of consumer expert Sidney Margolius in his latest book.

While some in the field have referred to the consumer as an "idiot" or "boob," Margolius believes the fairer and more accurate phrase is "the innocent consumer." He describes advertising and merchandising practices which skillfully skirt the edge of honesty and truth and fool even experts.

" 'Exploitation' is not too strong a word to describe the consumer situation," Margolius writes. "Never in the 30 years I have been reporting on consumer problems has the public been as widely and steadily exploited as today, from the children manipulated by TV toy ads and the teenagers by disc jockeys to their parents manipulated into habitual installment buying at startling charges for the financing and often for the merchandise as well.

"This is serious business. It involves much more than mere irritations. It really involves a massive waste of family money and a diversion of family resources that are helping to frustrate vital personal and national goals such as advanced education, the rehabilitation of our cities, better housing and more adequate health care."

In Margolius' view, "consumer exploitation has to a large extent replaced labor exploitation as the real problem of our times." He describes the case of a woman who agreed to accept a set of stainless steel tableware for a trial period through a door-to-door salesman. When her $65 set was delivered, she signed what appeared to be a "receipt." She discovered the tableware did not seem to be the same quality as the set shown by the salesman. She tried to return it but learned the "receipt" was an installment contract. The seller then filed a garnishment against her wages for $120, including legal fees and finance charges. To keep her job, she had to settle by paying $75 for tableware which a retailer estimated to be worth $15.

Since this woman earned only $60 a week, Margolius reported, she in effect worked a full week without pay because of this incident.

If an employer had forced this woman to work a full week without pay, there would be justified protests against "labor peonage," he says. And yet this type of consumer exploitation occurs by the thousands each week, he charges.

MARGOLIUS MADE his calculations of waste on the basis of a family of four with a typical current income of $7,500 a year. He found the largest waste usually in food buying, with this family spending $40 per person per month when $32 could provide attractive nutritious meals "if they knew what they were buying and how to buy." This would bring a savings of $416 a year. Another large saving is possible in finance charges, which could amount to only $75 a year instead of the $250 usually spent by those with the credit habit.

Margolius does more than describe the abuses. He lists a number of consumer protection services and agencies available through trade union and private and government sources. He argues strongly for more alert and better-informed consumers as well as reforms through law and regulation.

Soup to Nonsense:

And Editors Must Also Squeeze To Write a Headline to Please

By Jane Goodsell

LIFE WOULD BE a lot less exasperating if things that are supposed to accommodate each other would really fit.

For example: have you ever managed to write your full name on a coupon or an application blank in the space allotted for it?

It's a moot point whether people's names are too long or those spaces are too short, but in either case . . .

Smack in the middle of your last name, you run out of space.

Trying to squeeze a telephone book into a telephone book cover is an infuriating job.

And trying to force a driver's license into the card compartment of a wallet is enough to make a saint break down and sob.

Likewise, trying to insert cameras into camera cases, toothbrushes into toothbrush holders.

And, say, have you ever attempted to fit the Tinker Toys back into the Tinker Toy box?

I don't expect miracles, and in my opinion anyone who undertakes to fit a square peg into a round hole has only himself to blame if frustration drives him beserk.

But, conversely, I think that a person who endeavors to fit a 7:50x14 tire chain on a 7:50x14 tire has every right to expect his attempt to work.

Venturing to fit two suits into a two-suiter piece of luggage is a task likely to lead to severe neurosis.

And trying to maneuver a too-big car into a too-small parking space is as good a way as any to have a thrombosis.

Is there some reason why hotdog manufacturers and bun makers can't get together and agree on the same length for the weiner and the bun?

And another thing: why must there always be two more hotdogs to a package than there are buns? Why can't they market their products in a corresponding amount?

IF THE CORK doesn't slip through the neck of the bottle to be irretrievably lost because it's too small . . .

The same principle applies to buttons and buttonholes, cigarettes and cigarette holders and sockets and screws . . .

There must be some malevolent force in the universe that operates to prevent one object that is supposed to correlate with another from ever fitting exactly right . . .

And I guess that explains why my last year's bathing suit is too tight.

12-Nation ILO Parley:

Labor Educators Spur Radio, TV Use

Geneva—A call for more use of radio and television in workers' education has been made by a working group of experts assembled here by the Intl. Labor Organization.

Trade unions must make an "adjustment of their educational efforts" to take full advantage of the new electronic age, said the final report of the working group.

"Labor educators increasingly recognize that their traditional methods are not enough" the report said. "Modern technology offers them unprecedented opportunities, particularly for teaching large numbers of workers more rapidly than heretofore."

Nineteen participants from 12 nations attended the meeting, the first to link radio and television with workers' education on an international scale.

John Sessions of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education represented U.S. labor at the meeting.

The group's report noted that use of radio and TV by trade unions and labor educators has generally been "occasional, infrequent and not always adapted to the nature and capabilities of the media."

"Labor educators need to know more about these mass media and how to use them," the group agreed.

This is true especially because trade unions are increasingly taking important roles in the social and economic development of their countries, it said.

The experts pointed out that radio and television can be particularly important in developing nations, where traditional methods are hampered by a low literacy rate.

It works both ways, too, said the experts; not only are the electronic media important to labor, but "labor education is important to mass media because workers and trade unions are important to modern societies."

Unions, they added, are entitled to "the support of radio and television to help promote the workers' educational interests."

The experts gave a prominent place in their report to an analysis and a warning:

"The power of mass communications media grips the developed and developing countries alike. It is transforming habits, attitudes and thinking among all sectors of society, not the least of which are the workers and their families. Its pervasive influence enters into every home where there is a receiver, it reaches even the masses of illiterates untouched by the written word. . . .

"But radio and television facilities are no more than sophisticated machines. They can be only as effective as the program content poured into them, and only as educational as the ideas transmitted through them.

"They can be used to inform, to educate and to entertain but, if improperly used, they can stifle truth, distort ideas and destroy initiative until no creative effort survives in a cultural wasteland."

The experts' report will be sent for consideration to the ILO's Governing Body, which will meet next February. It will also receive world-wide distribution.

NEW ENGLAND UNIONISTS attended a one-week seminar at Northampton, Mass., as part of a year-long leadership training program in anti-poverty techniques sponsored by the New England AFL-CIO Council and the University of Massachusetts with OEO financing. George Guernsey, assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education (at far end of table), meets with some of the trainees during a round-table discussion.

AFL-CIO Anti-Poverty Trainees Learn Much from Each Other

Northampton, Mass.—They came from 95 locals in 37 internationals, representing workers in 82 communities spanning the six New England States. Some came great distances like Papermaker Larry Boutot who drove 565 miles from Madawaska, Me. Others like Leo Bouchard of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers drove the 9 miles from Amherst daily.

They were among 110 trainees to attend the first one-week training seminar of the Office of Economic Opportunity's Trade Union Leadership Training Program for New England, sponsored by the Labor Relations & Research Center of the University of Massachusetts and the New England AFL-CIO Council.

The trainees came to learn. "And learn they did!" observed Program Dir. William Kemsley. "They learned as much living together as they did in the classrooms."

Those coming from villages in the north woods, the rocky coast of Maine and the mountains of New Hampshire and Vermont swapped viewpoints with trainees originating in the asphalt jungles of Roxbury and Bridgeport and Hartford. They learned to understand each other —those speaking in the musical twang of the Downeaster and those speaking the hard-bitten language of the black-ghetto.

They sat for many hours talking, discussing and arguing, trying to "dig them cats from the North," as Auto Worker Ben Little put it.

To plan after-hour activities, the trainees elected ACWA member Laurie Celuzza of the Clothing Workers as head of their Student Council. Aided by six-foot four Boilermaker Lloyd Middleton, Miss Celuzza planned and produced each evening "wing-ding."

'Through Black Eyes'

At week's end in a summary session, Kemsley pointed out that "you white people learned to look at yourselves through black eyes. You got inside the black skin and saw problems you never understood before. And before the year's program is over, you'll have a chance to get inside a poor man's skin and see through his eyes."

Supplementing classroom discussions, the trainees participated in a field trip to see various OEO and other projects set up to help economically deprived persons in Springfield and Holyoke. The evening's summary session of the trip was led by AFL-CIO Assistant Education Dir. George Guernsey, who aided Kemsley in planning and conducting the one-week seminar. Bill Lawler of the Commonwealth Service Corps arranged the tours.

Program Highlights

The week's major presentations dealing with regional problems were handled by Robert Gidez, director of the New England Regional Commission, and Keith Prouty, research director of the Communications Workers. A panel composed of Tom Kahn, executive director of the League for Industrial Democracy, and David Harris, director of a similar OEO training program at Rutgers University, with Prof. Emil Starr of the University of Massachusetts as moderator discussed "The History and Culture of Poverty."

Julius Rothman, anti-poverty programs coordinator of the AFL-CIO, outlined techniques for working within the community. A presentation on the poor and the welfare system was made by Maurice F. X. Donahue, administrator of the Work Experience Training Center in Washington.

Future plans call for a round of two-day seminars (one for each area of New England) in January, another series in March, a one-week half-way seminar in May and a three-day wind-up session in July or August.

Study Finds Many School Textbooks Present Strong Bias Against Unions

Many social studies textbooks still in use in high shools are strongly slanted against unions, collective bargaining and social welfare programs, though the newer texts are improving, a California history teacher has charged.

Will Scoggins, a faculty member in the Dept. of History at El Camino College, discussed the problem in an article, "The Anti-Labor Bias in Schoolbooks," appearing in the December issue of The American Federationist.

Scoggins pointed out that 1.5 million new workers enter the labor force each year, most of them with at least a high school education. What, he asks, have these young people been taught in school about what it means to be an employe? He noted that local and state laws require courses in social studies.

Scoggins drew mainly from his own detailed study of the 46 high school districts in Los Angeles County. He said the diversity of these schools, plus the findings of other teachers who studied the problem, indicate that an abundance of anti-labor bias exists in books used across the nation.

There are excellent high school texts, he observed, but then there are others "of extreme innocence and simplicity."

Scoggins wrote that he found "an overwhelming emphasis" on the theme that labor has been responsible for many strikes "and violence and death."

Scoggins said one U.S. history text presented a picture "of threatening demonstrators" to illustrate the Republic Steel strike of 1937. The book said police advanced on 2,000 strike demonstrators at Republic's South Chicago plant, reported flatly that 10 people were killed and said the bloodshed "caused the public to turn against the CIO temporarily."

'The Truth'

"The truth," Scoggins wrote, "is that there were only about 300 pickets in the area and that, as every union man over 40 knows, the 10 dead men were all killed by police bullets."

He noted that Foster Rhea Dulles, a well-known historian, has pointed out that the "Memorial Day massacre" of 1937 at Republic Steel developed wide public sympathy for the strikers.

Scoggins found several popular history textbooks describing the strike weapon as wasteful and futile. The implications are, he said, that government must step in and protect "public interest."

Looking for a balance in the textbooks on collective bargaining since this process has been public policy for over 30 years, Scoggins found that over three-fourths of history texts and over half the government or American problems books "are either totally silent or inadequate on the subject."

Scoggins discovered the most popular textbook on U.S. government proclaiming "The economic gap between workers and owners has narrowed almost to the point of extinction."

The second most popular U.S. history text in Los Angeles reported that the "lower classes" in America have been "virtually" eliminated, conceding "there were still poor Americans in the 1950s, but sociologists had to look hard to find segments of impoverished people. . . ."

Related to such views, Scoggins said, was an absence of critical questioning on social welfare issues and seldom any description of the collective action of people.

Yet, he concluded, while textbooks are not what they should be, "they are definitely getting better."

On all the issues he analyzed, Scoggins added, the books published since 1960 are noticeably better than older books and those published since 1964 are "better still."

Scoggins attributed the improvements to the insistence of organized labor that it be given credit for its contributions to the growth of the nation, the extension of human rights and the winning of dignity through collective action.

Connecticut Teachers Vote to Retain Union

Ansonia, Conn.— Teachers here have voted 95 to 74 to keep the American Federation of Teachers as their bargaining agent, rejecting an attempted raid by a unit of the National Education Association.

This was the third election held between AFT and NEA in the Ansonia district. NEA won the first, in 1965, but the teachers switched to the union last year. NEA recently called for the new vote under Connecticut's teacher bargaining law.

Labor Mourns Cyrus Ching as 'Valued Friend'

Cyrus S. Ching, a one-time Boston trolleyman who became one of the nation's top labor-management mediators, died in Washington following a heart attack. Although 91, he had been active and alert.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany sent a message of condolences to Ching's widow praising him as "a giant among men, who contributed as much to the cause of industrial peace and labor-management understanding as any man of his generation."

"He was admired, respected and trusted by all who knew him," Meany said. "He served his fellow man, his nation and the cause of individual freedom with complete devotion. We in the AFL-CIO have lost a valued friend."

Ching was appointed by Pres. Truman to head the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service in 1947 when it was just being established as an independent agency. In that post, he had a major role in resolving post-World War II contract disputes.

Truman also chose Ching to head the Wage Stabilization Board during the Korean War. Later, Ching returned to the mediation service where he remained until 1952. In 1953, Pres. Eisenhower named him chairman of the Atomic Energy Labor-Management Relations Panel, a post he held at the time of his death.

Ching went to work for the Boston Elevated Lines as a motorman in 1901, later becoming an assistant to the company's president. From 1919 to 1947 he was associated with U.S. Rubber Co.

Liberalism or Reaction?

Labor, Nation Seen Facing 'Pivotal' Year

CIO president said, because three conditions prevail:

● Confusion. As old issues arrive in new forms their outlines are often blurred, Meany observed. He pointed to the example of civil rights. A clear-cut issue a few years back, it now involves housing, urban renewal and jobs.

● Inadequate communications. Society is growing so fast in size and complexity, Meany noted, that there is an increasing tendency to substitute slogans for thought.

● Apathy. Millions of Americans do not vote, some because they are lazy or indifferent, but most of them because they are confused, uninformed or discouraged, Meany said.

Involved in all three factors, he observed, is the "essential, but unpopular war in Viet Nam—a war that is used by both 'liberal' appeasers and reactionary jingos as a weapon against domestic progress."

"The overriding task of the AFL-CIO in the months ahead," Meany continued, "is to overcome these three barriers . . .

"We must wage an unremitting attack on confusion, through our publications, through union meetings and every available forum."

"We must combat apathy more effectively than ever before, through our register-and-vote machinery."

Large Turnout Needed

Aside from the AFL-CIO's belief that a large voter turnout favors liberal causes, Meany said, "a great national decision in a democracy should properly be made by all the people, not just half of them."

Throughout its efforts in the election, he added, labor must "face up squarely" to the Viet Nam issue. He recalled that the AFL-CIO convention "left no doubt where union members stand, and we are sure the convention spoke for the vast, silent majority of the nation."

The struggle for freedom in Viet Nam "must continue until the aggressors are willing to negotiate for peace," Meany said. "But that fight must not be distorted into an excuse for the surrender of progress at home."

Labor's task in the election "will not be easy," he concluded, "but for the well-being of America and the cause of freedom everywhere, it must be done."

GRADUATION EXERCISES for the first class at American University's Labor Studies Center in Washington, D. C. drew a big turnout to see 160 members of 28 unions receive their certificates. Unions in the nation's capital have joined in supporting the center. Dr. Harold H. Hutson, AU's provost (left foreground), and AFL-CIO Education Dir. Walter C. Davis discuss the center's program of classes in labor history, collective bargaining and National Labor Relations Board procedures.

CLC Leader Warns Against 'Complacency'

Ottawa, Ont. — Strong growth made 1967 a "significant" year for Canadian labor but "it's no cause for complacency," Donald MacDonald, acting president of the Canadian Labor Congress, declared in a New Year's statement.

MacDonald referred to recently released government figures showing that union membership in Canada is at an all-time high and that CLC's membership has passed the 1.5 million mark, increasing 12 percent in a year.

However, MacDonald warned "there are still far too many" Canadian workers unorganized and "our movement is confronted with challenges which call for the greatest strength we can muster."

He cited mounting pressures for compulsory arbitration to replace the right to strike, a cloudy economic outlook and an upward trend in unemployment, a pressing need for more low income housing and a "long overdue" national medicare program.

N.Y. Teachers' Vigil Protests Shanker Jailing

New York — Teachers maintained an around-the-clock vigil outside the Civil Jail here while the president of their local union served a 15-day sentence for contempt growing out of a contract dispute with the city last September.

Pres. Albert Shanker was jailed for not advising members of Teachers Local 2 to return to the classroom before they had reached a satisfactory agreement. The union and the local labor movement charge that Shanker was a victim of an unfair state law—the Taylor Act—which penalizes public employes who strike.

About 1,000 union members marched with Shanker from a union meeting at 34th St. to the jailhouse at 37th St. singing "Solidarity Forever." At the meeting, the union head reported Local 2 had decided not to appeal his jail term and $250 fine or the $150,000 fine imposed on the local by State Supreme Court Justice Emilio Nunez. Shanker's term in jail ends Jan. 3.

The decision triggered a drive by union members to pay their year's dues in advance to help pay off the fines. Also it strengthened labor's determination to continue fighting for full civil rights for all public employes,

Pres. Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., of the New York City AFL-CIO pledged continuing support of the teachers' drive for better schools. Executive Dir. Victor Gotbaum of District Council 37 of the State, County & Municipal Employes also vowed support, as did Pres. Matthew Guinan of the Transport Workers Union.

LBJ Urged to Battle Sharp Welfare Slash

"flagrantly inadequate"—13 percent, instead of the 15 percent sought by the President and supported by labor.

As for the minimums of $55 a month for an individual and $82.50 for a couple, Meany continued, they are "in shocking contrast" to the $70 and $105 minimums the Senate had called for in its bill.

Social security benefits have been increased five times since 1940 but all of these boosts have been less than the cost of living, Meany noted, adding that rising living costs since 1965 have already used up half of the 13 percent increase provided in the current legislation.

This "losing battle to the cost of living" hits especially hard at beneficiaries who draw the "minimums," including many low-paid farm workers and people also dependent upon public assistance, Meany declared.

But while such provisions are inadequate, he continued, "the public assistance provisions are invidious."

He called it "inhumane" that the bill will force mothers of young children—where the father is dead, disabled or absent from home—to take work or training or lose their portion of public assistance allowance.

'A Punitive Approach'

The most optimistic estimates of those who backed the mandatory work training provision are that the Dept. of Labor can place 250,000 people from welfare rolls into gainful employment, Meany said, adding:

"A program to place this number does not require a punitive approach. A voluntary program could do the job if meaningful training and job opportunities were developed."

Further, Meany asked: If mothers are compelled to work, how will their children be taken care of? At the present time, he noted, existing day care centers "have long waiting lists" and there is a shortage of trained personnel to staff them.

He predicted that the legislation will be used simply to eliminate recipients from welfare rolls on grounds they do not have "good cause" for refusing work training. "We strongly suspect that this was the real objective" of proponents of the provision, he added.

Meany also condemned the "freeze" on the proportion of federal funds available to the states in matching grants under the Aid to Families with Dependent Children program.

Additional federal funds will be available only if the rise in AFDC recipients is in proportion to a rise in the state's population.

Attacking this as "cruel and unrealistic," Meany cited a Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare estimate that it will cut 300,000 children from welfare rolls by July 1 unless "already hard-pressed state and local governments can find additional funds to provide for them."

Finally, Meany lashed the conference bill for its removal of a previously-approved Senate provision to guarantee an average increase in net income of $7.50 a month for social security recipients also covered by assistance to the aged, blind and disabled.

"This would have prevented state and local authorities from simply subtracting the social security increase from the welfare benefit, leaving these unfortunate people no better off than before," Meany said.

Although the conference bill "authorizes" states to disregard up to $7.50 a month in additional income, he observed, past experience under social security amendments "has shown that very few states exercise this option."

In conclusion, Meany wrote that what he had set forth in his letter "is only a summary of the shortcomings of the bill. A full recital would take many more pages."

Suffridge Plans to Retire As Head of Retail Clerks

Pres. James A. Suffridge of the Retail Clerks will not be a candidate for another term in the office he has held since 1944, he announced.

Suffridge notified the RCIA executive board by letter that he expects to continue performing his duties until his present term expires Sept. 1, 1968. After that he will serve as board chairman for four years and as president emeritus for life, under provisions of the RCIA constitution. He will hold the posts without salary but with retirement income, plus a supplemental annuity of $20,000 a year authorized by the union's 1963 convention.

RCIA local unions will nominate candidates for 12 top offices in January and February 1968. Ballots will be mailed in May, with elections set for June. A canvassing board will announce the results in mid-July.

Suffridge will be 59 next Feb. 2. Under the RCIA pension program and the retirement annuity voted by the 1963 convention, retirement was possible at 55.

A native of Knoxville, Tenn., where his father was a retail merchant, Suffridge joined the RCIA in 1934 and later became secretary-treasurer of Oakland, Calif., Local 870; president of the California State Council of Retail Clerks and financial secretary-treasurer of the Oakland AFL-CIO.

He is an AFL-CIO vice president and a member of the federation's appeals, civil rights, COPE administrative, community services, economic policy and other committees.

He is also president of the Intl. Federation of Commercial, Clerical & Technical Employes; executive board member of the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions; member of the board of visitors of the U.S. Military Academy, West Point, N. Y., and an official of many other public bodies.

Firefighting Plan By Air Force Hit

The Fire Fighters have officially protested against a U.S. Air Force plan to experiment next year with the use of volunteer fire fighters recruited from military personnel to protect equipments and buildings.

IAFF Pres. William D. Buck issued the protest in letters to Air Force Sec. Harold Brown and Col. Delbert J. Salmon, chief of the fire protection group in the Air Force's directorate of civil engineering.

Buck charged that the plan sharply conflicts with Dept. of Defense policy expressed by both Pres. Johnson and Defense Sec. Robert McNamara not to use military personnel in "non-combatant support-type assignments."

Goodyear Scored On Nurse Reprisals

A National Labor Relations Board trial examiner has found that the Goodyear Tire and Rubber Co. is engaging in unfair labor practices in making benefit programs for 30 nurses available only if they stay out of the union.

Trial Examiner Leo F. Lightner's recommended order submitted to the NLRB would have the company stopped from disqualifying the nurses from retirement, annuity and pension plans.

Pres. Peter Bommarito of the Rubber Workers, which brought the charges on behalf of the nurses, hailed the findings as "a giant step forward in bringing about fair and equitable treatment for white collar workers through organization."
